Hans von Bülow made the reputation of the Meiningen rchestra, now led by Fritz Steinbach. Annually this cellent band comes here for a series of concerts at the ngakademie, and gradually it has won a large clientèle ich looks out for a well filled house and indiscriminate thusiasm. Not a little of the vogue enjoyed by the einingen Orchestra is due to Joachim, who has always erted his powerful influence in their favor. The con-ction with Joachim probably explains the preponder-ce of Brahms on the programs of the four concerts. ie "Meininger," as they are called here, have come to regarded as model interpreters of Brahms. And well they deserve their renown. In ensemble, exactness and dignity they equal the best of our orchestras. If they had the elasticity of the Berlin Philharmonic players, and if Steinbach had some of the sensuousness of Nikisch—but "ifs" are as odious in art as comparisons.

At the first concert there were performed Brahms' C minor Symphony; Bach's A minor Concerto, and Schumann's Fantaisie for violin and orchestra, op. 131, both pieces played by Joachim; a Rondino for wind instruments, by Beethoven, and an overture to one of Gozzi's comedies, by Joachim. The Schumann, Beethoven and Joachim numbers might well have been spared us. Joachim, the "king of the violin," hardly gave a royal performance of Bach's Concerto. His tone was uneven, his intonation impure, and his technic inaccurate. By far the best performance of the evening was the Brahms Symphony.

I missed the second concert, but heard brilliant reports of the artistic piano playing of J. W. O. Voss, a young American, who scored a big triumph in Tschaikowsky's popular B flat minor Concerto.

About the third concert I shall be able to tell you next week. At the fourth Richard Strauss will conduct portions of his opera "Guntram."

Wilhelm Ammermann, from Hamburg, came here to wrest from Berlin's reluctant critics the acknowledgment that he is a capable conductor. For this purpose he hired the Philharmonic Orchestra, and gave a concert at Beethoven Hall, with a program of works by Beethoven ("Egmont" Overture), Schumann, Mendelssohn, Wagner and Napravnik. Herr Ammermann has been acknowledged a capable conductor, and presumably by this time he has returned to Hamburg. Why the concert in Berlin, where we have Weingartner, Muck, Nikisch and Strauss?

The Napravnik number, "The Demon," proved to be interesting, nay, exciting. It is based on a poem, an Oriental legend, by Lermontoff. The music is strenuous, almost fierce, and constitutes a most grateful bit of virtuosity for a first-class orchestra.

Frida Quehl, from Cologne, gave a concert at Beethoven Hall with the Philharmonic Orchestra. Bruch's "Scottish Fantasie" and Vieuxtemps' D minor Concerto formed a severe test of her musical and technical powers. Miss Quehl proved to be one of the most promising violin talents we have heard here for many a day. She has an unusually voluminous tone, highly developed technic and temperament in abundance. If anything, she has too much temperament. At times it led her into slight exaggerations of sentiment and phrasing. Further finish in double stopping and artistic moderation would make Miss Quehl one of our best young female violinists.

Frederic Lamond gave his second Beethoven recital at Beethoven Hall, of course. Mr. Lamond is attracting most favorable critical attention with his thoughtful, musicianly readings. I could hear but one number, the "Diabelli Variations," and the highest praise I know for Mr. Lamond is to say that he made this hideous unmber almost bearable.

Richard Buhlig, a Leschetizky pupil, made his first appearance here. He has good fingers, he is musical, he has temperament, and he looks like Paderewski. All of which augurs well for his future. He should learn to caress the keys, rather than to stab them, however. An agreeable tone is an important factor in a pianist's future.

At the Singakademie I heard Juanita Brockmann (violin), and Emerich Schreiner (singer). Miss Brockmann is a fairly finished player, with warmth of tone and musical expression. Mr. Schreiner was far from finished. He will be, though, by the critics, I fear me.

MILAN MUSIC.

CORSO VENEZIA 65, MILAN, ITALY,
October 26, 1901.

ADELAIDE BORGHI-MAMO, a famous opera singer of bygone days, is dead.

Under the impression that THE MUSICAL COURIER would receive from another source an account of this celebrated singer's death, I have not sent you this biographical sketch sooner.

Signora Adelaide Borghi-Mamo, who died at her villa near Bologna on September 28 last, had reached the ripe old age of seventy-five, being born in the year 1826, on the 9th day of August.

The then celebrated tenor Donzelli, with true artistic intuition, was the first to discover the young girl's beauty of voice and talent and to direct her early vocal studies, preparing her début in opera at Urbino in 1843, when Adelaide was only seventeen years of age. But it was later at Bologna that she really began her artistic career, which continued to be a succession of triumphs in all the capitals of Europe.

After singing in the large theatre of San Carlo at Naples, the youthful artist passed on to the Opéra des Italiens at Paris, where she remained four consecutive years, singing in company with Frezzolini, Grisi, Penco, Bosio, Mario, Tamberlik, Graziani and other celebrities of the day.

Some time after this the singer left the French capital for reasons of poor health. Later, in Italy, the grand opera houses all became rivals and vied with one another in securing the services of the singer whose fame was then spreading so rapidly, and in turn Adelaide Borghi-Mamo appeared at all the great opera houses of Italy—the Scala (Milan), the Regio (Turin), the Fenice (Venice), the San Carlo (Naples), the Pergola (Florence), the Carlo Felice (Genoa), &c. During the height of her career, from 1860 to 1866, she sang at Bologna in the Comunale the operas "La Favorita" and "Il Profeta" under the direction of Mariani. At the Brunetti in 1866 she sang the title role in the opera "Sapho," arousing her audiences to unbounded enthusiasm that must have been akin to frenzy.

La Borghi-Mamo, with a phenomenal voice ranging from low fa to high do, was one of those artists who could readily adapt herself to the requirements of such widely differing characters as the prima donna roles, for instance, in the operas of "Cenerentola," "Sonnambula," "Faust," "Semiramide," "Profeta," "Otello," "Sapho," "Barbiere di Siviglia," "Favorita," "Don Pasquale," "Don Giovanni" and "Anna Bolena."

How few such artists are to be found to-day!

Borghi-Mamo also held the position of royal-imperial court singer at the principal courts of Europe. She had sung in the Burg Theatre at Vienna, at the marriage of Emperor Francis Joseph, and for Napoleon III. and Empress Eugenie she sang every Sunday during her stay in Paris at the Royal Chapel in the Tuileries. Everywhere, at Madrid and Lisbon, at London the same as at St. Petersburg, Borghi-Mamo created the wildest enthusiasm with her glorious voice, and she was received with the greatest possible attention and distinguished honors by the reigning sovereigns.

Among the fifteen or more operas specially written for her may be mentioned the "Statua," by Mercadante; "Marco Visconti," Petrella; "Nina pazza per amore," Coppola; "La Magicienne," Halévy (produced at the Paris Opéra in 1868); "Hercolanum," Félicien David, and an opera by Pacini.

Adelaide Borghi-Mamo has left among her possessions a highly prized and valuable album containing original romances and melodies inscribed and dedicated to her by Rossini, Mercadante, Halévy, Auber, Pacini, Coppola and Eslavo Verdi; also autographs and sketches by Domenico Morelli, Vertunni, Falcinieri, Chieviski, Blaize, Meissonier, Carelli, Rocco, Duclerc and others.

Besides having been a celebrated artist, a brilliant operatic star, Borghi-Mamo leaves a reputation for charitable deeds in various directions, for which her memory will be cherished, honored and revered by many a grateful soul.

King Vittorio Emanuele III. and Queen Helen, during their recent visit to Milan, inspected, among other places, the "Casa dei Musicisti," erected and endowed by Verdi, and in which is the tomb of the immortal master.

The royal couple was there received by the committee in charge, consisting of the Signori Negri, Ricordi, Labadini, Carnelli, Campanari, Boito and others. Among the company present were also many celebrities, theatrical and musical.

After remaining for some time at the tomb of Verdi in deep and devout meditation, their Royal Majesties then repaired to the grand concert room (salone) on the floor above ,the King accompanied by the Commendatore Giulio Ricordi and Queen Helen by the Senatore Negri. In the concert room the party was addressed by the president, Signor Negri, who spoke briefly on the merits and character of the "Grand Old Man," the great composer Verdi; of his lofty ideals, his patriotism, his benefactions, &c., concluding by calling attention to the little Verdi Museum, now annexed to the salone, and for cheers, which were heartily given, with "Viva il Re, Viva Savoia, Viva la Regina!" After which the company betook themselves to the interesting little museum of Verdi relics—first, however, recording their respective names in a special register for visitors.

Apropos of Verdi—a number of letters written by the great composer of "Aïda" are about to be published at Bologna. Thirty years ago, when the poet Ghislanzoni was engaged upon the libretto of "Aïda," Verdi wrote him these letters. They are said to contain all sorts of hints and suggestions from the composer as to the scenario, concerning the opera, and including some of the lyrics. The whole correspondence in fact shows with what extreme care and interest Verdi followed every detail of the libretto of his "Aïda."

Sonzogno's Teatro Lirico Internazionale opens to-night with a fine cast in Saint-Saëns' opera, "Sansone e Dalila"; Signora Adele Cucini as Dalila, the tenor Carlo Barrera as Sansone and the baritone Alessandro Arcangeli as the High Priest.

"Chopin," the new opera by Orefici, is, after all, not to be the first work for performance, as was so positively announced.

Other operas to follow immediately will be the Chopin work above mentioned; "Werther," by Massenet, and the same composer's "Cendrillon." Of these, "Werther" will be the second in order to be given, with Cesira Ferrani and Carlo Delmas in the principal parts.

However, in Italy you are never quite certain what is going to take place until it has happened, and then you are not altogether sure that it did happen, so unreliable is all information obtainable and so contradictory all later reports.

At times I have been accused of French-Irishisms, and I am almost afraid of having been guilty of one just now.

The Dal Verme Theatre opened for the "grande stagione d'autunno" this week with Puccini's "La Tosca" and a strong cast, including Signora Elena Bianchini-Cappelli as the Tosca, tenor Eduardo Garbin as Cavaradossi and the baritone Eugenio Giraldoni as Scarpia.

The next opera at this house will be Verdi's "La Forza del Destino," which is to be followed by Wagner's "Lohengrin."

Following is the important and interesting (!) list of operas to be given at the Scala during the Carnival and Quaresima seasons this coming winter, which I send you without any comment:

Walküre	Wagner
Linda di Chamounix	Donizetti
Germania (new)	Franchetti
Trovatore (bis)	Verdi
Messa da Requiem	Verdi
Hänsel and Gretel	Humperdinck
Euryanthe (first time in Italy)	Weber

HALLOCK PIANO RECITAL.

MISS MARY HALLOCK, a young American pian of high promise, gave a recital in Mendelsso Hall last Thursday afternoon, before an audience th thoroughly enjoyed her playing. After her performan of the G minor Sonata of Schumann her hearers realiz that she was a young lady of uncommon gifts. Sin Schumann is both poetic and intellectual, and technica always difficult, few young pianists play his works in convincing manner. A certain Berlin professor was the habit of flying into a rage when students who play on trial for him selected something by Schumann. St dents playing from notes were shocked to see him get and fling the music across the room.

"When you are thirty-five and have had some expe ence then play Schumann," shouted the professor on o occasion to a young lady from Ohio.

Now Miss Hallock lacks probably fifteen years of t Berlin professor's age limit, and yet young as she is s plays Schumann with the true insight into that compose works. Her beautiful, full round tone, technical skill, add to a nature almost Oriental in its warmth and poetic fe vor, enabled the young pianist to present the sonata in way that could only delight the lovers of Schumann. A ter the sonata she again revealed her imaginative pow and finished technic in the playing of "The Skylark," Tschaikowsky. In the three part A minor Fugue, Bach, Miss Hallock disclosed still more serious unde standing of her art. With the Chopin pieces Miss H lock did not quite come up to expectations, but her sho comings may have been due to fatigue, for she is a you woman of fragile physique and dainty femininity in a pearance. She played two Etudes, Nos. 2 and 7 in op. better than she did the Nocturne and the Polonais Physically she did not quite cope with the Liszt Rha sody. However, it's a pleasure to hear once in a while pianist who does not pound the piano in the Liszt she pieces. The audience paid Miss Hallock a rare comp ment, for nobody left the hall until the recital was over.

In music, as in other things, enough is as good as feast. Miss Hallock's program was not much over hour long, and for this as well as for the artistic succe of the afternoon she is to be congratulated.

Miss Hallock resides in Philadelphia. She was born far away Syria and educated in Europe. In social life s is a delightful young woman to meet, showing as s does the ease and grace of her cosmopolitan training.

STELLA NEWMARK'S RECITAL.

MISS STELLA NEWMARK, a young New Yo girl, who has studied the past three years at t Stern Conservatory in Berlin, gave a recital in the Ast Gallery of the Waldorf-Astoria last Tuesday (Novemb 12) afternoon. A large and friendly audience applaud the young pianist. Many a veteran performer wou shrink at the program presented by Miss Newmark. Son of the most difficult works by Bach, Chopin, Schuma and Liszt were played by the young woman in the usu chronological order. A well developed technic, a war firm tone and sincerity mark Miss Newmark's perfor ances. Her reading of the Schumann Intermezzi w rather immature, but that is expected of all youthful pia ists who attempt to play Schumann before they unde stand him. With Chopin Miss Newmark did better, a with Liszt better still. Doubless many here will rec the childhood appearances of Miss Newmark. The tale which she displayed in her early 'teens seems to have be wisely directed. Miss Newmark is the daughter of t Rev. H. Newmark, of The Temple, at Fifth avenue a 125th street.

HAZARD MUSICAL AT HOMES.—Mrs. Elizabeth Haza the soprano, is now located in her handsome apartm in Ardsley Hall, Ninety-second street and Central Pa West. During the season she will give a series of musi "at homes," which socially as well as musically promise be interesting. Mrs. Hazard has added a number of n songs by American composers to her repertory. F singers are more encouraging than this charming artist the native song writers. From all parts of the coun she receives songs by ambitious composers who ha heard about her success as an interpreter of ballads.

HAARLEM PHILHARMONIC MUSICALE.

THE Haarlem Philharmonic Society inaugurated its eleventh season last Thursday morning with a musicale in the Astor Gallery of the Waldorf-Astoria. Next the orchestra, the ladies could not have done a better ing than give a morning concert with singers like Evan illiams, Gwilym Miles and Mrs. Morris Black. These ree artists appeared in an interesting program, with the sistance of Emil Levy at the piano.

Mr. Williams is in good condition this season. The very quality of his tenor charms all. Mr. Miles' resant baritone is always a pleasure to hear. Mrs. Black's ntralto has broadened, and moreover she sings now th real warmth. Although all vocal, there was no onotony in this program:

t, Passage Bird's Farewell.....Hildach
Messrs. Evan Williams and Gwilym Miles.
gs .....L. Damrosch
Von dem Rosenbusch.
Lenzes Lust.
Frühlingslied.
Mrs. Morris Black.
g cycle, Summertime.....Roland
Evan Williams.
et, Night Hymn at Sea.....Goring-Thomas
Mrs. Morris Black and Mr. Miles.
gs—
No Tidings Came from Thee.....Tschaikowsky
Pilgrim's Song.....Tschaikowsky
Serenade .....Tschaikowsky Gwilym Miles.
gs—
Ariette .....Vidal
Amour .....Tosti
Gruss .....Hadley
The Butterfly Is in Love With the Rose.....Hadley
Mrs. Morris Black.
le, Eliland.....Von Fielitz
Evan Williams.
o, from Maritana.....Wallace
Turn On, Old Time, Thine Hour Glass.
Mrs. Black, Evan Williams and Mr. Miles.

The song cycle, "Summertime," by Landon Roland, is four parts, "Daybreak," "Morning," "Evening" and light." Its style is lyric, and the music is rather commonplace, but its ordinary character was redeemed by the r beautiful singing of Mr. Williams. The other song le sung by Mr. Williams, "Eliland," is familiar to New rkers. Tenors, however, have not sung here as often bassos. In the duets and trio the voices of the singers nded well together. This was especially so of Messrs. illiams and Miles, who have frequently sung together public concerts.

The three songs by Leopold Damrosch sung by Mrs. ack are well worthy the attention of singers, for they greatly superior to many modern compositions which tain artists will persist in singing. The little songs by dley, sung in the second half of the musicale by Mrs. ick, are pleasingly written. Mendelssohn has a setting the little poem "Gruss," by Heine, but Mr. Hadley's re does not suffer by contrast. Mrs. Black sang these gs, as well as those by Vidal and Tosti, in a way that erved the hearty recall which the audience gave her.

n the three Tschaikowsky songs Mr. Miles showed that is growing artistically. He sang the "Serenade," ich is the popular one "Don Juan," with the ring of e manliness. Both Messrs. Williams were rapturously plauded. Mr. Levy at the piano proved his value as an ompanist. While composed almost entirely of women, audience was very demonstrative.

The society will give its next musicale December 12, d three more concerts after the new year. The officers the society are: Mrs. Thomas H. Newman, chairman of board of directors; Mrs. Isaac Mills, treasurer; Mrs. tt D. Cannon, recording secretary, and Mrs. W. nsselaer Lloyd, corresponding secretary. Mrs. Orison Smith is chairman of the music committee, and those serving with her on that committee are Mrs. Frank Littlefield, Mrs. Arthur A. Stilwell, Mrs. John Boulton Simpson and Mrs. C. Edgar Anderson.

WALKER SEVERN MUSICALE.

THE first musicale of the Walker-Severn School of Music was given Monday evening, November 11, in the studio of Francis Walker, in the Van Dyck, Eighth avenue and Fifty-sixth street. The individual success of these artists is generally known in musical circles. Combined, the skill and experience promise to produce fine results. Mr. Walker is a baritone singer and teacher, and both in his singing and teaching he shows the breadth and culture that come of wide reading, travel and association with the best society.

Mr. and Mrs. Edmund Severn, who came to New York from New England several years ago, are something more than "good musicians." Mr. Severn is a violinist with remarkable ability as a teacher. As a composer, he is growing all the time and but for a nature that is rarely sensitive and refined he would be better known here. Mrs. Severn is a kind of musical magician. She is a rare ensemble pianist, a good solo pianist, a fine accompanist, and as a teacher both of voice and piano she has been most successful. Several of her pupils are singing in New York companies to-day. In Springfield, Mass., where she and Mr. Severn teach a few days each week, she stands pre-eminent as a piano teacher, and also as a vocal teacher. With Arthur Severn, the 'cellist, Mr. and Mrs. Severn compose the Severn Trio.

The musicale in Mr. Walker's studio was opened with two movements of Edward Schuett's Suite for Piano and Violin, played by Mr. and Mrs. Severn with that musicianship which delights the cultivated musician. As piano solos Mrs. Severn played extremely well the Fantaisie Impromptu and "Les Bacchantes," a composition by her husband. Mr. Severn as violin solos played two of his own compositions—a love song and a mazurka. The soprano, Charlotte Walker, was prevented by illness from singing, so her place was taken by Mrs. Catherine Welch, who contributed a group of songs, accompanied by Mrs. Guy Edwords. Mr. Walker, who was in good voice, sang "Im Walde," by Mierch, and "Germanensang," by Lassen.

Last Tuesday afternoon (November 12) Mr. and Mrs. Severn and Mr. Walker inaugurated their "at homes." Hereafter their friends will find them in from 4 to 7 p. m. Tuesdays during the season.

BERESFORD ENGAGEMENTS.—Arthur Beresford, the noted Boston basso, is engaged for three performances of "The Messiah," Albany, N. Y., Oratorio Society, December 18; Whitingsville Choral Club, December 27; Nashua, N. H., Singing Society, December 23; for the Lowell Orchestral Club November 17, and for the Haverhill Oratorio Society December 13, in "The Creation." Mr. Beresford is one of the few Boston artists whose services are in demand all over the country, and this season proves no exception to the rule. The artistic sketch which has accompanied his circulars has proved quite a novelty, and many requests for copies are received in each mail.

ANOTHER OGDEN CRANE PUPIL.—Another successful pupil of Madame Ogden Crane is Marie Cleveland, who has joined Martin's company in the play, "Polly and I." She is a comedienne, and the company opens in Stamford, Conn.

BURMEISTER TO PLAY IN FITCHBURG.—Richard Burmeister, the pianist, will give a recital in Fitchburg, Mass., on Tuesday evening, November 26.

CARL ORGAN RECITAL.

SEVERAL hundred people were turned away from the "Old First" Presbyterian Church last Tuesday (November 12) evening, it being the first of the season's organ recitals by Mr. Carl, the organist and choirmaster of the church. The plan of issuing no cards of admission to these recitals is a comfortable one in some respects, but it also has its disadvantages. By 8 o'clock every seat in the church is occupied, and by 8:15, the hour of beginning the concert, the standing room is crowded, and therefore even those who arrive at the church on time cannot get into the church. After all it might be better to distribute tickets for the seating capacity of the church. The music at the "Old First" Church is now a feature in the musical life of the metropolis, and if the interest continues to grow in the future as it has in the past Mr. Carl and the trustees will have a problem upon their hands. Many other organ recitals, although "free" to the public, hardly attract a corporal's guard, but an army turns out to hear Mr. Carl, and grandly does he play the organ. The assisting singers last Tuesday evening were Miss Kathrin Hilke and Francis Rogers. Mr. Carl played two novelties, and the program throughout was one calculated to win applause, but happily it is forbidden in the sacred edifice. We say happily, because applause at most concerts amounts to nothing more than empty noise.

The organ and vocal numbers of the evening were:

Organ Sonata in C minor, No. 5.....Guilmant
Aria, Hear Ye, Israel (Elijah).....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Miss Kathrin Hilke.
Andante Pastorale (new).....Richmond
Toccata in E minor.....Callaerts
Vocal, Gloria.....Buzzi-Peccia
Francis Rogers.
Gavotte in F major.....Archer
Te Deum Laudamus, for organ.....Baille
Vocal, Elsa's Dream (Lohengrin).....Wagner
Miss Kathrin Hilke.
Siciliano .....Bach
Etude Symphonique.....Bossi
Recitative, Bring Forth the Best Robe (Prodigal Son).....Sullivan
Aria, For This My Son (Prodigal Son).....Sullivan
Francis Rogers.
The King's Coronation March (new, first time).....Duncan
(Composed in honor of the coronation of King Edward VII.)

Miss Hilke, one of our best church choir singers, was in good voice, and sang particularly well the Mendelssohn aria. Mr. Rogers' sympathetic baritone seemed highly appropriate for the occasion.

The Andante Pastorale, one of the new works played by Mr. Carl, is a graceful and tender composition that promises to become familiar after several hearings. Unfortunately, another concert called the writer away before the closing number, the new march written for King Edward's coronation. Very likely Mr. Carl will put it in one of his other programs.

At this late day it is hardly necessary to allude to Mr. Carl's mechanical manipulation of his fine instrument, for he has stops and pedals under perfect control. In his playing, however, Mr. Carl unfolds the mental and spiritual sides of the compositions as few other organists do, and that is the secret of his hold upon the musical public here and in other cities.

The second recital was given yesterday afternoon (Tuesday). The assisting artist was Charles Schuetze, harpist. The remaining recitals announced are for Tuesday evenings, November 26 and December 3.

GREGORY HAST IN PHILADELPHIA.—Gregory Hast, the eminent English tenor, will give a recital in Witherspoon Hall, Philadelphia, Wednesday evening, November 20, in the series of the Philadelphia Concert Course, managed by C. Victor Dealy. Mr. Hast will have the assistance of Louisa May Hopkins, pianist, and William Silano Thunder, accompanist.

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN.

MONDAY, Tuesday and Wednesday of last week were crowded days for the reviewer. The vibrations between Manhattan and Brooklyn would make crazy zigzag lines if drawn upon paper. But much of the music heard was worthy of the effort.

The music in Brooklyn began Monday evening at Wissner Hall, where the newly organized Venth-Kronold String Quartet gave the first in a series of four concerts. The program included an unfamiliar but very interesting quartet by Godard, the Mendelssohn Quartet in E flat major, Tschaikowsky's Andante Cantabile and piano solos played by Vahram Sevadjran. The hall was crowded and probably two-thirds of the people present were either musicians or students of music. Thus it may be understood that the new organization played before a sympathetic audience. The leader of the quartet, Carl Venth, is a violinist and composer of reputation. Although yet on the sunny side of forty he has played in public over twenty-five years, he having made his début when about eleven years old. Hans Kronold, the 'cellist of the quartet, is a well-known solo and concert performer. The second violin and viola are played by capable orchestral performers—Charles Moerenhout and Philip Herford. With such strong material, it seems unnecessary to write at length about the playing. The tone was always beautiful, and after these men have played together longer the ensemble will be better.

The Godard Quartet is one of a series written by the French composer. Why such excellent music should be laid upon the shelf while so many tiresome compositions are introduced at chamber music concerts is another one of those contradictions which no one wants to think about. The Tschaikowsky Andante Cantabile, written originally for the organ, makes an agreeable work for the string quartet. Mr. Venth played it with rare feeling and lovely tone.

Alas! the pianist of the evening broke in upon the quiet of a chamber music concert. His playing did not warrant the commotion he created. His hair, like that of a defeated football player, almost completely hid his face. This and other eccentricities startled the audience. Everybody in the rear of the hall got up to get a better view of the pianist. Naturally, with a personality so startling, the playing of the pianist became a secondary matter. His solos were the Tschaikowsky Berceuse, a Fantaisie by Ghorghanoff and two of his own compositions.

At the next concert Messrs. Venth and Kronold will have the assistance of that accomplished pianist Mme. Berta Grosse-Thomason. The date is Tuesday evening, December 10.

After hearing half of the concert at Wissner Hall, the reviewer hurried to the Troetschel organ recital at the German Evangelical Lutheran Church, on Schermerhorn street. It was the 103d organ concert which Hugo Troetschel has given in that church. The assisting soloists were Miss Frieda Stender, soprano, and Carl Grienauer, 'cellist. When the reviewer arrived at the church Mr. Troetschel was playing "Souvenir de Lucerne," by F. J. Breitenbach. The work is highly descriptive, a kind of fantaisie in which both quiet and tempestuous nature in the Alps are depicted. The "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," in marked contrast, was played next, and then Miss Stender sang "A Dream of Paradise," by Hamilton Gray. This young woman is making her way, and moreover deserves all the encouragement she is receiving. Her voice is rich and sympathetic, and as she sings with an excellent method it is a pleasure to hear her. In the early part of the recital Miss Stender sang "Lamb of God," by Jacoby. The other organ numbers played by Mr. Troetschel were the Sonata Pascale, by Lemmens; the Bach Prelude and Fugue in A minor, and the Scherzo from Widor's Fourth Symphony. As an organist and teacher Mr. Troetschel stands pre-eminent in Brooklyn. Many music lovers outside of the German Lutherans are attracted to his recitals.

Tuesday evening the Tonkünstlers held their musical meeting at the Argyle on Pierrepont street, and, as is the rule with these musicians, the program continued novelties. Two works by Ludwig Thuille, the Munich composer, were played. The first was the Sonata for violin and piano in D minor. While not an absolute novelty, it is unfamiliar here. The other Thuille composition, a quintet for piano and string quartet, was played for the first time in this country, and it will probably never be better played. The artists were Alexander Rihm, piano; Max Bendix, first violin; Ernst H. Bauer, second violin; Jacob Altschüler, viola, and Leo Schulz, cello. This quintet should become popular, for it abounds in themes and situations that make some impression on the first hearing. The Sonata for violin and piano was played at the opening of the evening by Messrs. Marum and Rihm. Between the instrumental pieces Miss Frieda Stender sang songs by Von Fielitz, Chaminade and Louis V. Saar, Mr. Saar playing the piano accompaniments. The Saar songs were "Harfen Mädschen Lied" and "Ach, wer doch das Konnte," both of them written in that delightfully spontaneous vein for which Mr. Saar's vocal music is known. Miss Stender sang sympathetically, and was compelled to add an extra song, a compliment to her, for encores do not prevail at the Tonkünstler meetings.

Whitney Tew, the American-English basso, who made his début in Manhattan on Monday afternoon, made his first appearance before the Brooklyn Institute on Wednesday evening. The recital was given at Association Hall, Miss Anna E. Otten, the violinist, appearing jointly with Mr. Tew. As an extended criticism of Mr. Tew's Manhattan recital is published elsewhere in this number of THE MUSICAL COURIER, it seems but necessary here to add that Mr. Tew was in good voice and particularly toward the end of the evening astonished his hearers with his fine singing.

A young man of Mr. Tew's superior intelligence will not object if his admirers do not like his selections. The young basso gave almost the same program through which he introduced himself to his Manhattan audience on Monday afternoon. What was said in the other criticism about these songs can but be repeated here. Some of them were unfortunate. This writer knows that with a different program Mr. Tew would have captured New Yorkers as he has Londoners. The standards of taste are different and singers may be obliged to consider this. The Liza Lehmann twaddle and the foolishly sentimental songs of Maude Valerie White and other ambitious "lady" composers of the Lehmann-White order will not help the greatest singer to make his way.

Miss Otten, the young violinist, returned recently to New York with high laurels won at the New England festivals. Her playing last Wednesday night proved that the critics have not overpraised her. Her tone is bigger now and she has broadened since she was heard by this public. Her selections in Brooklyn were the Bazzini Elegy in G minor; Papillon in B minor, by Hubay; a Madrigal in D major, by Simonetti; "The Bee," Schubert; "Zapateado," a Spanish dance by Sarasa and a Scherzo in G minor by Wieniawski. Miss Ott was accompanied at the piano by her accomplished sist Miss Clara Otten. The ever faithful Isidore Lucksto played for Mr. Tew.

The following extracts are from the criticism in t Brooklyn Eagle of November 14:

MR. TEW.

Mr. Tew's voice at first blush, on the opening number, "mio cor," by Händel, seemed a trifle hard and unwieldy, but t or the impression of it soon wore away with succeeding numb and it was found that Mr. Tew has, in his voice, an instrument very wide range of power or of sweetness at will in any regis chosen, and that his repertory is a wide one. * * *

On Mr. Tew rested much of the labor of the evening, and if had not proven himself to be a fine interpreter of musical comp tions he would have established the fact that he has a wonde memory. He sang the Italian "Qui s'degno," by Mozart, fr "The Magic Flute," and in the opposite mood Bach's "Hat n nicht mit Seinen Kindern." Then followed songs by Tschaik sky, Saint-Saëns, Brahms and Schumann, also "Myself Wl Young," by Liza Lehmann; two Irish songs, "Little Mary C sidy" and "You'd Better Ask Me," and a rousing "Ode to Bacchu by Chaminade, followed by a little gem, "Let Us Forget," that outside of the program. Two songs, "O Captain, My Captain!" "Oh, to Be Light of Heart Once More," were omitted, possibly cause of the length of the entertainment. These artists should heard in Brooklyn again with pleasure and profit to the hearers.

MISS OTTEN.

Though Miss Otten played several other pieces last evening, sh ing her graceful agility in fingering and stopping notes, her tech that is more finished and broader at her appearances in Brook last season, her perfect command of the instrument, there was no ing that went closer to the hearts of her audience than the ele it was not given in a dolorous way, but in philosophical strain with a breadth and generalization that were charming. Some ot pieces showed Miss Otten's dexterity and her perfect managem of harmonies. Such were "Butterfly," by Hubay, and "The Be by Schubert, as well as a Spanish dance by Sarasate. Her m ambitious number was a scherzo by Wieniawski, op. 16, G min It required and received vigor and decision as much as lay in player's power. A madrigal in D major, by Simonetti, was play by Miss Otten with exquisite delicacy and drew out long applaus

Wednesday evening the piano pupils of Alexander Ril and the violin pupils of Henry Schradieck gave a joi recital at Wissner Hall before an audience that taxed t capacity of the auditorium. The opening number of t program, Schubert's Sonata for Violin and Piano in major, was played by two pupils, of twelve years old eac Masters Sidney Bender and Saul Wolsky. Both childr have exceptional talent, and their playing reflected cred ably upon their respective teachers. Miss Louise Ma ning played as a piano solo the first movement from the minor Concerto of Hummel. The orchestral accompa iment at the second piano was played by Mr. Rih Master Wolsky, the violin soloist of the recital, play brilliantly the Vieuxtemps Ballade and Polonaise. M Schradieck, the talented wife of Wolsky's teacher, accor panied for the boy at the piano. Miss Maude E. Davi son played two piano solos, "To the Spring," by Grie and an "Impromptu," by H. Hermann. An interestir work was played as the closing number, Berlioz's "Kir Lear" overture, arranged for two pianos (four perforr ers), by Mr. Rihm. The playing was from the manuscrip and the players were Miss Manning, Miss Augusta Harl Miss Minnie Müller and Mr. Rihm.

Dorothy Harvey in Pittsburg.

MRS. DOROTHY HARVEY, the soprano, sang November 7 and 9 with the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra in Pittsburg. Appended are the criticisms about her from the Pittsburg papers:

The soloist of the evening was Mrs. Dorothy Harvey. She sang the aria "Chere Nuit," by Bacheler; "Mignon's Lied," by Liszt, and "Ständchen," by Strauss, with glorious vocal color, which at times was almost electrifying. She was a decided success, and scored a triumph.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Mme. Dorothy Harvey, the soloist with the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra, was a great delight in every way to the great crowd of Pittsburg's élite last night. The magnificent appearance of this charming woman at once created a vast impression, but it would be nothing were she not equipped with a delightfully luscious voice. Her radiant beauty and graceful ease completely won her an instantaneous triumph, while with the admirable accompaniment of the orchestra she was a veritable pleasure. Her last number, "Mignon's Lied," Liszt, and "Ständchen," by Strauss, were rendered faultlessly.—Pittsburg Times.

Mrs. Dorothy Harvey, who came next, was a decided success. She sang last season with the orchestra, but was unknown here. Her first number, with orchestral accompaniment, "Chere Nuit," by Bachelet, brought her a storm of applause, to which she responded, after repeated recalls, with Allitsen's "Since We Parted." Her second number, "Mignon's Lied," by Liszt, and "Ständchen," by Strauss, were artistically and delightfully rendered. Mrs. Harvey is a radiantly beautiful woman, fascinating and charming, with a graceful ease and naturally winning manner that completely win her audience.—Pittsburg Post.

A glorious voice, full of soulful feeling, of perfect beauty of face and form, of calm repose, of fascinating manner, the young soloist of last night's concert, Mrs. Dorothy Harvey, scored a great and triumphant success. Her numbers both were sung in such a manner that after repeated recalls she gracefully responded with encores. The universal opinion was that Mrs. Harvey was without doubt the most beautiful woman seen on any stage in Pittsburg in years, and one of the most beautifully gowned.—Pittsburg Bulletin.

Mrs. Harvey sings in New York, at Carnegie Hall orchestral concert, December 8; at the Waldorf-Astoria, with the Musurgia Society, December 3; in Baltimore, "The Messiah"; in Newark, N. J., with Arion Society; in Grand Rapids, with Schubert Club; Toronto, Canada; Pittsburg, Pa.; Philadelphia, Buffalo and other cities.

A New Society.

TOWNSEND H. FELLOWS, the vocal instructor and manager, has just sucessfully launched a new enterprise. The Thursday Evening Oratorio Society, for the study of oratorio in its entirety and sight singing, is now holding most successful and interesting meetings at the Church of the Incarnation, every Thursday evening at 7:45, with Warren R. Hedden, Mus. Bac., as conductor. A number have taken advantage of this opportunity of studying sight singing and the practical application in the singing of oratorio choruses. The first part of the evening is devoted to sight singing, blackboard exercises, &c., and the latter part to the singing of the choruses and the study of the solos. Singers may join any Thursday evening at 8 o'clock at the above church; entrance, 25 East Thirty-fifth street.

NORDICA'S FIRST TRIUMPH.

MME. LILLIAN NORDICA, her manager, Loudon G. Charlton; her accompanist, E. Romayne Simmons, and two sisters, Mrs. Baldwin, of Boston, and Mrs. Walker, of New York, make up the party who are journeying across the continent in a private car for the song recital tour of eighty to 100 concerts with which Madame Nordica is to fill her season in America this year. She announces positively that she will not appear in a single operatic performance while on this side of the water, and indeed it would be impossible for her to do so as the entire season is booked solid for recitals. The private car is named "Brünnhilde" in honor of the role in which Madame Nordica has made some of her most distinguished triumphs on both continents and which she expects to repeat abroad next summer.

The car has been especially and luxuriously fitted and furnished, so that Madame Nordica may experience as few discomforts as possible in her long journey that will cover four or five months and many thousand miles. "A real honest brass bed" takes the place of the ordinary berth or couch in the room devoted to Madame Nordica's own use and a bath opens out of it. There are several other sleeping and dressing compartments, and aside from these the car is divided into a commodious observation section, in which are the piano, library and writing conveniences and dining room and kitchen and necessary paraphernalia. Every possible means to lend enjoyment to the trip has been provided and Madame Nordica left New York November 13 with enthusiastic anticipations for her season of song recitals, when she will be relieved from all exactions of operatic performances even though she provides the whole program for each appearance.

Madame Nordica opened her tour Thursday night, November 14, at Scranton, Pa. In spite of a snow storm and a car strike, an audience of 6,000 people greeted her and gave evidence of their appreciation throughout the evening, with the wildest demonstrations of enthusiasm.

Madame Nordica is in superb voice and radiant health. Her gowns, prepared espccially for this tour, are sumptuous in material and made by Worth, in Paris, after his best and latest designs. One, a cloth of gold, is embellished with lace that is valued by experts at 60,000 francs; another, of grass green velvet, is unadorned except for an exquisite neck garniture of rare old Irish point lace. Her jewels, which include a tiara and a collar, are gorgeous in their brilliancy, with such external adjuncts to her own natural advantages of refined beauty, regal bearing, and in conjunction with her peerless voice and art, the season promises to be a long series of brilliant triumphs and ovations.

EMIL HOFMANN.—Emil Hofmann, the eminent young baritone, who made so many notable successes in America last season, has just returned from a summer in Germany, where he made some important appearances. In Leipsic, the evening previous to his departure for this country, Mr. Hofmann gave a recital, when he again scored a triumph with a program made up of songs by Schubert, Schumann, Hugo Wolf, Brahms, Grieg, Arthur Nevin and Beethoven. Mr. Hofmann goes West after a recital in Newark to fill his early fall dates, after which he will return to New York to meet other engagements made for him by his manager, Loudon G. Charlton.

ROBERT C. EASTON.—Robert C. Easton, a tenor, and pupil of Mrs. Edmund Severn for the past two years, has made a hit with his singing in the "Bonnie Brier Bush." There are not many singers in this country who can sing Scotch songs as Mr. Easton sings them.

Amy Murray in Brooklyn.—Miss Amy Murray, the ottish recital singer, appeared with her usual success at e recent Brooklyn recital. The following paragraph from a report in the Brooklyn Eagle of October 31:

Between five and six hundred people gathered in the church and pressed their appreciation of Miss Murray's efforts frequently and rmly. Miss Murray told of the music of Scotland, her poets and incidents out of which the songs grew, and sang the songs ich she described in a beautifully sweet voice. Her closing num-
, "Caller Herrin'," was rendered in the costume of the Newven fishwife, Miss Murray walking through the aisles of the urch with the creel upon her back during the singing of the veral verses. This so enthused her audience that all joined with ssed and clasped hands in singing "Auld Lang Syne."

Miss Murray has a number of important engagements oked for the month of January. On January 23 she ll give "An Afternoon of Scottish Song" before the icago Fortnightly Club, of which Mrs. Potter Palmer president. Four days later, on January 27, Miss Mur-y will give a similar program before the Chicago Cul-re Club. Then Miss Murray will give a recital under cial auspices at the home of Mrs. Randolph Matz, 2300 lumet avenue. From Illinois Miss Murray will go to hio, and her first engagement in that State will be on Gentlemen's Night" of the Women's Literary Club of ayton. Other dates will call Miss Murray to Cleveland, d then she will go to Michigan, later to Indiana, and ck again to Illinois.

Hay-Thompson Songs.—The Hay-Thompson songs are ntinually growing in popularity. Here is a letter, which ll be of interest to singers and teachers:

200 West Fifty-seventh Street,
New York, April 24, 1901.

My Dear Mrs. Thompson—Thank you ever so much for your ngs, which are very lovely, but very sad. The words of Miss y's are lovely and your setting just suits them. I shall be glad sing them here. Yours sincerely, Heinrich Meyn.

Musicians who cannot obtain these songs of their music aler should send to Mrs. Berenice Thompson, care of ROME.

Rome, November 3, 1901.

THE real musical season in Rome finally opened on November 1 with the first of a series of orchestral concerts by the Orchestra Massima Romana, the first two concerts under the direction of Luigi Mancinelli, who received a most affectionate and enthusiastic ovation at his appearance at the head of the orchestra. Mancinelli for over twenty years had left Rome to gain laurels the world over, as we all know, and now on his reappearance he with delicate thought chose for the program of the first concert the very same numbers he conducted years and years ago right here in Rome and in this very same theatre on the night of its inauguration.

Eighth Symphony	Beethoven
Barcarola, Cleopatra	Mancinelli
Messalina, Overture	Mancinelli
Gavotte	Sgambati
Prelude, Tristan	Wagner
Second Rhapsody	Liszt

The interpretation of the Eighth Symphony was bright with coloring and the expression natural; no exaggeration of any kind, as some operatic conductors are wont to assume when conducting classical works; no, the pure classical line was vigorously adhered to, thus giving relief to the beautiful form and structure. The second tempo was a real miniature of fine art, and had to be repeated amid the most enthusiastic applause.

His own two numbers were highly appreciated for their originality, and they seemed to gain new vigor under his baton. Sgambati's Gavotte, instrumentation by Mancinelli, was also repeated. It is one of Sgambati's best numbers, but I cannot help thinking, and I know that everyone is of the same opinion, that the piece was greatly enhanced by Mancinelli's instrumentation, for everyone still remembers the awful Mass—or rather mess—he composed for the anniversary of poor Umberto's death. Surely his great royalistic feelings ought to have inspired him better! The Prelude to "Tristan" was also repeated; the Crescendo—that great Crescendo—was given with such perfection, with such passion that an encore was irresistible. After the last number, the Second Liszt Rhapsody, the public gave Mancinelli such an ovation as seldom anyone receives, for it was not only admiration for the great conductor, but a demonstration of affection and a desire for him to prolong his stay in Rome. Next Friday, November 9, he directs the second concert, and then he leaves for other shores.

At the Adriano the operatic season has languished until the appearance—at last, one might well say—of Mascagni's "Ratcliffe," with himself as conductor, and he scored a great success with this youthful opera. Opera? No; it cannot be called an opera; the subject itself is not theatrical, and it might be called, as some critics very justly put it, "Comments musical—or musical comments—upon a tragedy." The music is certainly far superior to anything that he has written in these latter years. Upon hearing it one is really inclined to think—nay, one feels sure—that Mascagni will still some day give the public the longed for "chef d'œuvre" he can produce if he does not allow his adulators and all the parasites around him to interfere in his projects, in his thoughts, in his music—in fact, in everything.

Heine's poem, all through hendecasyllabic, was a difficult thing to put to music, and Mascagni mastered it wonderfully. He really accomplished a "tour de force," more especially when one considers that it was written in his youth, but probably that is just the reason of its vigor, its passion, its sentiment; and if even sometimes the orchestra seems too boisterous, overladen, they are defects of this same overflowing youth and are quite pardonable. The public was enthused and surprised, and called the master before the curtain twenty-four times, never tiring in showing him how happy they were to find in Mascagni the real Mascagni, brimful of talent, well-nigh to genius, not the Mascagni of those ill-fated, and deservedly so, "Le Maschere" of last year. One would ask why this opera is given so seldom. The reason is simple. Very few tenors can master the part. It is exceedingly heavy, and the "tessitura" is very trying. The tenor Signorini, however, mastered the part well and sang beautifully, fully deserving the approbation of master and public. His voice is a fine, full tenor, which he knows how to use, something one seldom finds among tenors nowadays.

Virginia Guerrini is an exceptionally fine mezzo-soprano. Her voice is powerful, easy, mellifluous and of a most sympathetic quality, and she uses it wonderfully well. Her dramatic accent is all that can be desired, and as an actress she can compare with any of the best actresses. Navarrini, a celebrated basso, magnificent as Tom; Pacini a superb Douglas, and the rest of the cast satisfactory. The chorus insignificant and the orchestra splendid under Mascagni's baton. Conclusion—A triumph for Mascagni and for the artists, it being a remarkable cast. The numbers that were repeated:

Act I. The prelude which interlaces itself with the song of the insane one. Applauded. The description of London, sung magnificently by the baritone Pacini. Repeated. Applause at McGregor's racconto. Mascagni and artists called three times.

Act II. Encored the Pater Noster. Beautifully sung by a little artist, for such is the little boy Nello Santini. The description of the thieves, sung by Navarrini, makes a great impression, and the rest of the act, sung by Signorini (Ratcliffe) and Navarrini (Tom), and which is of Verdian force, is greatly applauded. Three more curtain calls.

Act III. Great applause at Ratcliffe's apostrophe to the pistol; at duel and duet between Ratcliffe and Douglas (Pacini and Signorini)—encored the beautiful intermezzo and the act finishes grandly with Ratcliffe's monologue. Maestro and artists called seven times and to Mascagni a superb laurel wreath is offered by the manager.

Act IV. The introduction (orchestral), strings predominating with a light choral accompaniment, encore demanded but not accorded. Margherita's racconto (Guerrini) to Maria (Melani) raises the greatest enthusiasm and the last part had to be repeated. The love duet before the looking-glass is very much admired and the catastrophe of the drama augments the triumph of the opera. Four curtain calls, artists and maestro, but the public wished to see the maestro alone—a last call to give him a last and colossal ovation. The opera will be repeated often and thus its beauties more and more appreciated.

"Samson and Delilah" on the 5th follow "Ratcliffe," and with such a Delilah as Virginia Guerrini one can predict a success. It is the first production in Rome of Saint-Saëns' best opera. While preparing "Ratcliffe" the impresa gave some performances of "Barber of Seville," with the celebrated soprano, Luisa Tetrazzini. It seems to me that her voice is somewhat impaired—at any rate her success was not equal to that of last year.

Operetta companies have been flourishing at the Nazionale and the Quirino. The Teatro Valle has reopened its doors to Ermete Novelli's company in "La casa di Goldoni" and the Leigheb Comedy Company are doing well at the Costanzi. The opera season, I am told, will not open until Carnival.

Maestro Isabella Coccia, the singing teacher here in Rome, has resumed her lessons, after her long and serious illness. All her pupils on the day of her arrival tendered her the most affectionate ovation. She counts many beautiful voices, male as well as female, among her pupils, and some of them will be heard from this winter no doubt. Her method is most excellent, she knowing how to place the voice to give it most brilliancy and power, bringing it all forward. Such a thing as throaty emission is not heard at her school, and those who come to her with defects are corrected in a very short time, as her communicative powers are strong and agreeable.

I am told that the concert season will begin in December. Anything of importance I shall report and of "Samson and Delilah" more next time.

Rebecca Mackenzie.

MISS REBECCA MACKENZIE is having a very busy month. On November 5 she sang in Mrs. Stocker's lecture recital on "American Music" for the Board of Education, which will be repeated on the 21st inst; on the 7th she sang in Sommerville, N. J., the second time within seven months, in a concert given by the Second Reformed Church, together with Herbert Smock, Dr. Carl Dufft and Madame Ohrstrom-Renard; on the 15th she was soloist in a Scotch concert in Carnegie Lyceum, New York; on the 26th she appears with the Monday Musical Club, of Trenton, N. J.; on December 1 she sings in the Elks' memorial service at Pottsville, Pa., her third engagement in that city; on December 19, 20 and 29 she fills private engagements in this city and Brooklyn. Other engagements bring her dates well up into the spring.

The following press opinions refer to Miss MacKenzie's appearance with the Pittsfield Symphony Orchestra:

The vocalist of the evening was Miss Rebecca MacKenzie, of New York. She is undoubtedly the best soprano that has been heard here in Pittsfield in connection with the symphony concerts. Her voice is a full, rich, high soprano of great range, is remarkably sympathetic and beautiful throughout its entire range, and she sings most artistically. Her numbers were happily chosen, affording abundant opportunity to display the full powers of her magnificent voice. The selection from Gounod's "Mirella," replete with dramatic possibilities, was sung with a breadth and force that won enthusiastic applause from the audience. In the closing of this selection Miss MacKenzie reached F sharp, and the note was perfect. For an encore she sang a berceuse by Hahn. Miss MacKenzie has an attractive presence and all her selections were warmly encored.—Evening Journal, Pittsfield, Mass.

Miss MacKenzie came next in Gounod's aria "Mirella," and she was greeted with tumultuous applause. Her rendition of the solo was fully up to expectations, and she responded to a hearty encore. Later she appeared in two Scotch selections, and they were beautifully rendered, calling for encores.—Springfield Republican, Springfield, Mass.

Miss Rebecca MacKenzie was the soloist of the evening, and she is by far the best woman vocalist the Symphony Society has ever engaged.—The Berkshire Eagle, Pittsfield, Mass.

MARTHA HOFACKER.—This young artist, a representative of the Lankow method, appeared as Regina, the leading part, in the posthumous work, "Regina," by Lortzing, conducted by Richard Fried, given at the Strassburg Opera House. The Strassburg Neueste Nachrichten of November 2 writes of her as follows:

The leading singer, Martha Hofacker, was a charming surprise. All of this artist's endeavors are marked by great earnestness, and in whatever role she appears she is thoroughly artistic. Her vocal art is most surprisingly natural, and the youthful charm and freshness of her voice are always apparent. Her voice carries excellently, because she has learned how to place and produce beautiful tone. When the singing gains stronger dramatic accents, she is certain of a great career.

The Strassburger Post and the Elsassischer Volksbote speak in the same way, commenting most favorably on the beautiful voice and artistic singing, as well as on the dramatic abilities of this promising young American girl, who received her entire training right here in New York city.

WHITNEY TEW'S NEW YORK RECITAL.

THAT a wide gulf exists between the musical standards of London and New York was again proven in the program through which Whitney Tew introduced himself to a New York audience Mr. Tew is an American who has lived in London and received his musical training there. He is an artist with a real voice, a noble basso of great range. He is a young man of distinguished presence, and that inborn manliness and natural grace of manner which Bulwer said would do more for a man than family, wealth or genius. With so much in his favor to impress an audience it seems a pity that Mr. Tew was not better informed in regard to the character of the music he put into his programs for his American tour. However, this is a matter that can be corrected. Fortunately, Mr. Tew is to sing here again in oratorio, a style of music especially suited to his voice.

A large audience greeted Mr. Tew at his recital in Mendelssohn Hall last Monday afternoon (November 11), and the songs that merited it were liberally applauded. He sang extremely well the noble aria, "In Diesen Heiligen Hallen," from "The Magic Flute." He sang this in Italian, which is the custom in England, while in New York as a concert number it is usually sung in German. But that may be because the bassos who have sung it here are German or German-American. Mr. Tew sang in captivating style a number of little English songs, "You'd Better Ask Me," by Herman Löhr, and "Young Richard," by Lucy E. Bradwood and J. A. Fuller Maitland. In the latter, which is one of a group of English country songs, he gave the dialect like a Briton of the soil. If Mr. Tew has not learned to sing by the best vocal method his English training has done some things for him that some other singers might emulate to their advantage. Whether singing in German, French, Italian, English or in the Cockney dialect, Mr. Tew's enunciation is delightfully distinct.

The weak part of his recital may be laid at the door of the women composers, and the most tiresome of all was the artificial and lachrymal Liza Lehmann. In "Jane Eyre" the gifted Charlotte Brontë makes one of her characters say that if they got their deserts half of the women in England who play the piano would "have their fingers chopped off." If playing the piano badly can excite humanity to cruelty what penalty can be fixed for women composers who inflict upon their country such empty drivel as the score for "In Memoriam"? That selections from Tennyson's great poem should be butchered for such a purpose seems almost sacrilegious. Three times now this writer has been compelled to hear this awful thing, and each time it appears more stupid and ridiculous. Mr. Tew showed that he is blessed with the faculty of learning, for no ordinary mind could master a score that has neither beginning, ending nor middle place. Another Liza Lehmann number appeared upon Mr. Tew's program—"Myself When Young," from "In a Persian Garden" cycle. There were four other women composers whom the singer gallantly included in his list, and the best by far was Cécile Chaminade, one of the few women who can compose music worth playing and singing.

Dorothy Hollins, an unknown composer on this side of the water, was represented in Mr. Tew's program by a setting to "The Mist," words translated from Lenau by the composer. "Let Us Forget," a song by Maude Valerie White, is rather too sentimental for a public concert, although Mr. Tew sang it so well that his audience compelled him to repeat it. Two settings of Walt Whitman's poems, "Ethiopia Saluting the Colors" and "O, Captain! My Captain!" by Charles Wood, were interesting, but this was because the words and not the music appealed to the listeners. "O, Captain, My Captain!" was written on t assassination of President Lincoln.

The best music of the afternoon was heard in the ea part of the concert. The numbers were "Ah, Mio Caro from "Alcina," one of Händel's Italian operas; "H Man Nicht Mit Seinen Kindern," from Bach's "Coff Cantata"; the aria from "The Magic Flute," referred above; "The Jousting of King John," by Saint-Saëns; Brahms "Ständchen," and "Der Knabe Mit Dem Wu derhorn," by Schumann.

Mr. Tew closed his recital with Chaminade's "Ode Bacchus." Isidore Luckstone accompanied with his u failing sympathy and care, and apparently no one appr ciated this more than Mr. Tew.

"Elijah" in Dramatic Form.

FROM the Townsend H. Fellows Choir Exchange a Musical Bureau many singers, some of whose nam have been mentioned in these columns, have been plac in first-class positions this fall. There will be the usu big demand for extra singers for the Christmas music the various city churches. Last year nearly every sing on his books was engaged for that season, and this ye a number of prominent organists are making elabora preparations for the festival season, and intend augme ing their choirs by double quartets, &c.

He has also had a number of inquiries from vario parts of the country, for particulars of the production dramatic form of the oratorio of "Elijah," of which pr duction he is manager, and which was so successful given at New Haven a few weeks ago. Frank Lea Sho one of Charles Frohman's stage managers, directed t staging of this production, and received the unqualifi approbation of the critics for his splendid work.

Clio Club Musicale.

THE Clio Club, 74 West 126th street, gave a music program of unusual excellence at its meeting November 11. The solosists were Mme. Ludovic Brei ner, violin; Mrs. Katherine S. Bonn, soprano; Miss Sa Evans, contralto, with Eugene Bernstein as accompanis Madame Breitner charmed her audience with her artist playing of Wieniawski's "Legende," Massenet's "Thais and the "Movement Perpetual." by Paganini.

Mrs. Katherine S. Bonn, of Waterbury, Conn., sar "Demain," by Maud V. White, and Schumann's "Wi mung," showing a brilliant soprano voice and easy ar graceful method. Miss Sara Evans, the contralto of S Paul's M. E. Church, Eighty-sixth street and West En avenue, has a voice of great power and beauty. She sar Mager's "Minor Chord" and Clayton Johns' "I Love ar the World Is Mine" in excellent manner. Both singe are pupils of Madame von Klenner, and both show t mastery of method, the finish and style which are t marks of the pupils from that studio.

LAURA CRAWFORD.—Mrs. Laura Crawford, the wel known solo organist and accompanist, has entered upo another busy season. Her beautiful studios at 9 We Ninety-first street are admirably situated for teachin and her pupils come to her from all over the country.

On November 7 Mrs. Crawford was the accompani for the Luther League Choral Union concert, given at t 125th street Y. M. C. A., and on November 8 she w the organist for the Luther League Convention of Ne York.

Her selections, which she played in her usual artist and finished manner, were Offertoire de St. Cecile, B tiste; Andante Cantabile, Charles Marie Widor, ar Marche Triomphale, Joseph Callaerts.

Business Versus Art.

THE idea that there is something antagonistic between business and art is one which is being constantly reiterated. Numerous articles are ten upon the subject and the question is always being d: "How can business and art be reconciled?" as if e were anything at all to reconcile between the two.

ask the question now: "What is there to reconcile veen art and business?" There can be no successful vithout business. Art is dependent upon business for ery support and self-preservation. The greatest comcial centres are the greatest art centres, for there is re the money is which supports art.

or this reason it is the duty of every artist to learn all an about business and to take the greatest interest btaining all the information he can about it and its ciples. It is not to be ignored or pushed aside contuously, for it has earned its right to serious con-ation.

ink how ungrateful it is to ignore the person upon m one is dependent for support. Art is dependent business. Is it not ungrateful, therefore, for artists onsider business as beneath them and unworthy of serious attention?

nd yet there are many players and singers who do business in this light. It is difficult to understand state of mind. It would seem as if music were e sort of ethereal essence or other vague spiritual g, the love of which destroyed all one's faculties; hat having once acquired the fatal taste for art unds, all other senses and powers would become nonent. What a pretty fairy story this would make. aps it has already been written.

ere is an inconsistency about this attitude of the ician toward business which appears at the very start. this: All musicians and all artists—no matter how dily they play—eat. They eat string beans. They eat rkraut—turnips. Moreover, they eat on the very e day that they play Chopin. Turnips and Chopin! hor-ror!

It seems to me that anyone who can reconcile the habit of eating with artistic playing will have no difficulty in reconciling business and art. It would be more sensible to argue that music and victuals could not be assimilated by the same person than to reason that a man who plays or sings must thereby stop doing all the things that an ordinary person does.

Socrates was a great philosopher. He was also very careless about his clothes, and never thought about getting the creases straight. But this was not a virtue in Socrates. Socrates was one sided, that is all. He knew a great deal about one thing and very little about another. Now how much more admirable Socrates would have been if he had put on a clean collar and had a shave every day. He would have been able to think just as well.

That is the way with a musician. A musician who knows a great deal about business, who has some interest in politics and the welfare of the human race, who has had a college education and who can play golf and ride the bicycle, is really a more desirable person to know than one who is so wrapped up in his art that he has no eyes or ears for anything else.

A man who does not care what becomes of his fellow creatures has an element of selfishness in his character which will hinder his success as a musician. Would you move others? Then you must first be moved yourself. If you are a good, sensible business man and conduct your studio on correct business principles—pay your bills promptly and make your pupils pay—there is at least one good element in your character which will show in your playing.

The technic of one's character is as important as the technic of the fingers, and the brain must be an all around brain, fully developed, if one wishes to be an artist and play soulful music. Art is helped, not hindered, by business ability; firstly in a material way, and secondly in a spiritual way. The brain development one acquires through strict, honorable business dealings will be manifest in the touch, the phrasing and the general interpretation.

Socrates is thus described in Appleton's Encyclopedia: "The personal appearance of Socrates was such as to shock the Athenian sense of the beautiful. With a turned up nose, projecting eyes, bald head, thick lips, round belly, he resembled a satyr of Silenus. He wore a miserable dress, and would frequently stand still in sudden fits of abstraction, rolling his eyes and staring at vacancy."

I have seen others as bad in this country. Do you blame Xantippe.

Oscar Franklin Comstock gave a second studio recital last Tuesday, rendering an entirely new program. His versatility is shown in the fact that he is a pianist, an organist and a singer.

Frank Clandy, of the Washington Saengerbund, read a delightful paper on "Parsifal" at the Unity Club on Friday. He raised his hearers to a high pitch of enthusiasm as he told of his experiences at Bayreuth. Incidentally he contrasted the Bayreuth audience with the average opera audience in this country, remarking that: "Our audiences seem to regard the overture as a sort of introductory noise to drown their noise." He also complained of the calls of the boys who inform us that they have "books of the opera." Mr. Claudy's talk was by far the most inspiring and interesting talk I have heard on any musical subject while in Washington, and the fact that he has a German accent did not mar the fine effect of his excellent language and abundant knowledge of his subject. A musical program followed.

Henry White is the publisher of Bischoff's "O, Cruel Love" and three other new songs of his.

The Friday Club announces that it will give a Brahms program in the near future. BERENICE THOMPSON.

Maconda's California Triumph.

MME. CHARLOTTE MACONDA has, in one short month, captivated audiences on both edges of the continent. The middle of October she appeared for the third consecutive season at the New England Music Festivals in New Hampshire, Vermont and Maine, where she recaptured auditors that were already her friends. The middle of November Madame Maconda entered new territory. She sang with the Symphony Orchestra at Los Angeles, Cal., and scored a veritable triumph. It is several thousand miles from Maine to California, and the conditions existing in each place differ very materially, but Madame Maconda's voice and art are big enough and broad enough to meet the demands of both West and East. Her magnetism and personal attractiveness have proved irresistible wherever she has sung, and the consequence is that in her first appearance on the Pacific Coast she has repeated her Eastern triumphs, and in the twenty or thirty other bookings she has to fill in her transcontinental tour the gifted and popular soprano will doubtless but add to her already long list of artistic conquests.

In the Los Angles appearance Madame Maconda sang the Mad Scene from "Lucia," and the result may be judged by the following wire:

LOS ANGELES, November 15, 1901.

Musical Courier, New York:

Maconda scored brilliant triumph and captivated her audience here to-day.

SPEAKING of "Der Meistersinger," an honor has been conferred upon one of our local music schools—that of the Von Meyerincks—by the selection of some of the best voices to enlarge the Grau chorus in the production of the aforementioned opera, which, to my mind, is the most melodious of all the Wagner works. When Damrosch arrived he found them letter perfect in their parts, so well had the work been done here, and but little drilling is needed by Damrosch himself to fit them for the final production. Cecilia Decker Cox was pronounced ready for the operatic stage a year ago by Damrosch himself, who pronounced the same verdict for Maud Fay, saying she would ultimately become a splendid interpreter of Wagnerian roles. Helen Heath, who lately made her début here, is studying to that end, and with Mae Cullen, who did the part of Hänsel, made a hit lately in the production of Humperdinck's fairy opera "Hänsel and Gretel," making a most charming and naïve little Gretel. These are among the voices which will be used in the forthcoming "Meistersinger."

Enid Brandt's first concert took place on Election night, and despite the crowds that packed the streets around the bulletin boards, she played to a good house. And how she played! Such a wee morsel of humanity encasing an almost full grown musical soul, one would say to hear her. Her improvement over last year is very marked. She has gained in power and reach. Where octaves were arranged in sixths last year to fit her tiny hands, this year she comes down on them with the swoop of a veteran, taking them in runs and arpeggi at a tempo that makes one catch one's breath.

The Weber "Concertstücke" was played, as was everything else that she does, without notes, with no one at hand to prompt her or tell her when to take up her cue from the strings; but she knew better than anyone could have told her, and the instant the cue came her part was taken up without a second's hesitation and her attack was perfect. The tests in musical telegraphy were more than ever convincing of her extraordinary genius, no number of notes struck together being too great for her to name instantly with her back turned to the piano. Thome's "Mandolin" and Chaminade's "Flatterer" were among some of the piano pieces that she interpreted with a maturity of expression and fine phrasing that were surprising. A matinee was given on Saturday and there are four more concerts in the series, when it is very probable that Manager Friedlander will tour her.

Mrs. Walter G. Fonda, Misses Edna Smart and Elsie Arden, Herbert Williams and Willard Young, with Mrs. W. J. Batchelder at the piano, presented the program at the California Club's Afternoon of Autumnal Music at the Y. M. C. A. Auditorium last week, under the direction of Mrs. Marriner Campbell. The quartet sung by the young vocalists, Misses Smart and Arden, Messrs. Williams and Young, received much flattering comment. The voices are all known to be of superior quality and the work showed fine training. Mrs. Fonda also sang finely. All received enthusiastic recalls.

Roscoe Warren Lucy has taken a flat at 1122 Ellis street, where he also has his studio, and is going in for housekeeping. His business has grown to such proportions that it made demands upon him for more room, with this result. Mr. Lucy expects some time in the near future to hold some pleasant musicales in his handsome new quarters.

One of the most enjoyable events of the season so far was an informal musicale given by Arthur Fickenscher and his young bride to their musical friends last Thursday evening at their residence, 883 Bush street. The large parlors were thrown open to the guests and a thoroughly good time was enjoyed by all present. The last of the guests did not leave till the clock had struck "the iron tongue of midnight."

The program, though impromptu, was so unusually fine, I give it below:

Sonata for violin and piano.....César Franck
Samuel Savannah and Arthur Fickenscher.
Les Cygnes.....Hahn
Evening Star.....Wagner
Mr. L. Van Linghem.
Liebestraum.....Liszt
Mr. Fickenscher.
Elégie.....Massenet
Mrs. Sedgeley-Reynolds, violin obligato, and Mr. Savannah.
(By request)—
Nachtstücke.....Schumann
Gnomenreigen.....Liszt
Mr. Fickenscher.
Du Bist die Ruh.....Schubert
Erster Kuss.....Fickenscher
(Words by Julius Goebel.)
Die Lorelei.....Liszt
Mrs. Carrie Brown-Dexter.
Petite Suite, violin and piano.....César Cui
(First time in San Francisco.)
Mr. Savannah and Mr. Fickenscher.
(By request)—
Liebestodt, from Tristan and Isolde.....Wagner-Liszt
Feuerzauber, Die Walküre.....Wagner-Brassin
Siegfried's Todt, Die Götterdämmerung.....Wagner-Fickenscher
Arthur Fickenscher.

Mr. Fickenscher's playing was masterly and his Wagner numbers were particularly fine, suggesting the full orchestra in the cleverness of their arrangement. It would take too long to particularize, but the progra was greatly enjoyed by everyone. Among those w were present were Hother Wismer, the violinist, and l mother, Mrs. Cameron Smith, of Oakland; Robert T mie, the pianist; Mr. Hecht, a flute amateur; M Brown-Dexter, Mr. Van Linghem, Mrs. Sedgeley R nolds, Samuel Savannah and many others, besides A. W more Jones and your correspondent.

We have had this week two string quartet concer with programs of unusual quality. The first was giv on Friday by the Zech String Quartet at Century H their first concert of a series to be given this season, a the work done was marked for perfect unanimity phrasing, shading and all expressional effects. I thi for sympathetic tone the Zech Quartet has given us t best string quartet work we have heard in a long tim though this is perhaps not surprising, as William Ze the leader and first violin, has rather made a fad, if it c be so termed, of string quartet work, even before went to Berlin. He was engaged in it all the while was there and on his return to America merely took the lines where he had dropped them. The first numl on the program Friday afternoon was the Brahms Qu tet in B minor for clarinet and strings, a very beauti number in which the strings were ably assisted by M Urba's clarinet. The Grieg Quartet in G minor was lightful, particularly the Scherzo and Presto al Sal rello, which were fairly bewitching. The quartet w give their next concert on December 13, when they w be assisted by Belle Clair Chamberlain at the pia The numbers will be from Borodine and Schumann. T members of the quartet are W. F. Zech, E. B. Ladu, W. Fichrer and A. M. Ladu.

The Minetti Quartet—G. Minetti, S. Savannah, Kowalski and A. Weiss—gave their second concert the season at Y. M. C. A. Auditorium on Saturday aft noon to a much poorer house than it deserved, thou the Enid Brandt matinee probably had not a little to with that fact. The work was up to its usual degree excellence, and the string quintet by Brahms, in whi Otto Bendix presided at the piano, was a fine numl finely rendered. At their next concert on December S. G. Fleishman will assist. The Minettis have be working together for five seasons and their work is consequence of a very high order. On this occasion O Bendix's artistic rendering of the piano part added strong attraction to a splendid program.

The recent election of Eugene Schmitz to the May alty of San Francisco has caused a good deal of exc ment in this city of late general upsetedness, as Schmitz was elected on the Union ticket with a large m jority. Many funny things have been said about Schm who was at the time of his election leader of the Colu bia Theatre orchestra, leading the town with a baton a setting the charter to music, but if in his administrati he is as successful as he has been in his musical career shall have every reason to be satisfied with the peopl choice for Mayor of 'Frisco.

American Institute of Applied Music.

WITH the return of the teachers and students to the city after the summer vacation, the season's work the American Institute of Applied Music is in full ing.

For this reason particular attention is paid to critical sses for piano playing, presided over by Miss Chittenn and A. R. Parsons, where attention is paid to interetation rather than to technic. With the same end in w, the vocal staff, with Tom Karl at its head, aims at nething beyond mere voice training, and the vocal dents are required to join the classes in rhythm and ht reading, if they are deficient on these points. In harmony classes, conducted by H. R. Shelley and H. Baker, the same end is striven for, and the exercises generally played as well as written so as to convey initc musical ideas to the students instead of mere thematical problems in notation.

One of the chief sources of inspiration in the institute ound in Miss Chittenden's classes in pedagogics. In se informal talks, in which she trains young teachers the synthetic method of piano playing, she conveys to m so much of her own enthusiasm that they receive a p and lasting impression of the nobility of the work teaching.

Zeldenrust's Debut.

DUARD ZELDENRUST, the celebrated Dutch pianist, is to make his American début in Cincinnati, vember 29 and 30, with the Symphony Orchestra there, en he will play the Grieg Concerto.

osef Israels, the world renowed Holland painter, a se personal friend, painted a life size bust portrait of denrust just prior to his departure from Amsterdam, as nark of respect and appreciation of the musician's art. tographic reproductions are to be made of the paintwhich reached New York last week, and which is on ibition in Knoedler's window on Fifth avenue.

n spite of the fact that Israels is seventy-seven years . the handling of the Zeldenrust portrait is bold and rous, and the individuality and personality of the man have been caught and faithfully portrayed. The ure is quiet in tone and represents the pianist in a ughtful mood. It is handsomely framed, and makes a able item in the window's display.

ARA ANDERSON.—Sara Anderson's popularity is insing, and justly so, for her voice and art continually rove. This winter finds her beautiful voice larger, if possible more luscious than ever. Her recitals this on have been artistic triumphs.

Miss Anderson has proved herself to be a singer of gs, German, French, Italian and English, as well as a rano whose voice and temperament can interpret the t dramatic and exacting arias. It has been written of "that her glorious voice and impassioned singing electr her audiences, and so it must ever be when this talrd artist sings."

he has before her a very busy season, including arances in concert, oratorio and recitals. The latter, ever, she is making a specialty of, and her manager booked a number for her. Her joint recitals with ph Baernstein, the distinguished basso, will be a fea in the musical world.

LUCY GATES.

THERE arrived in this city from Berlin October 25 last Miss Lucy Gates, of Provo, Utah, on her return home, after an absence of three years studying music. Miss Gates is a daughter of Susa Young Gates, editor of the Young Woman's Journal, of Salt Lake, and one of the faculty of the Brigham Young College and Normal Training School, of Provo, where about one thousand young men and maidens of the Mormon communities are being educated.

At an early age Miss Gates showed signs of unusual talent as a pianist, so promising that her father and mother decided to send her to Berlin to study with the best piano teachers in the conservatory. She went, accompanied by her grandmother, Mrs. Lucy Bigelow Young, one of the four surviving widows of the late President Young, three years ago. She was then in her seventeenth year, and, as Miss Gates tells it, "I had the prayers and blessings of my father and mother and the president of our church and felt sure I should succeed."

LUCY GATES.

After diligent study and practice for eighteen months Miss Gates was heard singing as her master entered the conservatory. Being undiscovered by his pupil, he remained concealed and listened for some time, and then expressed great surprise at the wonderful trills, marvelous range, flexibility and sweetness of her voice, declaring that she ought to begin vocal studies at once, even to the sacrifice of her great piano skill. "This so surprised grandma and I that we were at a loss to decide what to do for some time. I was not able to take lessons in both singing and the piano. Several vocal instructors and critics heard me sing and urged me to give up the piano by all means. Finally, after consultation with my people and earnest prayer and fasting, we decided that I should take voice culture."

During her studies the past year several impresarios have heard her, and she has refused many offers to sing in opera, as she had promised her people that she would return home after her three years' absence, and nothing would induce her to break that promise.

On her way home from Berlin Miss Gates stopped in Paris and sang for Madame Marchesi, who, after hearing her sing, clasped her in her arms, embraced and kissed her, declaring that it was the sweetest and best voice in existence and that she must come to her and study at once and in three years she would be the greatest opera singer in all the world.

Miss Gates and her grandmother arrived in New York on October 26 and spent ten days visiting their friends here.

During their stay they were the guests of Major and Mrs. Pond at their home in Jersey City Heights. While there they were given a reception, on which occasion Miss Gates sang several numbers, including the "Jewel Song" from "Faust," Ganz's "Sing, Sweet Bird"; Mascagni's "Ave Maria" and several German, French and Italian songs. Several distinguished musicians were present and declared, as well as her audience of 150 select citizens of Jersey City, that it was the most wonderful, charming and artistic singing they had ever heard. Miss Gates was accompanied by Adolf Glose, the pianist and accompanist. He said to Major Pond: "Major, we've had a good deal of experience with singers, but there never was anything like this." Frank Damrosch heard her and advised her to settle in New York at once, and that she would have all the singing she could do.

The Major saw Miss Gates and her grandmother on the train for their home in Utah last Wednesday. All the encouragement he could get was: "Major Pond, we are going home, and after I have been there a few days I will talk the matter over with my mother and father and the president of our church, and if they consent and I can have their prayers and blessing, I will come back to you, for under these conditions I feel confident that I would succeed. Otherwise I would not come, because I know I would not be successful." And Major Pond assured her that these were the only conditions under which he wanted her to come. Miss Gates' voice is of great range.

Since the above was written Major Pond has received a telegram from Miss Gates' father telling him that his daughter may accept his offer to sing with Florizel on his forthcoming tour, which begins in Carnegie Hall, February 4.

It is doubtful if ever so thorough and complete a musical education has been acquired in so short a time with less expense and greater earnestness.

Gerardy in Great Demand.

THE triumphs of Gérardy with the Boston Symphon concerts have created a demand for his service which are pouring in upon Manager Wolfsohn from ever part of the country. The success of Gérardy with th Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York city ten day ago will be one of the pleasant remembrances of the yea In his playing he showed himself a greater artist tha ever before, and not only winning the applause of a ver large audience, but also the very highest of praise fro the critics. The Tribune critic said in his review of th concert: "Gérardy played entrancingly." The critic o the New York Herald said: "In his instrument speak the voice of an artist." The Press said: "Gérardy tone is luscious." The critic of the New York Sun pai the following tribute to the genius of Gérardy: "A artist whose every tone is sheer sensuous pleasure gave finished performance of the Lalo Concerto. He neve fiddles in rapid passage work, while his cantilena, rich it is, never degenerates into nasal sentimentality. Th few bars of the rondo were a pure lyric joy."

The engagements of Gérardy are greater for this se son than they have been for him at any time since h first trip to America. He has already been heard at fi concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as we as in several private musicales. Last Friday and Satu day he played with the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestr and on Saturday morning early Mr. Wolfsohn telegraphe him to leave immediately for New York, as he had a ranged for him to play at a musicale on Sunday evenin On Saturday evening, the 23d, he will play at the Ha monie Club and also in Richmond and Atlanta durin the following week, returning immediately to play wi the New York Philharmonic Orchestra in Carnegie Ha on December 6 and 7. Gérardy will make a trip to the Pacific Co during the latter part of February and during the mon of March.

AMY MURRAY.—Miss Amy Murray is attracting lar audiences at her Scottish recitals. Likewise reports of h singing like this:

The "Evening of Scottish Song" given by Miss Amy Mur last Friday evening, in the Central Presbyterian Church, was both artistic and a financial success, and was enjoyed by all who he her.

Miss Murray's grace and personality were as fascinating as w her songs. The "wee bits" of history given with each number ad much to the interest and charm. One lingered "Beside the Bon Brier Bush" while listening to the songs of "auld lang syne."

As a Scottish fishwife, Miss Murray, in the characteristic s "Caller Herrin'," especially delighted the audience, and made dent the clear tone, the power and the wonderful quality of voice.

We, like the Princeton students, say, "Will ye no come b again, Miss Murray?"—Haverstraw (N. Y.) Messenger, Octo 16, 1901.

Frederic Martin has been engaged for the Littleton, N. H., Festival, January 23 and 24. Of his singing at a recent concert in Bangor, Me., the critics had the following to say:

"Frederic Martin, the soloist of the evening, has been heard here before, so that the audience knew what to expect from him. He sang several numbers, including 'Oh, Star of Eve!' from 'Tannhäuser'; 'The Grenadiers,' and Schubert's 'Wanderer,' an especially choice repertory. Few singers who have been heard here in recent years possess voices which have all the qualities of Mr. Martin's—the fullness, richness and clarity, of which were so evident in each of his selections.

"His reading of the 'Tannhäuser' number and Schubert's 'Wanderer' was masterly to a high degree, and it is not detracting from the excellence of the orchestra program to say that his singing of the 'Wanderer' song was the feature of the evening."—Commercial.

"As was expected, one of the features of the evening was the appearance of Frederic Martin, basso, of Boston, who strengthened the favorable impression made upon a previous visit here. Mr. Martin is certainly the possessor of a good voice, carefully trained and skillfully used—a full, rich, sympathetic voice, with a phenomenally high range and a purity of tone which is very pleasing; a voice which penetrated to the farthest corners of the auditorium, and which won the hearty approval of the audience."—Daily News.

Miss Josephine Aleene, a pupil of Miss Thursby, will also take part. There will be a ballet and chorus of women. Mr. Bensel, who has been studying with Mr. Howland for some time, made his appearance here last spring in another opera of Mr. Howland's, in conjunction with Miss Minnie Tracey, and had an excellent début on that occasion. Miss Edith Longford is a Canadian young lady of remarkable dramatic ability and voice that gives great promise.

COSIMA WAGNER has resolved to give twenty representations, with the same program as this year, at Bayreuth. There will be five performances of "The Flying Dutchman," beginning the festival on July 22, the rumor that the festival would be held later being inexact. There will be seven performances of "Parsifal" between July 23 and August 20, and two cycles of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" on July 25-28, August 14-19.

Munich will again have a Wagner festival, beginning August 7 and ending September 11. There will be twenty-one performances—eight of "Die Meistersinger," five of "Tannhäuser," four each of "Lohengrin" and "Tristan." Among the singers engaged will again be two Americans—Lillian Nordica and Olive Fremstad; also Fritzi Scheff, Ternina, Bertram, Anthes and Reichmann.

LEHMANN'S second recital last Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall only proved the contention of THE MUSICAL COURIER that this singer is not vocally in condition to interpret the programs she attempts. Even Mr. Finck, her gallant champion, who sees her through sentimental glasses, admits in full the merits of our criticism. Last Friday in the Evening Post—which journal reached in excellent health the green old age of 100 years last Saturday—its critic wrote that Madame Lehmann's powers of vocalization were gone; that her intonation was faulty; and her enunciation no longer what it was! What is left? In other words Mr. Finck declares that she can't sing, that she has lost the sense of pitch and no longer enunciates! This is a bewildering arraignment indeed. Sentimentally considered Lehmann was a remarkable Wagner singer ten years ago—to-day she revives old memories of dead and dusty triumphs. Again we repeat, the pity of such exhibitions!

THE death of James Henry Mapleson did not find the gallant impresario in harness, though doubtless busy with a thousand projects; for he was a man of schemes, a true dreamer, who had not awakened to the fact that old-fashioned Italian opera was a thing of the past. But let it be said in justice that his like we shall never see again. He was not merely a commercial operatic drummer, but a man of taste, discernment, an excellent musician and the successful manager of some of the greatest singers in history. His is a figure that will live. Biographical details may be found elsewhere.

In view of the consistency of the funeral proceedings, as compared with what occurred at the funerals of his predecessors, the following cable to the New York Herald is given prominence in our editorial columns:

LONDON, Tuesday.—The funeral of Col. J. H. Mapleson, the operatic impresario, yesterday, at Highgate, in the north of London, was a sadly neglected ceremony. A solitary carriage containing a brother and a brother-in-law followed the hearse. Not one of the great operatic artists either attended or sent a floral token, and only a few private and family friends were present at the interment in Highgate Cemetery.

CHICAGO, November 13.—Music of the rag-time variety is under fire, and concerted action on the part of all unions of the American Federation of Musicians has been called for by the Chicago Federation to drive the composition that has been so popular since the World's Fair out of use.

Rag-time, the Chicago musicians say, has been found to conflict with morals and good musical theory and practice. Musicians are enraged over its despotic reign, and the pulpit has pronounced it immoral.—The Sun.

ONE of the effective means of ridding this country of rag-time music is to improve the condition of music in the New York theatres. There is too much catering to depraved taste in most of these orchestras. An exception is to be found the Manhattan Theatre, where the orchestra pla a good program, and although small, the o chestra is nicely balanced. The musicians ther selves should see to it that their programs conta no rag-time.

One of the first to inaugurate the anti-rag-tir crusade was Louis Blumenberg, the violoncelli who, in one of his tours covering a vast territor found that rag-time—a rag weed of music—h grown up everywhere in the Union and that i vicious influences are highly detrimental to t cause of good music. Rag-time, he says, is hea on every hotel piano, from the windows of priva houses and in all the concert halls. It is the vu gar words to which it is set that make it so degra ing. The lowest, basest passions of degenera white and black are openly exploited to the acco paniment of this rhythm.

PERCY BETTS writes this in the Lond Daily News:

"Signora Piatti, whose death at an advanced a we announced recently, was the widow of the em nent 'cellist, and was a daughter of Thomas Wels the once eminent basso, and teacher of Charl Horn, Kitty Stephens, John Sinclair and othe who, according to the custom of the period, we his 'apprentices.' As Welsh was actually singi as far back as 1776, the death of his daughter seve a veritable link with the past. Welsh was in 17 a boy chorister at Wells Cathedral, and so swe was his voice and so wide his fame that when h sang an anthem on Sundays the city hotels wer says a writer of the period, crowded with lovers music from Bath, Bristol, Bridgewater and els where. Sheridan discovered him, and brought hi to London, where jealous Storace refused to co pose for him, until he found a firm friend in Jol Philip Kemble. Welsh's second wife was his pup the eminent soprano, Mary Anne Wilson, who su vived till 1867, and she was Signora Piatti's moth Welsh himself attained the age of seventy-eigh When he was born in 1770 his father was fifty-tw so that three lives covered the extraordinary perio of only seventeen years short of a couple of ce turies."

THERE are two types of strong men in the ci ilized world. One type appreciates mus and gives encouragement to its advancement, whi the other type regards all music as the prime can of moral degeneracy. America, or rather—it seem necessary to be more exact—the United States, has pr duced a number of men great executive force a shrewd financial sense, who might have becom famous as musicians. The universal idea th high art is irreconcilable to cold, calculatin money considerations is dispelled when we stu the petty economies of the Tamagnos, Salvinis a Lehmanns. Thus, when we find great artists wh think more of a dollar than the ordinary dry goo clerk thinks of ten, we wonder at the contradi tions in human nature. Going up higher in th scale we find the contradictions still more pu zling, for we read about the Napoleons of finan and leaders in other channels loving music and d voting their leisure to its cultivation and advanc ment. John D. Rockefeller, who cannot te whether he is worth $300,000,000 or $500,000,00 plays extremely well on that seductive and wo derful instrument the violoncello. All of M Rockefeller's daughters are musical. One is good violinist, and another a skillful pianist. the days when they were all at home the perfor ance of chamber music was the family diversion.

STRONG MEN AND MUSIC.

J. Pierpont Morgan is a musical connoisseur.

reported that he has a fine baritone voice, and uld have been a great singer if he had developed s voice and musical talent. Morgan always joins the singing of the hymns at St. George's Church, hich he attends regularly when in town. It may nuse some of the enemies of Thomas C. Platt to ar that the Republican leader possesses a real nor, and in his early manhood he enjoyed sing- g, and his friends enjoyed hearing him, which is ther more to the point. Both the Senator and his ble wife, who died some time ago, took a warm terest in the music at the Oriental Hotel, Man- ttan Beach, where they passed their summers for ars.

Col. Henry Watterson, the able Kentucky editor, a good pianist, and when he was younger he was good singer, too. When the editor first an- unced that he contemplated entering the lecture ld some of his friends declared they would rather ar him play the piano. And truly this was com- mentary, for the colonel's lectures have been suc- ssful. Hopkinson Smith, author, humorist, lec- rer, illustrator and several other things, is also a usician whom his friends delight to hear perform. When Andrew Carnegie accepted the presidency the New York Philharmonic he paid a grand bute to music, and at the same time raised the pes of those who want to see the old society es- blished beyond future financial contingencies. gain and again has the steel magnate expressed s love for music, and the practical demonstrations ereof are numerous. What Colonel Higginson, e Boston banker, has done for music, through s munificent support of the Boston Symphony rchestra, can hardly be estimated by ordinary inds. We do not know whether Colonel Hig- nson or Mr. Carnegie plays or sings, but we all cognize their fine musical appreciation, which in elf is a gift of the gods.

Justice Jerome, the new district attorney-elect of ew York county, is a highly accomplished musi- n, playing the pipe organ with professional skill. ie organ is a noble instrument, and the man who es to play it will be the better and nobler for his dy of the masters who have composed for it. usic is a talent which runs in the Jerome family. rs. Cornwallis West (Lady Randolph Churchill), o was Miss Jennie Jerome, a cousin of the justice, a good pianist, and at one time gave an entire ncert in London in aid of a charity. Among royal families of Europe the strongest and best mbers have displayed musical gifts that would ve been remarkable in commoners. Emperor illiam is very musical, and his son and heir to the rone, an exemplary young man, plays the violin e a true artist. The cultivation of music has m the earliest times appealed to rulers. David d his harp and Nero fiddling while the flames nsumed the ancient city are stories we recall ien strong minds are considered in their relation music.

THE Chicago Tribune recently printed the following editorial in its columns. It was ed "King Edward's Musical Projects":

London Truth credits King Edward with the intention reviving music at his court, but the details of his pro- m only go to show the low conditions of English music when compared with its earlier glories. His program includes visits to the opera in semi-state, with beefeaters on duty at the k doors and along the corridors; a coronation concert Albert Hall; private performances at Buckingham ace and Windsor Castle; "commanded" performances ore the royal family, and more frequent playing by the g's private band. Sir Walter Parratt has been gazetted ster of the music, and Dr. Creser composer to the apels royal. Who Parratt and Creser are the world little ows or cares.

ROYAL MUSIC.

On the whole, though music will be less neglected by ng Edward than it was by his mother, there is no pros- t that it will rise out of its low condition. Now that Arthur Sullivan is dead there is hardly a British composer of prominence left. Sir Herbert Oakeley, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Frederick Bridge and Hamish MacCunn remain; but with the exception of Mackenzie their works are unknown out of England. None of the members of the royal family, except the late Duke of Edinburgh, has been much interested in music except as an accompaniment to royal functions or matters of fashion. The King himself has been indifferent.

The golden days of music in England were the days of Queen Elizabeth. She herself was a good musician, as her father, Henry VIII., was before her, and played the lute and virginals skillfully. Under her auspices flourished such fine musicians as Tallis and Bird, the father of English national sacred music; Morley, Farmer, Dowland, Wilbye, Dr. John Bull, and Orlando Gibbons. In the period of James II. arose Purcell, the greatest of English composers, who succeeded in every form of music, and whose works forced all others into obscurity. Then followed Händel, who, though of German birth, made his residence in England, and for years dominated its music and so impressed himself upon it that he eclipsed every native composer. King Edward may well sigh for the days when King George and his Queen, traveling by the Thames from Whitehall to Limehouse in the royal barge, were followed by a boat in which Händel and his instrumentalists performed the "water music."

Since those days music has languished in England and is now at a low ebb. Commercialism is always injurious if not fatal to art conditions. Now that commercialism has begun to languish in England, it may be that the musical art may revive. There may be no more royal musicians like Edward VI., Henry VIII., Elizabeth, Mary Stuart, Charles I. and Charles II., but there may be some day more Purcells, Händels, Gibbonses and Morleys, and English music may be restored to something like its old dignity and excellence.

To the list of living English composers should have been added the names of Coleridge-Taylor and Edwin Elgar—not to mention several others. These latter two are at present enjoying great popularity in England. Commercialism, however, is not the only cause for the languishing conditions of musical art in the British Isles. England had in Purcell a master as original as any Continental one; but she allowed his genius to be stamped out by the foreigner. It was, it is, the foreigner, whether German, French or Italian, who worked the mischief there as well as in America. This country will never develop any originality in art forms until she voluntarily detaches herself from Continental ideals, methods. Walt Whitman, whose prose works are beginning to receive the attention due them, preaches the doctrine of American individuality in fiery accents. We need hardly add that this faith in our future is the fundamental keynote of his "Leaves of Grass." And Whitman in this is a willing disciple of Emerson; Emerson, the foe to shallow cosmopolitan, globe-trotting culture!

Touching on this question of King Edward's musical tastes a contemporary writes:

Though King Edward of England is not to be crowned for some time, people in Great Britain are already wondering who will write the customary hymn and who will play the great organ at Westminster during the ceremony.

The organist will be selected either by the King or by his chaplain, the Bishop of London. For his services he will receive a fee of $1,000, and his title for that one day will be "Composer to His Majesty's Chapel." In the Abbey the choir will be reserved for him and for the other musicians, the nave being at the disposal of the chapter, who will use it for the accommodation of invited guests.

More than once since the time of Purcell this custom has given rise to some scandal. Purcell was not only a great composer, but also an astute man of business, and he conceived the idea of selling at a high price on coronation day as many seats as possible near the organ. The chapter, however, heard of this scheme and compelled him to hand over the money which he had received for those seats.

At Queen Victoria's coronation, in 1838, Sir George Smart was organist, and he, too, sold several tickets at a very high price, but he was more ingenious than Purcell, for he placed the ticket holders among the members of his orchestra, and gave each one of them a violin, with a caution not to attempt to play it under any circumstances. Clever though this ruse was, the chapter suspected that something was wrong, but proof was evidently lacking, for the composer was not asked to disgorge. Exactly how much Sir George made on this occasion is not known, but it is said that he pocketed a considerable sum.

Whether any new stratagem in this direction will be devised for the coronation of King Edward VII. remains to be seen.

We rather fear that the pessimistic views regarding the royal artistic tastes of George Moore, the novelist and art critic, will be realized. "The age of mediocrity in art and literature will begin when the Prince of Wales mounts the throne," said Mr. Moore in effect.

THIS is the caption of the following editorial in last Saturday's Chicago Evening Post. The pessimistic nature of the lines we reprint may not be entirely justified, for, no doubt, the public spirit of Chicago's wealthy citizens will come to the rescue in due time. What would Chicago be, musically speaking, without its Permanent Orchestra, the source from which its local musicians derive their inspirations?

"PRESERVE THE CHICAGO ORCHESTRA."

We have been congratulating ourselves on the opening of the eleventh season of our "permanent" symphony orchestra, the most valuable of our artistic assets, and enjoying in anticipation the splendid offerings promised by Mr. Thomas, the prince of American conductors. But the question "Is the orchestra really permanent?" comes as a distinct shock and induces serious reflection.

Speaking, presumably, by the card, one of our musical critics, who deplores the fact that the "multitudes" do not support the Chicago Orchestra, states that the sale of season tickets this fall is particularly disappointing, that the situation has become annoying and even critical, and that some of the trustees and guarantors are growing weary of welldoing and strongly inclined to abandon the enterprise at the end of the present season. The critic himself is evidently pessimistic regarding the future, for he warns the people of Chicago and the suburbs that "they will not enjoy the opportunity" (of neglecting the greatest orchestra in America) much longer.

Now the dissolution of the Chicago Orchestra and the loss of its services to art, education and morality (for a symphony orchestra is an ennobling, civilizing institution) would be a real calamity to Chicago. The possibility of it cannot be contemplated without pain and dismay. But, after all, is it just to charge the local public with indifference and lack of appreciation? The "multitudes" do not attend the Thomas concerts, but in this respect Chicago assuredly presents no exception. We are not really called upon to hang our heads in shame. Do the "multitudes" flock to the symphony concerts given in Berlin, Leipsic, Munich, Paris, London, Boston and other musical centres? No, it must be recognized once for all, however we may regret it, that the works of the great and immortal masters are not within the intellectual and æsthetic range of the multitude. We hope, with Tolstoy, that the highest art will become popular (or, to put it the other way, that popular art will satisfy the severest standards), but in our day, and for some decades to come, this desideratum will not be realized.

If it is true that the supporters, regular and occasional, of our great orchestra number between 8,000 and 10,000 persons, then we have reason for elation and satisfaction rather than self-reproach. No city in the world can show a better record in this respect. Young and without musical traditions and memories, Chicago has done as well as —better than—the artistic capitals of Europe! This merits credit, not blame. It proves also that the orchestra should be regarded as a permanency. If 10,000 devotees and grateful patrons do not create a need for such an institution, then the masters have written in vain and their works are a waste of genius and inspiration. This conclusion, however, refutes itself.

But even 10,000 music lovers of the requisite rank cannot make the orchestra self-supporting. This is a fact, a condition. What is the remedy? Endowment simply. The annual deficits will continue, and our enlightened, cultured philanthropists must make them good. In Boston seats command high premiums—an indirect form of endowment. The Pittsburg Orchestra owes its existence to Mr. Carnegie's generosity and love of the beautiful and the beneficent. Surely there are fifty or a hundred men in Chicago who do not regard it as an annoyance and burden to contribute $500 a year each toward the support of one of the truest factors of civic righteousness. Hospitals, dispensaries, "homes" of various kinds and libraries are endowed, and no one thinks of any statute of limitation in those cases. Why, then, grow weary of welldoing in the direction of popularizing sublime music? Have we not outgrown the old prejudices and superstitions, and do not our cultured rich recognize that to perpetuate a fine orchestra is, to say the least, just as laudable and useful as to establish a branch library or a hospital? If not, there is need of a campaign of education along those lines.

DREAM.

Last night I dreamed I saw my mother young;
I never knew her till her hair was gray.
Last night I saw the wrinkles smoothed away
And pearl about her satin shoulders strung.
Out from our homely tools of toil among
She came as if she knew them not. There lay
Old hopes in her young eyes. Faintly to-day
Are sounding the dead madrigals she sung.

I, who had watched the stolen march of days,
And would not see the days they stole away,
Moved breathlessly to meet her, mute with praise.
But ah, the vibrant hand that in mine lay
Was not the one I love upon my hair;
Nor hers the mother eyes, deep, deep with prayer!

FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER PLAYS.

FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER played in Mendelssohn Hall last Saturday afternoon. Her program was this:

Caprice on Airs from the Ballet of the opera Alceste ..... Gluck
Sonate, op. 111 ..... Beethoven
Thème Varié et Fugato (dedicated to Mrs. Zeisler) ..... Schuett
A la Bien Aimée (Valse), op. 59, No. 2 ..... Schuett
Nocturne, op. 37, No. 2 ..... Chopin
Etude, op. 25, No. 9 (by request) ..... Chopin
Polonaise, op. 53 ..... Chopin
En Forme d'Etude (dedicated to Mrs. Zeisler) ..... Leschetizky
Gondoliera, op. 41 ..... Moszkowski
Impatience (No. 1 from Spring, op. 57) ..... Moszkowski
Etude, C major (On False Notes) (by request) ..... Rubinstein
Valse (Man lebt nur einmal) ..... Strauss

Is there anything for me to say that I have not said about the playing of this unique creature? I could indulge in reminiscences; I might recall the torrid night in July, 1885, when I first saw her in the Academy of Music after the performance of Rubinstein's D minor Concerto. She recalled the feline in those times, just as to-day she has something of the spiritual, compelling magnetism of a Duse. A picture of the great Italian actress gazes at me on my desk. It is after Lenbach. The head is draped as I once saw Bloomfield-Zeisler's, draped by a lace scarf. Now the two artists do not look alike; yet such is the community of emotion, the same enigmatic expression may be detected in both faces. What is it? Madame Zeisler has not had her soul so cruelly stabbed as has Duse. Is it all artistic mimicry or is Maeterlinck right—the dramas of to-day are spiritual, are fought out within the walls of our souls?

Certainly the new note in the playing of the favorite pianist is not an emotional one. That she struck with no uncertain touch a decade ago. She seems to be retracing her steps, seems to have clamored not unsuccessfully for admission to the place wherein dwell the intellectual elect. The reading of Beethoven's C minor Sonata was alive with meanings. In its clear unfolding of phrase and section you felt the impact of an intensely logical, strong brain; the first movement was charged with thoughts. The slow movement has been suffused with more atmosphere by the pianist, which means that I have heard her play it more poetically. But it was beautiful in tone, just in conception. The mood throughout the work was Doric; not a trace of latter-day sentimentalism obscured the Hellenic outlines of the masterpiece.

Chopin was read with a happy mean. It was not smeared; the zal was not overdone; nor was there a rubato that syncopated one's heart. It was sane, sensuous; it was Chopin. The lovely nocturne was not played as if it were a study in double notes, with a droning intermezzo. All these negatives sound as if Madame Zeisler's performance was a series of evasions. It was not. It was individual, and when the A flat Polonaise was reached the smoke of battle got into her nostrils and the dogs of war were unloosed. It was an exhibition of dynamics, spirit and rustling nerves. The smaller pieces were delivered with miraculous delicacy and precision. Many of them were repeated, and when, after a dazzing version of the Strauss Valse, she played the music box valse of Chopin's in G flat (op. 70) you could have sworn that Pachmann was outdone. It was crystalline music making. And the "Marche Militaire" of Tausig—Schubert has little to do with it—was given with a fine appreciation of acoustical effects. It was built up from faint perspectives into a threatening roar. After this the enthusiasm knew no moderation. It was a triumphant afternoon for this dark sibyl whose tripod is a piano chair, whose medium of eloquence the cold keys of a piano. Madame Zeisler was to have played her second recital yesterday afternoon.

Few critics are prophets honored in their own musical country, and but one or two in a generation possess prévoyance enough to predict the caprices of musical taste. The antics of that exotic quality, since the day Richard Wagner bade it leap through the large and rather gaudy hoop of the music drama, have been mystifying and extraordinary. This same taste coquetted with Brahms, visited Italy, and for a time took up its abode in the house of Grieg.

Caprice of a deep seated order marked the progress of music during the past half century. Chopin died in 1849, Schumann in 1856; with them were buried the ideals that lit the lantern of the romantic school. It has flickered on, this sweet, phosphorescent signal of revolt, chiefly in the music of imitators. The strong light of the torch first firmly held by Bach and passed on by men like Mozart, Beethoven and Brahms, was not desired of the dreamers; for them the twilight and the strange winged creatures bred in the twilight. The classical composers—who were romantics in their time—loved much better the luminary of day, according scant homage to melancholy and moonshine.

Then came Richard Wagner, a revolutionist and a marvelous molder of other men's ideas. We are now no longer alarmed by the senile warnings of the extreme right, the classical camp. As for the crazy boasts and affirmations of the musical communists, we, who love our Wagner, smile at the deific things claimed of him. He had genius and his music is genuine; but it is music for the theatre, for the glow of the footlights; it is rhetorical music, and seeks ever for effect. That it is not music to touch the tall stars of Bach and Beethoven we know; but why compare the two methods when they each strive for other and various things? Wagner arrogated everything to his music dramas. This he had to do, or else be left bawling his wares to unsympathetic listeners in the market place of art, and he did not hesitate to invade more sacrosanct precincts.

Wagner caught up in a mighty synthesis the loose threads of romanticism, the widely severed strands of opera. He studied Bach and Beethoven, utilizing the polyphony of the one, the symphon orchestra of the other. Then, knowing that ope —as opera—on Rossinian lines had reached i apogee; that Mozart and Gluck contained in sol tion the very combinations he needed, he, like a audacious alchemist, made a composite that at fir smacked of German and later of Italian. He r through his "Rienzi," "Flying Dutchman," "L hengrin," "Tannhäuser" days, meanwhile stren ously testing his originality, and when the tin arrived—in his case somewhat late in life—he calr ly threw overboard old formulas and gave us t "Ring of the Nibelung" and the rest of the maste pieces. It was the most deliberate chase aft genius the world has ever witnessed, and, stran as it seems, the wings which carried Wagner, Ic rus-wise, to the realms of the sun have, as y shown no threatening weakness, no precipito melting. We realize that this composer perfect his style—patterning after other men's ideas; th he finally beat into shape a method of his own strong, individual and sufficient for his purpo He argued that certain subjects could stand op atic treatment; that an opera orchestra must n be a big guitar, nor yet as symphonic as Beeth ven's. With the prescience of genius he help himself to the material he needed. How well knew these needs everyone feels when hearing "L Meistersinger" or "Tristan and Isolde."

Wagner was the last of the great romantics. closed a period—did not inaugurate one. A curious return to more sol ideals of form was led by Johannes Brahms. need not be added that this leadership was u sought—indeed, was hardly apprehended by t composer. A more unpromising figure for a m sical Messiah would have been difficult to fi Wagner, a brilliant, disputatious, magnetic ma made a personal propaganda. Brahms, far fr being so sympathetic or so cultured a man of t world as Wagner, lived quietly, thinking high His were Wordsworth's ideals; he abhorred t world, the flesh and the devil—the last being inc nate for him in the marriage of music with t drama. Yet his music is alive to-day—alive wi a promise and a potency that urge to critical e thusiasms, so sane is it, so noble in content, richly fruitful in treatment. A sympathetic co poser, he is also a man who deals largely in t humanities of his art. Learned beyond the drea of even Wagner, Brahms concealed his count point in lyric roses, set it to blooming in the C World gardens of Germany, decked his science w the sweet, mad tunes of Hungary—remaining witl a Teuton, and one in the direct line of Bach a Beethoven.

Now comes another enigmatic tangent of mus the heavenly maid. The seed planted by Berli and husbanded carefully by Liszt has come to abundant harvest. The deaths of Chopin and Sch mann stifled the aspirations of the romantics. nothing ever dies, and by an elliptical route retu to us something of the fire and the fury, signifyi passion, of these same romantics. All this we find the music of Peter Iltsch Tschaikowsky, this much more. Artistically Tschaikowsky is the l eal descendant of Liszt and Berlioz, with a Sla color superadded. He deliberately abandoned old symphonic form. Obsessed by what He James calls the "scenic idea," though without co pelling talent for the theatre, Tschaikowsky pou ıto the elastic and anonymous mold of the sym-honic form much passion and poetry. A poetic ramatist, he selected, for typical motives, "Hamlet," Francesca da Rimini," "Jeanne d'Arc," "Manfred," Romeo and Juliet." His six symphonies are huge ro-ıantic suites, resplendent with the tints of an im-gination saturated in romanticism. His fierce ossack temperament and mingling of realistic, nsuous savagery with Malo-Russian mysticism t him apart from other composers. As musical Wagner and Brahms, he lacks, perhaps, the firm, ıtellectual grip of those two masters. But if we sire a wonderful picture of the psychology of a reat troubled soul, it is to Tschaikowsky we must o. He tells things in his music that no other man ıs dared even to whisper.

Rubinstein is hardly to be considered a factor the musical strife. He was an upholder of both mps, and being a German-Russian and a Rus-ın-German Jew and Lutheran, his eclecticism oved his undoing. Something of the same sort ay be said of that clever Frenchman, Saint-Saëns. rieg built his nest far up in Norwegian fjords, ıilt it of bright-colored bits from Schumann, Men-lssohn and Chopin. He does not seriously unt. Neither does Dvorák of Bohemia, who has ver said anything particularly novel or profound, spite his intimate mastery of orchestration. Eu-n d'Albert treads with care the larger footprints Brahms; while Goldmark, a very Makart in his odigal amazements of color, has contributed but w masterpieces to the gallery. Germany and ustria are, with one exception, dead. Italy is as re of genius now as Mother Hubbard's cupboard. ance has Massenet, Saint-Saëns, Bruneau, Char-ntier, LeRoux—miniature masters all. There are rking promises in Belgium. England has abso-tely not one major talent.

The exception in Germany is Richard Strauss, a an of power and dangerous ambitions. His am-tions are dangerous because he attempts to lead usic into a fourth spatial dimension; because, em-ative of the nihilistic and transcendental philos-hy of Nietzsche, he juggles with tones as if they re metaphysical symbols. His symphonic poems e marked by an almost superhuman mastery of s material, of his play-impulse, that comes dan-rously near crossing the dividing line between ntasy and insanity. But the magnificence of it , the magnificence of this tonal orgy, of this mad ght to the very gates of the infinite—or to the thermost inferno! And Strauss is the supreme nifestation of erratic energy; his music, disdain-g formal barriers, seeks to give articulation to as of an almost concrete kind. Richard Strauss elds the brush of a great painter, of a musical ul Veronese—yet he chooses to mask his music profound and fantastic philosophy.

Here, then, is the present situation: Wagner eaching in his musical dreams; Tschaikowsky ssionately declaiming of the cumulative woes of nkind in accents pathetically dramatic; Brahms surely breasting the billows of the maelstrom, eaking in golden tones the doctrine of art for 's sake; and, finally, Richard Strauss, seeking th furious and rhythmic gestures to divert from proper channel the art he adores. Who may re to predict where all this will end? To add the general bewilderment, the American com-ser springs into the field fully equipped, saying the sayings of other men, but with a various elo-quence and a technical address that is puzzling to the critical forecaster. What caprice of musical taste will be born next?

"The world will find a wholesome reaction in the study of music from its spiritual side, its inner life. In the laws of tonality, the most musical and the least musical will have a common ground of interest. By study of tone, character or mental ef-fects, we are led to realize that the marvelous intui-tion of Pythagoras, Plato and Aristotle was correct —that music is the basis of all human develop-ment." This, by an author whose name I cannot recall, is a hint, a prophecy of the track music must take if it is to ascend. Intellectual music, music that does not appeal merely to the fevered nerves of this generation, is needed. Complex or abstract music is not meant abstract in the sense of lacking human interest. Is there no mean between the brawling jealousies of Mascagni's peasant rogues and the often abstruse delving of Brahms? Surely, to think nobly is to live nobly, else Wordsworth is a poor guide. We fret, we fume, we analyze too much in our arts. Why cannot we compass the Greek gladness and simplicity of Mozart, with the richness of the newer culture? Must knowledge ever bring weariness of life? Is there no fruit in this Armida garden of art that is without the taste of ashes? Why not accept music without striving to extort from it metaphysical meanings? There is Mozart's G minor Symphony—in its sunny measures lies sanity. Open then the casements of the soul; flood it with music, Mozartean music, and sing with Shelley.

Music when soft voices die
Vibrates in the memory.

Of the letters of Heine to his friend Christiani, now publishing in the Deutsche Rundschau, few lack the peculiar verve of the author of "Atta Troll." This will appear even in the rough paraphrase, given below, of portions of the letter which de-scribes his life at Hamburg, where for a little time he followed idleness and law. He writes:

Hamburg, the whatever it is of December, 1825.

A wretched life here. Rain, snow, and too much to eat. And I resentful at it. By day Hamburg is a great counting-room, by night a great ——. Everybody looks at me as if he wished to parody my Lyrical Intermezzo. And I myself am full of irony and sentimentality. I have looked up your friend, Dr. Halle. He is very amiable, very forth-putting, and a very Jew. In the very first moment he showed himself a Jew in the words, "You are going to be a colleague of mine, then?" Vexed as I was (Kleist's phrase), I said, "Yes, to this extent, that everybody thinks I am here to be a lawyer. But I haven't the least idea what I shall do here. Meanwhile, don't think that I am idle here; on the contrary, wherever I go or am I make verses. Last night I made this stunning song. Isn't it beauti-ful?"

But for you to admit this (to Christiani) I must really write it down, which I hereby do.

They loved each other, but neither
Would be the first to confess;
Like foes they gaz'd at each other,
And would die of their love's distress.

They parted at length, and thereafter
Except in vision, ne'er met;
From life they have long departed,
And scarcely know of it yet.

[Do you know a better song in all German literature?]

Old fellow, that is your best!

But, truly, Christiani, after reading this song, do you really think I am going to be a lawyer here? I am thinking of going to Berlin. My friends there write me a summons and will have the police drag me hence. Gentlemen, let's avoid violence. The "Harzreise" has gone off to Gubitz (the publisher), and I am curious to see how many pine trees the censor will cancel from the High Harz.

G. K. Chesterton writes as follows of the delib-erate and unconscious morals of Tolstoi's tales: "The narrow notion that an artist may not teach is pretty well exploded by now. But the truth of the matter is that an artist teaches far more by his mere background and properties, his landscape, his cos-tume, his idiom and technic—all the part of his work, in short, of which he is probably entirely un-conscious, than by the elaborate and pompous moral dicta which he fondly imagines to be his opinions. The real distinction between the ethics of high art and the ethics of manufactured and di-dactic art lies in the simple fact that the bad fable has a moral while the good fable is a moral. And the real moral of Tolstoi comes out constantly in these stories, the great moral which lies at the heart of all his work, of which he is probably un-conscious, and of which it is quite likely that he would vehemently disapprove. The curious cold white light of morning that shines over all the tales, the folklore simplicity with which 'a man or a woman' are spoken of without further identifica-tion, the love—one might almost say the lust—for the qualities of brute materials, the hardness of wood, and the softness of mud, the ingrained belief in a certain ancient kindliness sitting beside the very cradle of the race of man—these influences are truly moral. When we put beside them the trumpeting and tearing nonsense of the didactic Tolstoi, screaming for an obscene purity, shouting for an inhuman peace, hacking up human life into small sins with a chopper, sneering at men, women and children out of respect to humanity, combining in one chaos of contradictions an unmanly puritan and an uncivilized prig, then, indeed, we scarcely know whither Tolstoi has vanished. We know not what to do with this small and noisy moralist who is in-habiting one corner of a great and good man."

ANOTHER MILLER PUPIL.—Miss Vivia Brewster, a pupil of E. Presson Miller, recently sang in concert at Laredo, Tex. The Times of that city mentions Miss Brewster as follows:

Her sweet voice was instantly recognized as much stronger than when last heard in this city. * * * That her voice and manner charmed those who listened was evidenced by the enthusiastic ap-plause that followed her as she retired from the stage. She makes a magnificent stage appearance and sings so sweetly that she will captivate any audience before which she may appear. She may be sure of an enthusiastic reception and large audience whenever she sees proper to favor the people of this city by appearing before them again.

His American Tour Opens Brilliantly—An Extraordinary List of Engagements.

UNDER the management of Henry Wolfsohn Josef Hofmann has just undertaken the longest concert tour that he has ever made, one of the longest tours, indeed, ever essayed by any pianist in the United States. This tournée will keep the pianist incessantly busy until the beginning of the holidays, when he will enjoy a short respite from his ardous work. After a brief period of rest he will resume his tour, and will be kept busy from then until the last week in March.

This shows the difference between good management and bad management.

Last season Hofmann was handicapped by an inexperienced manager, and his tour consequently proved both short and unsuccessful. Now the great pianist has committed his destinies to a manager of long experience and proved ability, and his present tour promises to be an unexampled success, from all points of view. It certainly has begun brilliantly.

Such has been the influx of requests for Hofmann that Mr. Wolfsohn has been somewhat embarrassed by the multiplicity of engagements offered, and has been forced to exercise the privilege of selection, thereby discarding many of the bookings proposed. The tour, as mapped out, will carry Hofmann all over the United States, and permit him to play in every city of any importance.

The widespread interest aroused by this tour indicates that Hofmann's reputation as a master pianist reaches all parts of the United States. Mr. Hofmann will revisit all the cities in which he has played, and will visit scores of others for the first time.

Hofmann's Remarkable Tour.

The day after his arrival in New York the pianist began his American tour, and accomplished some exceedingly quick work. He reached New York Thursday, November 13. The next morning he rehearsed with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, and gave a recital the same night in New Haven. He appeared Friday afternoon with the New York Philharmonic Society and again with that organization Saturday evening. After this concert he played in the Freundschaft Society's hall. Thus he made a record of four concerts in three days. Monday night Hofmann played in Detroit and last night in Columbus, Ohio. He will at once return East to fill the following engagements:

SLIVINSKI'S SUCCESS WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

JOSEPH SLIVINSKI played last week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston and the critics of the Boston papers accorded him the praise due a great art. Here are the Boston opinions about Slivinski's playing:

Joseph Slivinski appeared at these concerts for the first time although he gave recitals here in 1894 and played with the Wilhelmstein Orchestra in Tremont Temple last season. His performance of the Tschaikowsky Concerto last night was remarkable for musical dash, untiring spirit, variety of tonal gradations, exquisite tone, strength that was not abused, unusual accuracy, and, perhaps, above all, an extraordinary sense of rhythm. The performance of Tschaikowsky's fantastical concerto—a work that is exciting and has haunting beauty in spite of certain passages which are mere routine work, for there is ultra-modern as well as old-fashioned Kapellmeister music—may justly be called great. Mr. Slivinski was an interesting and welcome apparition. Nor is the term apparition here misapplied, for when he came upon the stage he looked like one of Hoffmann's characters, known by Johannes Kreisler and the student Anselmus. He was enthusiastically applauded, and well did he deserve the applause that was loath dic. His recitals this week are looked forward to with genuine interest.—Boston Journal, November 17, 1901.

If there could be a Paganini of the piano Josef Slivinski might well be he. His very appearance is suggestive—the tall, slender, slightly angular figure, the nervous gait, the pale, thin face, overhung with its dense mass of heavy black hair, and barred across with the strangely curved mustache, the piercing eyes and the heavy eyebrows. Then the attitude at the instrument—always one of absolute concentration, whether bowed almost as if to clasp the keyboard or thrown back, as if to survey and hold the complicated mechanism with a magnetic gaze.

The long, slender hands, so flexible upon the elastic wrists that it seems impossible that their motion, so swift and light as almost to elude the eye, should have such immense power, or linger long enough to call forth a definite and enduring tone. In all this there is something eerie and mystic. And then the man plays, as it were, like a man possessed, and infuses into passages which would generally appear as mere figures of technical speech or transitional devices for bridging over from one integral thought to another fire, a boldness, a force, a magnetism, which make them seem in the moment like the most vital and important matters of all.

The technic itself is marvelous, and its range and sweep might have been estimated by taking as mensuration points the vast rolling chords of the introduction, the exquisitely gentle and dainty accompaniment and caressing melody of the andantino semplice and the tremendous octave and figures of the finale. But it all seems to mean so much—not necessarily of explainable thought, as of possessing rhapsodic feeling and intense personality.

The concerto and the player were well pitted; for he had ready and waiting the poetry, the fancy or the emotion which made vivid every one of the scores of fitful mood and varying shades that Tschaikowsky put into this work, which Nicolas Rubinstein, to whom it was written, declared so difficult and intricate as to be impossible of execution.—Boston Herald.

Mr. Slivinski is an artist whose advancement has caused both interest and pleasure. He has been frequently heard in this city and each time he has displayed progressive traits which are very gratifying to his admirers. His selection last evening was Tschaikowsky's Concerto for the piano, No. 1, in B flat minor.

Over twenty-five years ago this piece was first played in Boston by Dr. Hans von Bulow in old Music Hall.

It is a familiar work, and Mr. Slivinski's interpretation is a well known, but it may be said that his effort this year is a decided improvement over the performance he gave here last spring. There was a greater breadth, a finer conception and more artistic phrasing. The first movement was especially well executed, although the entire concerto calls for high praise.

* * * It was, however, a most pleasing performance, and the reception accorded him augurs well for the recitals he is later to give in this city.—Boston Post.

FLORENCE RANSTEAD.

MISS FLORENCE RANSTEAD, an American contralto with a European training and reputation, de her New York début in a recital at the Waldorf-toria, Friday afternoon, November 15. A criticism of recital will be found elsewhere in this issue. She is w on a tour under the management of Mr. Ruben.

Miss Ranstead is of New England extraction, as her her's name and Bragg, that of her mother's family, uld indicate. Miss Ranstead's grandmother is Mrs. incy Adams Gilmore, wife of General Gilmore, who is buried at West Point with high military honors. The ger inherits her musical talent from her mother, a nist and pupil of Joseffy. While of New England line-e, Miss Ranstead was born in Pennsylvania, and in ildhood her parents removed to Baltimore, and then the onumental City became her permanent home. High cial connections opened exclusive doors in London and ris, and pronounced musical gifts did the rest to give e young singer a good beginning of her artistic career. fore going abroad Miss Ranstead studied here with inhold L. Herman. Then she went to Germany and ntinued her studies with Herman. After leaving Ger-ny Miss Ranstead went to Paris and there Bouhy be-me her teacher. It was the French master who gave r the finish and the encouragement to make her début. While studying with Bouhy she became a member of the operatic class, but concert and oratorio are the fields to which she will devote herself and for which she has been trained.

When Miss Ranstead gave a recital in the small Queen's Hall the audience was made up of members of the aristocracy and the leaders of fashionable life in London. Her list of patrons included the Japanese Ambassador, Mr. Choate, the American Ambassador; Lady Denby, Lady Dudley, Sir Redvers Buller and Lady Audrey, Lord and Lady St. Levin and Lady Carden of Templemore.

Musically Miss Ranstead's appearances in England were equally important, for here are some of the things the critics said:

A song recital of interest was given by Miss Florence Ranstead, a young contralto. Her choice of program argues a real love for the best music and a cultivated taste that are in themselves most valuable.—The Times, London.

Miss Florence Ranstead gave a song recital. The program, including as it did Schumann's "Dichterliebe," the air, "Gens duce splendida," from her countryman's (Professor Parker's) "Hora Novissima"; Coleridge-Taylor's "Blood-red Ring" and other equally high-class songs, sufficiently indicated the young singer's artistic aims, her efforts giving much promise.—London Musical Times.

Miss Ranstead sang very tastefully, particularly in two of Edward Elgar's Cycle of Sea Pictures, "Where Corals Lie" and "Sabbath Morning at Sea," in which the unity of lyrics and music furnishes a delightful imagery of "Rolling Worlds of Wave" and Sabbath music "brooding soft on waters drear."—Bolton Daily Chronicle.

Miss Ranstead chose a very ambitious program. She was quite successful.—The Lady.

Miss Ranstead contributed Coleridge-Taylor's "Corn Song" and "Where Corals Lie" and "Sabbath Morning at Sea," all with painstaking accuracy and in good voice.—Bolton Evening News.

Miss Florence Ranstead sang admirably.—Bolton Journal.

Miss Ranstead's fine contralto voice was heard to the greatest advantage in Elgar's Sea Pictures, in the performance of which the reputation she had established in the earlier part of the evening was thoroughly sustained.—West Bromwich Chronicle.

Miss Florence Ranstead, an American contralto of deep, full and rich tone, gave a good interpretation of the Wicked Fay, her singing of "To the Feast I Come Unbidden," "As I Sit at the Spinning Wheel" and the incantation, "Spring from the Earth, Red Roses," being marked by dramatic fervor and musicianly skill.—West Bromwich Free Press.

The Baltimore Herald of October 27 published a column sketch, with portrait of Miss Ranstead, in which her career was referred to in these extracts:

Miss Florence Ranstead, the talented Baltimore contralto, who was so successful in London musical circles last season, arrived in Baltimore Saturday night and is now the guest of her sister, Mrs. J. Baker Hull, 1026 Cathedral street.

Miss Ranstead has been on the Continent and in England for the past four years, studying under several of the most celebrated masters for the first three years, and then entering upon her professional duties last season. Before leaving for abroad it will be remembered that she made a decided impression in the local musical world, and appeared in several amateur productions, including the "Pirates" and the "Patapsco." * * *

While in Paris she sang in concert in the gallery of the Champ Elysées with Miss Madeleine Godard, sister of the famous composer, as the violinist.

The season in England was divided between a tour of the provinces and appearances in London. In the metropolis she sang in "The Messiah" performance on Good Friday, at the People's Palace, and also appeared at the Crystal Palace in concert. In the provinces she sang only in oratorio and concert.

Miss Ranstead will spend this winter in a tour of the States, and in the spring will return to London. She is now under the management of Ruben, who was formerly connected with Grau.

HANCHETT'S LECTURE RECITALS.—The second course of the Hanchett lecture recitals given in the Assembly Hall of Adelphi College, Brooklyn, is attracting as much interest as the first course of the autumn. "Musical Contrasts" will be the subject throughout the season, with sub-topics for each individual lecture recital. The sub-topics for the present course are: November 11, "The Vitality of the Older and Newer Music"; November 18, "'Faust' Music"; November 25, "The Sonority of the Older and Newer Music"; December 2, "The Tone Colors of Classic and Modern Composers." Dr. Henry G. Hanchett gave the lecture on November 11, and in the illustrations he was assisted by Miss Laura Phelps, violinist, he himself giving the piano numbers. Dr. John Cornelius Griggs, who is the instructor of musical history at Adelphi College, gave the second lecture last Monday afternoon. Dr. Hanchett will deliver the third next Monday afternoon, and also the fourth, which, however, will be given in the evening. At the closing lecture Dr. Hanchett will have the assistance of Maxwell Hood's orchestra, Miss Carolyn At Lee, soprano, and Mr. Andrews, baritone.

ALF. KLINGENBERG, OF HARDIN COLLEGE.—The Scandinavian pianist and teacher, principal of the musical department at Hardin College, Mexico, Mo., was recently married to Miss Alexandra Mowinckel, and while in St. Louis on this important errand he was invited to give a piano recital and also to play at a choral symphony concert.

The program includes compositions by Beethoven, David Popper, Daniel Van Goens, Schumann, Arthur Foote, Chopin, Rubinstein and Strauss-Tausig.

Concert goers are glad to learn that William A. Willett, the well-known baritone, of the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory, will sing at the Germania Singing Society's concert in this city on November 21.

The Hamlin Company announces the following November engagements for its artists: Genevieve Clark Wilson, Indianapolis November 20 and St. Louis November 21; George Hamlin, Pittsburg November 26 with the Mozart Club, and Kenwood Club, Chicago, November 29; Charles W. Clark, St. Joseph, Mo., November 13, Des Moines November 14, Pittsburg November 26, and Kenwood Club, Chicago, November 29; Holmes Cowper, Alton, Ill., November 13, Evanston November 21, and Davenport, Ia., November 25; Henry Willis Newton, St. Joseph, Mo., November 13; Leon Marx, Kenwood Club, Chicago, November 29; Helen Smyser, Kenwood Club, Chicago, November 29.

Henry Willis Newton and Charles W. Clark will sing the tenor and baritone parts of Sullivan's "Golden Legend" with the Choral Society, St. Joseph, Mo., on November 13.

From Alton, Ill., comes news to the effect that President McKay of Shurtleff College wisely has prohibited rag-time music in literary society programs.

It is said that the students defy the order; that a crisis will come at the next meeting of the literary societies. Developments will be awaited with interest.

The Spiering Violin School's first recital of the season is announced for Saturday, November 16, in the Assembly Room, Fine Arts Building.

The Hinshaw Stock Company School of Drama gave a successful performance of "The Merchant of Venice" at the Grand Opera House on November 12. Marvin Victor Hinshaw, brother of W. W. Hinshaw, director of the affiliated School of Opera, appearing as Shylock.

NOVEMBER 16, 1901.

Rudolph Ganz, of the Chicago Musical College, has recently composed an artistic love song, "Would You? Would I?" The words are by James P. Whedon.

Mrs. Marie Hoag Haughey, soprano, will take part in the Evanston Musical Club's performance of "The Messiah" on December 19.

A number of talented singers, who promise to become prominent artists, will be introduced to the public this season by their competent instructor, Mrs. Hess-Burr.

Helen Buckley, the soprano, interprets sacred music no less effectively than concert numbers. At the West Presbyterian Church last Sunday evening her singing was both artistic and impressive.

Under the auspices of the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory a play, "Who Shall Win Him?" will be presented on November 27.

Mme. Ragna Linne, soprano; Elaine de Sellem, contralto; Claude Cunningham, baritone, and W. C. E. Seeboeck, pianist, will be the soloists at the second ball. concert in Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, on December 12.

Mme. Sarah Grand, who has been visiting Chicago this week, is reported to have said: "Why do you hurry in Chicago? Are you rushing to make money? Don't you know money is a bore?" The Inter-Ocean affirms that when asked if she were not writing an historic novel, her reply was: "No, I haven't the habit."

THE APOLLO CLUB'S CONCERT.

The eminent contralto Josephine Jacoby will be heard at the Apollo Club's concert in the Auditorium on Monday, December 2. By request "Samson and Delila" will be given under the capable and experienced direction of Harrison M. Wild. Charles Gauthier, tenor; Herman Devries, baritone, and J. W. Lince are to sing the parts of Samson, the High Priest and Abimelech, and H. W. Newton and Walter Root, tenors, will assist. The Apollo Club will have the support of the Chicago Orchestra.

A private and informal studio recital will be given by George Hamlin, the well-known tenor, at Kimball Hall on Thursday afternoon, November 21. In reference to this event "Willie Dearborn," one of this city's social editors, writes: "Mr. Hamlin is one of the few tenors I know whose friends like them for themselves as well as the singing. If you had heard him up at Green Lake last summer during regatta week you would not have blamed the birds of the region for migrating to Milwaukee, as they did, in sheer envy."

Miss Blauer, contralto, who studies with Mrs. Hess-Burr, will give a recital before the Tuesday Club, of Detroit, on December 3.

Prof. W. F. Bentley, of Knox Conservatory of Music, Galesburg, Ill., recently gave an interesting lecture recital in Beecher Chapel, Galesburg.

Mary Healy Mullette.

Mrs. Mullette's singing made so favorable an impression at the recent St. Vincent Church concert, at which William C. Carl played, that the gifted soprano was forthwith engaged for an important concert on November 28 at the Convent of the Sacred Heart. She has been secured also for a musical event at St. Patrick's Church in this city on December 1. Last Sunday evening she sang some of Mozart's music very effectively at St. Vincent's Church.

Henry W. Newton.

The Waukegan (Ill.) Daily Sun has thus commented upon the singing of a well-known Chicagoan:

Henry W. Newton's voice was thoroughly satisfactory. It is clear, resonant and very musical. The church rang with his powerful tones, and in soft passages Mr. Newton sang high or low with equal ease. In his singing of "Thou Art the King," accompanied by full organ, Mr. Newton brought the concert to a triumphal close.

Mr. Newton is under the direction of the Hamlin Company.

Nordica Coming.

On November 25 this famous soprano will be heard in the Chicago Auditorium. November 30 is the date of her appearance in Milwaukee.

Maconda with the Mendelssohn Club.

Concert goers do not forget that Charlotte Maconda, the eminent soprano, will appear at the Mendelssohn Club's concert on December 17.

Have you heard Leon Marx play? He is an exceptionally gifted violinist.

Charles W. Clark, the baritone, does not confine his singing to concert work. Large congregations are impressed and inspired by his beautiful voice and noble interpretations at the Sunday services in Studebaker Hall, Fine Arts Building.

Sydney Biden.

The artistic singing of Sydney Biden, baritone, won high praise in Milwaukee last week.

A Canadian Estimate.

"Miss De Sellem," said the Winnipeg Daily Tribune, referring on a special occasion to Elaine De Sellem, of Chicago, "possesses a rich, velvety, contralto voice, of evener quality throughout than is usually heard on the concert platform. She has been well trained and sang with dramatic power Goring-Thomas' 'My Heart Is Weary.'"

Allen Spencer.

Allen Spencer followed with three short numbers for piano by which he was enabled to show considerable versatility of interpretation. He played with repose and complete technical mastery.—Musical Times, Chicago.

Allen Spencer, the pianist, was charming. His execution was perfect, and his playing full of expression. Each note was clear and distinct, whether it was soft and rippling or loud and full of force.—Lafayette (Ind.) Journal.

He has a splendid conception of music, an artistic touch, wonderful strength and a method which seems to be peculiarly his own.—Lafayette (Ind.) Courier.

Mr. Spencer is a musician of unusual merit. The Liszt Etude, although the last number, was applauded so deafeningly that Mr. Spencer was obliged to play again. This is the first time in the history of entertainments in Atchison that the last number on a program has been encored.—Atchison (Kan.) Globe.

On the afternoon of November 11 the Amateur Musical Club gave its second concert of the season in Music Hall, Fine Arts Building. The event was a success.

Mrs. Regina Watson's School of Piano Playing is enjoying a particularly prosperous season.

"Love and Whist," a one act operetta, will be presented by some of Mrs. Hess-Burr's younger pupils in Assembly Hall, Fine Arts Building, on December 21.

Sherwood School Faculty Concert.

The annual faculty concert of the Sherwood Music School was held in Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, on the afternoon of November 12, when Leone Langdon-Key, Mathilde Henchling, Clara Murray, Georgia Kober Barnum, Leon Marx, Mary Dennis Manning, Shirley Gandell, W. H. Neidlinger and Katherine Hofmann were heard in an excellent program. To illustrate in what deservedly high local esteem this faculty is held, the following account of this event is reproduced from the Chicago American:

Sherwood School Faculty.

One of the most delightful concerts thus far given this season took place yesterday afternoon at Music Hall, when the annual faculty program of the Sherwood Conservatory of Music was given.

Some of the members who appeared were of exceptional ability as executive musicians, a fact reflecting great credit upon an institution which is carrying on a good work.

Leon Marx, who played two movements of the Mendelssohn Concerto for violin and with Mrs. Georgia Kober Barnum a sonata for piano and violin, is an artist whose rank is appreciably increasing very fast. Yesterday he gave every evidence of the qualities which belong only to the great player.

Mrs. Leone Langdon-Key, organist of Isaiah Temple and a concert player of established reputation, added to the laurels which she has already gained. Her performance of Dubois' "Fantaisie Triumphale" was distinguished by brilliancy of manual and pedal execution, musicianly balance and effects of registration altogether uncommon.

Clara Murray, whose popularity as a harpist is second to none in the West, played two numbers and Miss Mathilde Henchling and Shirley Gandell sang well chosen songs.

Mary Dennis Manning, a capable reader, and W. H. Neidlinger, who sang several of his own compositions, completed the list of performers.

The audience was large and representative.

A newly organized institution in this city is the School of Church Music, directed by the Chicago Theological Seminary.

The Hamlin Company and Charles Beach.

An important managerial combination is shortly to be effected by the Hamlin Company, Louis Evans president, and Charles Beach, director of the Chicago Orchestra. Influential persons will hold stock in this organization, whose operations will extend from Pittsburg to Denver. On April 1, 1901, work for the concert season of 1902-1903 will be entered into by this new and comprehensive combination, the name of which has not as yet been selected. But "what's in a name?"

The Third Orchestral Concert.

A particularly interesting program was presented yesterday afternoon in masterly fashion by the Chicago Orchestra at the Auditorium. Brahms' Symphony No. 2, in D major, and the Saint-Saëns symphonic poem, "La Jeunesse d'Hercule," especially were worthy of attentive study. Other numbers included Gluck's overture, "Iphigenia in

A large and remarkably enthusiastic audience was present, and both musicians were compelled to respond to encores. George Shapiro was the accompanist.

SEVERN VIOLIN PUPIL.—Charles M. Bickford, a violinist, who has studied with Edmund Severn, is winning laurels for himself and his teacher. Recent reports of his playing include:

The violinist, Charles M. Bickford, afforded much pleasure to the audience in his two solos. Especially beautiful was his artistic rendering of the well-known Schubert Serenade.—Worcester Telegram.

The violin solos of Mr. Bickford were rendered with a delicacy of touch and precision of tone that showed he was master of the instrument.—Montpelier (Vt.) Free Press.

Charles M. Bickford, the violinist, was most favorably received by the audience. His rendering of De Beriot's Seventh Concerto was excellent.—Springfield Republican.

The soloist of the evening, Mr. Bickford, of Springfield, gave two violin solos that were delightful. His technic is ample and he plays with a pureness of tone that stamps him as an artist.—Windsor Locks, Conn.

Mr. Bickford's violin solo was received with storms of applause, and after bowing several times he was finally compelled to respond with an encore.—Springfield Union.

The playing of Charles Bickford, of Springfield, was superb and brought forth much applause.—Readsboro (Vt.) Enterprise.

Charles Bickford gave an enjoyable violin solo that was heartily applauded.—Boston Globe.

The violin solos by Charles Bickford were most captivating and were warmly received. His rendering of the difficult "Faust" Fantaisie was an excellent bit of work.—Amherst (Mass.) Weekly.

Mr. Bickford's violin playing is remarkable for its professional quality. He performs difficult technical feats with accuracy and power and, what is better, he commands with his bow the full, almost vocal tones of the instrument for which the amateur searches in vain.—Greenfield Gazette and Courier.

MORRIS PIANO SCHOOL.—The pupils of the Morris Piano School gave a most interesting recital on last Saturday. Selections from the works of Chopin, Bach, Moszkowski, Grieg, DeMuth and other composers were played with intelligence and finish. Mrs. Morris closed the recital by playing a Caprice by Moszkowski in her usual artistic manner.

The pupils who played were Mrs. Harrison, Miss Isabel Harrison, Miss Marie Overstreet, Miss Agnes Maher and Masters Loraine Schullinger and Fred and Edward Williams.

BOISE, BEGAS AND BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

BEFORE referring the reader to some late criticisms on the performance of Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler, pianist by the Grace of God and the Muses, we reproduce herewith a letter of the celebrated teacher of composition, late of Berlin, now of the Peabody Institute, Baltimore—O. B. Boise—to the Baltimore News, a letter that tells of an event that transpired when Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler played in Berlin:

[Baltimore News, Saturday, October 26, 1900.]

Bloomfield-Zeisler, who gives the sixth recital of the Peabody's this year's series, is a remarkable artist. Her art instinct is always true, and her slight frame seems to hold an inexhaustible store of vital energy.

Some years since the great German sculptor Reinhold Begas, who is an ardent lover of music and a good amateur 'cellist, watched her intently during one of her performances at the Berlin Philharmonic. His enthusiasm was unbounded. He was captivated by her personality as well as by her playing. He said that the range of her distinct moods was phenomenal—from a tenderness that was childlike to a dramatic intensity that was like a tigress fighting for her young. These moods were doubly interesting to him the pictorial artist—because so clearly mirrored in her features and attitudes.

Bloomfield-Zeisler is a pianist by the grace of God.

O. B. BOISE.

It is not thoroughly fitting to reprint in this column criticisms published in the smaller cities on an artist of the dimensions of Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, who, being in demand in every city of the land from Boston to San Francisco, has an enormous amount of criticism issued on her playing constantly. We have before us the Davenport Daily Leader, the Davenport Times, the Davenport Democrat. All these papers unite in greeting her as one of the leaders of the present day of pianism, the Democrat calling her the Princess of Pianists. To reprint in detail the criticisms from Davenport might apply with propriety to artists usually, but not to such as belong to the calibre of Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler; she is beyond that.

Brooklyn Arion Concert.

THE Brooklyn Arion gave a choral and orchestral concert at the Arion Club house in Arion place last Sunday evening. Arthur Claassen conducted, and the program included two compositions which the composers dedicated to the society. To sing as the Brooklyn Arion sings leaves very little for the critic to say, for it is as good choral singing as one can hope to hear this side of heaven. The basses are well-nigh perfect and the tenors are better than formerly. There is also improvement in the singing of the Ladies' Chorus.

The choral numbers dedicated to the Arion which the society sang were "Bridge Toll," by Kirchl, and "The Message of Song," by Meyer-Olbersleben. The former is a semi-humorous selection and it was sung with delightful appreciation of the text, and as a matter of course had to be repeated.

The other numbers sung by the Maennerchor were "The Little Chapel," by Becker; "Rustle of Spring," by Munzinger; "At the Well," by Lindlar, and "Mädchen Sind wie der Wind," by Kroegel. The Ladies' Chorus sang two charming compositions by Bruno Oscar Klein, "No Stars in Heaven" and "Trutzlied" (both poems being by Paul Heyse); "A Little Song," by Berger, and "When We Two Were Maying," by Spielter. A good orchestra played under Claassen's baton "The Husitska," overture by Dvorák, and dance of "The Will o' t Wisps," from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." T string orchestra played the andante from Tschaikowsk Quartet, op. 3, and "Zweigespräch," by Bruno Osc Klein. The choral numbers by Klein, sung by the Ladi Chorus, and "The Message of Song" were also acco panied by the orchestra.

WHY NOT?

Editors The Musical Courier:

DO you suppose it would be possible to engage Tere Carreño and her new prospective husband, togetl with the three ex-husbands, for a concert tour? It wo give a great singer, a great violinist and two great pia ists. The new husband could tune the piano. The a gregation could be very properly named "The Tere Carreño Consort Company." It would play to big mon If my wheat corner works out right I would give $300,(for 100 concerts of the consorts. Do you think it co be arranged? Yours anxiously,

NIEBUHR WITH LIEDERKRANZ.—Miss Helen Niebu the young American contralto who has just returned fr an extended course of study under Bouhy in Paris, a brought the unqualified indorsement of the critics b with her, has been engaged to sing at the first conc given by the New York Liederkranz this season, n Sunday evening, November 24. Miss Niebuhr scored notable success at her recent appearance in Milwaukee, the appended press notices testify:

Miss Niebuhr, the contralto, possesses a beautiful voice, g carrying quality, artistic finish, with a graceful, pleasing prese and a fascinating style. She sang "Little Boy Blue," by Joy "At Twilight," by Nevin; "My Love," by Marzials, and o selections, among them "The Boatman's Song," by Blumenthal, Mr. Biden, baritone.—Sentinel, November 5, 1901.

Miss Helen Niebuhr has a large and sonorous contralto vo beautifully schooled, and she sang with musical inspiration, fe and fine conception.—Journal, November 5, 1901.

Miss Niebuhr is a handsome woman, tall and statues with a voice to match. "My Love Is Come," given as an enc was among her best numbers. She should be good in oratori Evening Wisconsin, November 5, 1901.

Miss Niebuhr, a pupil of Bouhy, made her first appearance Milwaukee, singing in the trio, "Queen of Night," and afterw in a group of solos, of which "Little Boy Blue," by Joyce, "Still Is the Night," found most favor with the audience, so m so that she had to respond with an encore, "My Love Is Com Miss Niebuhr has a rich contralto voice, which she uses with int gence.—Free Press, November 5, 1901.

THOMAS S. GORE.—Thomas Sinclair Gore, the Canad baritone, is a newcomer to New York. One of his earli instructors was the late Carl Formes, once the great basso of his day. He afterward perfected his voice cult with the successful Italian maestros Testa and Pablo Bengardi. Until recently Mr. Gore has been prominent musical circles in that most critical of New World cit the City of Mexico, where his abilities won him a f place among the singers of that city. Mr. Gore is a true b tone, his range being from A flat to A flat, two comple octaves, enabling him to successfully render a large riety of music. Once he is known here we predict a s cess for him in the concert field. He sang last Satur at the 125th anniversary memorial services of the Ba of Fort Washington, held by Sons of the Revolution.

THE ARION CONCERT.

By Otto Floersheim.

MONG the many observations, old and new ones, which a visitor to this city is bound to make when e ning after a prolonged absence, not one of the least rtant to a musician is the increased interest the rican born citizens are taking in the cultivation of cal intercourse with a branch of the art which for- y was deemed to be the sole or almost exclusive do- of the German element of the population.

did not wonder so much at the fact that the first phony concert here of the Boston orchestral organi- n was completely sold out and that the audience at egie Hall bore an unquestionably American aspect. t made more of an impression upon me were the close tion and the evident appreciation of all good points d by the band, as well as the vocalists, shown by this ic, which, not like a German audience in Germany, been brought up upon a diet of Haydn, Mozart and hoven before its Wagner was meeted out to it. Here ner reigns supreme, and his music is appreciated to a ee which to a casual observer—mind you, only to a l one, and one that is not well versed in the char- istics of the American nation—might easily be mis- for a fad. It was not probably, however, the ex- e Wagner program which drew so large a crowd, the reputation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra likewise something to do with this, and let me say here, without intending any interference with the isms of my respected and beloved colleagues, that I the quality of tone emitted by the Boston body of s the most exquisite and euphonious I ever heard an orchestra, including both the Berlin permanent nizations, the Royal as well as the Philharmonic estra.

ropos of a Philharmonic Orchestra, I observed with action that the New York one has at last also struck a of progressiveness. When I saw the program for Saturday's first concert of the season I was strongly nded of Galileo, the great astronomer, who even be- prison bars declared of the earth: "In spite of all it oving!" Yes, my dear and respected readers, the armonic, the New York Philharmonic, also is mov- orward under the Paur that be. O, ye shades of ibald McMartin, what would you say if last winter could have beheld Richard Strauss' "Heldenleben," now Siegmund von Hausegger's three part sym- ic poem, "Barbarossa," upon the program of a Phil- onic concert? Richard Arnold—yes, the very same ard Arnold who sat there as concertmaster under dore Thomas nearly a quarter of a century ago— d perfectly rejuvenated when he took up his bow and d his fiddle under his chin in response to Paur's for attention. Thus "the world do move," indeed.

this, however, has nothing to do with the original vation with which I started out, viz., that of the in- d interest of Americans in German male chorus sing- Of this I became cognizant at last Sunday night's first rt of the Arion, when I found the tastefully redec- d and repainted hall of this great vocal society filled erflowing with an audience in which the formerly y German element was amalgamated to a strongly ptible degree with native American citizens, who, her with their families and friends, have become ers, some of them even singing or so-called "active" ers, of the German male chorus.

regards the singing itself, I was delighted to notice he Arion has upheld, during the nine years which elapsed since its grand triumphal tour through Ger- the same elevated, artistic standing that won for rels such as no other vocal society on this or the side of the Atlantic Ocean ever garnered before. The ould seem to speak for itself sufficiently for the value of Frank Van der Stucken's successor, and you will grant me that to take up the baton of one of America's best conductors and finest musicians, and to do it successfully, means that one must needs be "another" one. Whatever one may think of Julius Lorenz as an orchestral conductor —and from the proofs I witnessed on Sunday night I am by no means inclined to overrate him in this direction—as a trainer and leader of a male chorus he takes a very high rank. The well selected, fresh vocal material, especially the brilliant quality of the first tenors and the luscious sonority of the second basses, as well as the excellent tonal balance, are still the same as they were a decade ago. Precision of attack, homogeneousness of dynamic shading and above all purity of intonation distinguished all of the society's vocal offerings at their first concert, even in so difficult an a capella quartet as Franz Curti's "Die Toten vom Iltis." The selection of this number, however, was one with which I should find fault, the only one in the make-up of the program. The text is a pæan—and the music of course is also intended as such, although it does not quite match the words—for a piece of Cæsarism the like of which, if true, cannot be found equaled in the pages of history of mankind. The officers and crew of the German man-o'-war Iltis, which vessel was wrecked in a typhoon off Shantung in 1896, were reported to have gone down to their watery grave with a hurrah for the emperor. It may be that the story is only a canard, but if it be true that a crew of Christians died in a bravado instead of in prayer, I think the act ought hardly to be made the subject of a poem, or the poem to be set to music, or least of all, the music to be sung by members of a vocal society who are citizens of a free republic and not subjects of H. M. the Emperor of Germany. Am I right or wrong? If the latter, I am willing to stand corrected.

In every other respect Mr. Lorenz's selections were beyond cavil, and, as they one and all consisted of novelties, even the most blasé of music critics could find something to interest him among half a dozen quartets that were so excellently sung last Sunday night. The best one seemed to me Eugen d'Albert's setting of Ludwig Tick's "Herbstlied," the weakest one Simon Breu's "Lied in der Freunde." That's probably the reason why it was redemanded.

There were two soloistic attractions at this Arion concert, both of them well and judiciously chosen. The instrumental one was Alvin Schroeder, the renowned first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose warm and pure tone and masterly handling of the instrument have too often been praised in these columns to need reiteration. His selections consisted of Max Bruch's Hebraic "Kol Nidrei," with orchestra, and three equally well-known smaller pieces, of which César Cui's "Berceuse" was the most valuable and Popper's "Vito" of course the most effective one. It goes without saying that Mr. Schroeder was encored.

The other artist was a newcomer, young, charming of stage presence and sweet and modest of demeanor, as becomes a débutante. I speak of Miss Estelle Liebling, descendant of a musical family and one of the most promising of young vocalists that have come before the public of late years. I predicted success for her and a bright career upon the concert platform when I heard her at her Berlin début at the Singakademie last winter, and now my predictions are about to be verified quicker even than I anticipated. Miss Liebling's voice, although a light soprano of the coloratura—and a very perfect one at that—denomination, has at the same time a rare velvety quality, which I have never before noted in a soprano leggiero. It is a sympathetic, pleasing and at moments even bewitching voice, which must, by means of its inherent charm, naturally appeal to every sensuous ear, and which does so doubly to an educated one, because of the musical attributes of Miss Liebling, who in her delivery evinces that she is exquisitely and genuinely musical to the tips of her dainty fingers. Only from such an artist one could still endure so hackneyed a coloratura aria as the "Oiseau Charmant" from "La Perle du Brésil," while the public enjoyed it so immensely that they wildly insisted upon a repetition of this musical rot. To the musician, however, the refined singing and polished delivery of such dainty songs as Max Stange's "Die Bekehrte" and Schubert's 'Echo" were a perfect delight, while Alabieff's perennial "Nightingale" was made less of an enjoyment only because, first of all, it is in itself not a valuable contribution to the musical literature of our day, and because, secondly, the official accompanist of the Arion played havoc with the by no means very distingué harmonies of the said "Nightingale."

Walter John Hall.—The well-known teacher of many prominent church and concert singers is busy as ever, having some most promising pupils, who in due course of time are sure to be heard. His recital in Carnegie Lyceum some time since showed in part what he has accomplished in his specialty of voice culture, and his many pupils before the public eye are proof of his worth as a teacher. Mr. Hall combines that rare thing in a teacher of voice, namely, good musicianship of the broadest kind, with rare taste and skill in the placing and bringing out of the various voices which come in his care.

CINCINNATI, November 16, 1901.

SIGNOR ALBINO GORNO, of the College of Music faculty, has a very large class this year of advanced and talented piano pupils. As a teacher his fame has long ago reached international ground. His pupils everywhere represent all that is best and artistic in pianistic training. Mr. Gorno's system of training is broad, intelligent and many sided. He studies the individuality of each pupil and molds it into the natural channels which will bring out the best results. It is no wonder that with a teacher such as Albino Gorno, who is able to impart the philosophy and raison d'être of music as well as its practical requirements up to the highest point of finish, any number of students should be attracted to him for the higher education—and that to them it seems unnecessary to go to Europe in quest of masters, when so acknowledged a master is found at home. All his pupils are much devoted to him. Recently one of them, a graduate of the college, Miss Mary Venable, sent a letter to Professor Gantvoort regarding her former teacher, from which the following excerpts will be of interest:

"Do not practice so much—think! Always ask yourself the reason for everything; investigate the causes of your difficulties. One can practice technic mentally without touching the piano at all. If one were to study pieces as carefully as one does etudes, special technical work would not be needed. A quarter of an hour of practice, intently and thoughtfully employed, is better than three hours of meaningless or careless practice.

"It is not, as you will find in your teaching, so much the practice, but the thought, that you will find it difficult to get from pupils. What a pity is all the wasted effort given to exercises. Czerny, Cramer, even Chopin and Liszt themselves do no good with their etudes unless the student thinks. What quantities of studies, good in themselves, are put to no purpose and worse by misdirected energy. Aim to make your pupils think; that is always the difficulty; and make them listen. Cultivate your own ear, too. Listen and hear! Analyze always, and make your ear judge of effects. You cannot cultivate the ear too much. Neither written nor spoken words, nor, of course, the fingers, should direct the manner of playing a composition, but the ear.

"While Signor Gorno lays the greatest stress on bringing out the emotional and intellectual content of a piece, he constantly instructs the student as to the best technical means to this end, at the same time encouraging him to independent thought and discovery. So detailed is his scientific analysis of technic that I find in the index to my notes no less than thirty-two headings under the term 'technic,' each of which is also subdivided many times, as for instance, 'fingers—independence of, preparation of, inclination of; inner fingers over outer; changing on key, fingers close to key, raised high from key, pressed deep into key, same finger repeatedly used, sentience of, several fingers on one key, draw toward you, strike on fleshy part of, strike on tips, curve, extend, one finger scale, thumb on black keys, on point, on side, on black keys, on white keys, second joint of, first joint of, scale with thumb,' &c. To go into detail as to the various touches and positions of the fingers, hand, wrist and arm which he teaches, and the reasons for their use, would require a volume in itself.

"If it could be said that Signor Gorno is more particular as to any one musical detail than another, it would perhaps be rhythm. But he as constantly insists on good and varied tone production (my index refers to sixty-four sub-heads), the correct use of the pedals, the hearing of ensemble music, especially the strings and the orchestra, and the study of theory with its audible application in playing. He causes his students to study vocal music, in order to gain appreciation of melody; to mentally figure the bass, and to make the hearer feel the progression of voices."

Owing to Dr. Thrasher being suddenly called out of the city, the third of the series of lectures on the "Voice" was unfortunately postponed. These lectures—in which increased interest has been taken—will continue every Friday afternoon throughout the season. Dr. Thrasher delivers the third lecture on next Friday afternoon at 4.30 in the Lyceum.

A large audience is expected to attend the first chamber concert of the season by the Marien String Quartet Wednesday evening, November 20, in the Lyceum.

The third of the series of lectures on the "History of Music" was given by A. J. Gantvoort Monday afternoon at 1:30 in the Lyceum.

The college chorus and orchestra rehearsals have been exceptionally well attended, and Mr. Van der Stucken is well pleased. The chorus are studying "Come, Sisters, Come," by Mackenzie; "Echoes from Moravia," by Dvorák, and a "motet" by Kulenkampff. The orchestra are studying a suite by Grieg, menuet by Händel, lullaby by Franko, "Air de Danse" by Gretry, "Sarabande de l'Opera" by Campra and "Marche de la Caravane" by Gretry.

The third invitation event by the School of Expression will be given Saturday afternoon, November 30, in the Odeon, at 2.30 o'clock. The subject, "An Hour with Mark Twain."

Three dramatic and musical evenings will be given for the benefit of the Church of the Nativity on Price Hill. The participants are all College of Music talent. The first event will occur on next Thursday evening, November 21. The musical portion of the program will be furnished by Miss Kathryn C. Gibbons, soprano; Miss Lillian Burton, mezzo-soprano, and Hamilton B. Taaffe, tenor, all of whom are pupils of W. S. Sterling. The dramatic readings will be under the direction of Miss Mannheimer, and will be assisted by her C. S. E. Dramatic Club.

The United Singers, of this city, Louis Ehrgott director, an organization composed of all the German singing societies of Cincinnati, paid a visit last Sunday to the tomb of Gen. William H. Harrison (Old Tippecanoe) at North Bend, Ohio, which is only a few miles distant from the city. Three large traction cars were required to transport the Cincinnati singers to the sacred spot. When they arrived impressive memorial exercises were held. Hundreds of people had gathered on the grass plot around the general's tomb. Mayor W. H. Gleason, on behalf of the people of North Bend, delivered an address of welcome to the visiting singers, at the conclusion of which President Charles G. Schmidt, of the United Singers, was introduced and made a few remarks on the life of the general. President Schmidt deposited a large wreath on the grave.

Judge Bode delivered an address in German. Two beautiful selections were given in chorus, after which Hon. Jacob H. Bromwell made a stirring address in English.

Mr. Bromwell, who is quite an orator, spoke in part as follows:

Probably no character in American history, and few in the history of the world, has combined in his life record so many elements of romance and so much success from small beginnings, or has entered more completely into the necessities of the times in which he lived than did William Henry Harrison, whose memory we celebrate to-day.

After Ohio had been admitted as a State and the remainder of the Northwest Territory had been formed into the Territory of Indiana, he was made its first Governor and Superintendent of Indian Affairs.

Unfortunately for the peace of the new Territory, the machinations and misrepresentations of British agents had been sufficient to stir up a feeling of discontent and distrust among the powerful tribes with whom they dealt. A leader, too, of uncommon ability was at hand in this crisis. Tecumseh and his brother, the prophet, quietly commenced an organization which was to include all the hostile savages in the Territory, and whose object was, a concerted attack upon all the settlements, to destroy and drive the white intruders into their territory. Indian depredations began to be more numerous, and finally Harrison became convinced that a bloody Indian war was inevitable. He obtained the consent of the Government to establish a military post at Tippecanoe, and with a small detail of about 350 regular infantry and something over 500 volunteers, he marched, on September 26, 1811, to a point near where Terre Haute now is and established Fort Harrison, and then pressed on toward Tippecanoe. On November 6 he reached the vicinity of that town and was met by messengers from the Indians who proposed a council for the discussion of matters in controversy for the following day.

But Harrison, while apparently consenting to the proposed council, was perfectly convinced that it was the intention of the pro-

EDUARD REUSS AND MME. LUISE REUSS-BELCE.

THE names of these two artists first became generally known at the great Music Festival at Carlsruhe in 1885. Here Luise Belce sang Sieglinde in "Die Walküre" of Wagner, and gained a success such as no other singer had yet reached in this role. Here, too, she sang the "Mignon" of Liszt, and was led to the platform by Liszt himself amid the loud applause of the enthusiastic public. Here, too, she, while still a "Braut," sang the "Brautlieder" of Cornelius, accompanied on the piano by Eduard Reuss. Eight days later the marriage of the pair took place.

At this time the whole musical world of Germany who were there assembled were convinced that Luise Belce was one of the elect, called to extraordinary achivements. What she had promised she fuifilled as Frau Luise Reuss-Belce, and proved it when she created the Cassandra in the first part of the "Trojans" of Berlioz, a role which, before her, no other singer, even in France, had mastered. By this performance she gained the reputation of a great tragedienne and of one of the greatest singers of the present? We meet seldom enough to-day artists who to the fame of an important singer unite that of a great representative artist. And this is the reason for our devoting our warmest interests to Luise Belce. On her departure from Carlsruhe the whole sympathies of the public followed her, and after her last performance, in which she sang Carmen, the horses were taken from her carriage and the crowd of admirers drew it in triumph to her dwelling.

Frau Reuss-Belce had the same success in Wiesbaden, Covent Garden Theatre, in London, as Sieglinde and at Bayreuth. In Dresden, as Brünnhilde in the "Götterdämmerung," she attracted the greatest attention, and the whole press assigned to her an exceptional position among her fellows, and especially did the highest justice to the genius of her work. What makes Luise Belce so great and so sympathetic? It is the complete devotion of her own nature to her task, that self-sacrificing absorption into it, which creates the true priesthood of art. On this account in the stage figures of this artist there is not to be traced the slightest thought of personal success, of mere external stage effects, of putting forward her own personality. In the performances of Luise Reuss-Belce we see only the great thing, we see only the Cassandra, the Sieglinde, the Brünnhilde, the Isolde. Her grand performances show a perfect victory of great artistic feeling over the personal factor.

Eduard Reuss, a native of New York, comes from the best school. Hans von Bülow was in Hanover his teacher, and in 1878 Franz Liszt undertook the direction of the talent he prized so highly. The master recommended this pupil of genius as a collaborator in the great Thuringian Music Festival in Arnstadt, and a year later personally introduced him to the international public of Baden-Baden as one of his favorites. There Reuss played the "Danse Macabre" of Liszt, and there Liszt heard for the first time this piece. "I did not believe that I had done so well," said the master to his scholar. In Berlin Reuss gained recognition of being one of the first Beethoven players of the present. His enthusiasm for Liszt, and the gratitude which he paid to his great master for his instruction and friendship, led him (he is also a considerable writer) to the greatest literary achievement of his life, the "Biography of Liszt." It is the best book that has been written about Liszt, as the Kölnische Zeitung maintains.

Reuss made the piano arrangements of the "Bärenhäuter" and "Herzog Wolfgang" for Siegfried Wagner, of whom he is a great friend. A glance at these piano arrangements proves Reuss to be a master of the scores whom nothing essential escapes.

Maurice Grau convinced himself at Bayreuth of the qualities of both these artists, and gained such a high opinion of them that he engaged both under brilliant conditions for his opera ensemble. We shall soon have an opportunity to admire and be delighted with Frau Luise Reuss-Belce as Isolde, and to hear Herr Reuss, one of the greatest pupils of Liszt.

Mrs. L. P. Morrill.—Mrs. Morrill gave the first of her musical receptions on Thursday evening at her studio in The Chelsea, a large number being present. An interesting program was given by Mrs. Morrill, Miss Florence Clark, Miss Alice MacGregor, Mrs. P. St. John Duval, with F. W. Riesberg at the piano. Mrs. Duval, whose home is in Richmond, Va., is spending the winter in New York for study with Mrs. Morrill. Her voice is a fine, high one, and shows what scientific training can do. Miss Clark is a contralto with an unusually deep, lovely voice, and has made progress under Mrs. Morrill. It is predicted that she will make a fine place for herself in the musical world in the future. Mrs. Morrill was never in better voice, and her singing was greatly enjoyed. These receptions occur the second Thursday evening of each month, and always prove interesting social and musical events.

A Joint Recital.—Mrs. Webb-Gardner, the distinguished coloratura soprano, and Emil Hofmann, the baritone, will give a joint song recital at Association Hall, Newark, N. J., Monday evening, November 25, at 8:15 o'clock. Mr. Minier, the well-known accompanist, will be at the piano, and a high class program made up of German lieder, English and French songs, and some briliant operatic arias will be presented. It will be Mrs. Webb-Gardner's initial appearance in Newark, and Mr. Hofmann's first hearing since his return from Germany.

FIRST PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

WITH Friday's public rehearsal and the concert of Saturday evening, the Philharmonic Society began its sixtieth season. This was the program:

Overture, Euryanthe.....Weber
Prelude, Choral and Fugue.....Bach-Abert
Concerto for piano, No. 4, D minor, op. 70.....Rubinstein
Josef Hofmann.
Symphonic poem, Barbarossa.....Siegmund von Hausegger

For some ill advised reason the Bach-Abert number was included in the above list, and as a result the concert was too long. Had its pernicious influence ceased with that, the error in program building would not have been worthy of discussion; but it reflected on the next following orchestral composition, so that the general impression of "Barbarossa" was that it is too lengthy a work. Now this is not the case—Von Hausegger's symphonic poem does not consume more time than is due a work of its importance. To return to the Bach-Abert number, it best can be summed up by asserting that it should not have been done at all—neither by Abert nor by Mr. Paur. Such shackling of differing bits of Bach divorced—not welded—by a choral is in very bad taste. Were one to overlook this sort of thing one would soon become complacent, and even forgive Gounod his greatest musical sin—and he has many to his credit—that silly "Ave Maria."

The freshness of the "Euryanthe" overture seems perennial. And no wonder, when one considers that it contains much healthy, stirring melody and brisk rhythms, which give it a long lease on youth. It is a glorious work which still will flourish when a great many of Wagner's compositions will be remembered only in the Bürgerreuther barn.

Mr. Paur gave a dashing reading of the "Euryanthe" and showed the orchestra to surprisingly good advantage. It was evident after that first fine burst that he had been working hard with them, and at the Largo he coaxed from his band a pianissimo of unusual delicacy; and at other instances he unleashed the brass until it did one good to hear that ringing roar of sturdy tone.

Of the Rubinstein Concerto Josef Hofmann gave a brilliant performance—much better Saturday than on the previous day. On the latter occasion he put much more dash into the close of the first allegro; he quickened his tempi a bit more in the rondo, though in contrast to the orchestral outburst following it still lagged and refused stubbornly. But the tonal beauty, the absolute technical finish and repose were all so many indices of the young virtuoso's exceptional musical equipment. For an encore on Friday he played the same composer's F minor Barcarolle, and on Saturday a Rubinstein Barcarolle and the Chopin Waltz, op. 64, No. 3.

This brings us to the first performance in America of "Barbarossa." Its composer, a young man of twenty-nine, is second conductor of the Munich Kaim Orchestra. He comes of musical stock and showed a precocious talent of the same bent, composing before he had completed his school days. Afterward he succeeded in bringing about the first performances in Graz, his birthplace, of Wagner's "Ring." His father before him had been an ardent worker in the Wagner cause and it was not strange that this influence should show in the son's early compositions; these brought him no great fame—a Phantasie for piano inspired by E. T. A. Hoffmann's "Elixire des Teufels"; a ballade for orchestra, "Odins Meerritt," and an opera, "Helfried," produced in Graz. Later he wrote a fantastic comic opera, "Zinnober"—after Hoffmann's "Klein Zaches—which was given performance in Munich upon recommendation of Richard Strauss. In 1895 he was appointed opera conductor at Graz and held this position for four years, leaving it only in 1899, when the success of his "Dionysiche Dichtung," produced under his direction by the Kaim Orchestra, secured him the position as second conductor to Weingartner of the Kaim Orchestra, which he still holds.

All this detail is justified by the fact that this composer's "Barbarossa" is a great composition. Whatever hold Wagner may have had on Von Hausegger it is now dissipated by a most intense striving after the ideals of Richard Strauss—of Wagner there are few traces in this work. During the march of the third division does one see the gabled roofs and dormer windows of Nuremberg in the far distance, but at second hearing they pass from view and one can explain the vision only by the identity of the key color. And the "Barbarossa" motive is a hint from the Schwert theme. At the beginning of the second part there is a very strong hint of Tschaikowsky—who, oddly enough, has put his stamp on so few of the moderns—and "Manfred" is recalled; not alone by general contour, but also by treatment of his orchestral forces. Du reste, it is Strauss, again Strauss, and Von Hausegger.

But he is a worthy and a modest pupil of the Munich master. He does not dare so far as the great man; and here he shows his cunning, for he knows full well that the public would not accept gracefully so bold a work from another man as it does from Strauss. Strauss is saying the last words in the music of the present, and is not a safe guide out of the maze of his own music. So Von Hausegger has chosen another path for obviously the same goal, and it would seem that his route is less devious and—be it frankly admitted—less interesting.

As the subject for his work the composer has chosen the rather well-known "Kyffhaeuser Saga," which, in a few words, recites the sleep-bound Barbarossa awaiting the awakening call of his needy subjects. About this scheme he has spun loosely the musical web, not by treating with infinite and tiresome musical detail every verbal outline, but in the manner of an impressionist suggesting by truthful hints the points upon which the imagination may fasten and elaborate. So the division of the Symphonic Poem falls into three great divisions: "Die Not des Volkes," "Der Zauberberg" and "Das Erwachen." Whether this fable is politically accurate matters not at all; Von Hausegger writes music, not history, and the quarrel of critics can only be with the musical treatment of it, not with the plot itself.

In form the first movement is rather free, but far from being revolutionary; it approximates the outlines of a symphonic overture, and the sub-divisions are recognizable.

Thematically this, the first movement, is the most interesting of the three, and it contains at least two subjects which proclaim the composer's inventive ability to b above the ordinary; in this he approaches Strauss, w "Hero theme," from the "Heldenleben," will soon later take its place among the few great themes w in the last half century.

"Die Not des Volkes" is ushered in by an introdu beginning with a magnificent motif announced pian the horns and trumpets. In these first few bars lie Stimmung of the entire movement; seldom has a poser succeeded so well in ensnaring a mood and fining it within a few bars; and to accomplish this it needed a theme of great force and unmistakable ch ter. These at least are the attributes of this drastic ing. Then with rapidly accumulating force another sion of this is precipitated—this time fortissimo and different key. After the fury of it is spent there c a period of almost pastoral peace built on two new jects and instrumented with a rare knowledge of or tral color possibilities. But this tranquillity is short-l and a human cry of discontent breaks out, proclai the misery of the mass; in intensity this appeal is mendous—it equals the agonizing plaint of Amforta search of rest. Incessantly does this cry resound, i rupting and preventing utterance of the recurring i theme, like the cry of maddened men voicing dire tress, until with a brisk, resolute minor theme the body of the movement begins. This principal subje repeated daringly in the major, a semitone higher, wonderful effect, followed furiously by another outl of anguish, which is answered by a pleading episode appeases the tumult.

With a menacing roll of the drums the develop section stirs anew the latent madness of the mob now their anger has turned to anguish and they p beg; this avails them nothing and in demoniac de they shriek their distress with shrill voice. Suddenly as an answer sounds the "Barbarossa" theme, a note of reassurance, and in which is found the m motto of the whole work. All too soon it does awa in the distance echoes anew the fierceness of comba woeful wail and the peace pleading. This gains i tensity and added to these now the "Barbarossa" returns against a persistent rhythmic figure. With multuous Coda the movement ends in a startlingly br and unexpected manner. The impression of this p of the work is that it is tense, with the composer stra his material to the utmost, yet knowing how far he bend his themes to express the varying phases of his ject. And to this end he has used unusual skill i selection of malleable material, with the result tha movement is marvelously coherent. Nowhere are visible seams.

"Der Zauberberg," the second movement, is a sclr which opens with a fugitive fugato. It is meant to c in tone the wavering outlines of phantom form cir silently about the enchanted mountain which hold drowsing Barbarossa. There is in this unearthly ing a strange flickering of the ghostly that the com commands with a masterly economy of device. Ag this figure, and woven into its very mesh, are remini parts of the theme, from the preceding movement

WHITNEY TEW
In America November, December And January.

The London Press says of Mr. Tew's singing:

The Stage—"Mr. Whitney Tew proved himself a singer of excellent capabilities. His voice, which is a bass of great compass, is delightfully sympathetic—now full of tenderness, now instinct with passion and joy. He could not have been surpassed in his rendering of Schumann's 'Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn' and Liza Lehmann's curiously weird 'Myself when Young.'"—July 4, 1901.

London Musical Courier—"Mr. Whitney Tew's singing was marked by a high order of intelligence. He is one of the few singers now before the public who possesses the many qualifications that mean success. Besides a voice powerful and sympathetic he has a remarkable memory, and he never fails to display an intuitive knowledge of the poetic and dramatic significance of the text. In four songs by Bach, Brahms, Schubert and Schumann he exhibited great powers of vocalization and expression, and a style in singing German so thoroughly Teutonic that it was hard at times to realize his American origin . . . Three songs in English were equally impressive."—July 5, 1901.

Ladies' Field—"That fine bass singer, Mr. Whitney Tew, gave the first of his recitals in Steinway Hall. Madame Lehmann's 'In Memoriam' was a great test of Mr. Tew's manner and inflection, and he sustained the interest of his audience well throughout it; and it is a supremely hard work for a single voice—fragmentary, passionate, moody, with its pedal-note of acute sorrow. . . . Mr. Tew is fortunate in possessing a powerful voice of fine quality, and he has both the voice and brains for success."—May 25, 1901.

Daily Telegraph—"Mr. Tew is an artist who commands attention and deserves praise. Especially has he the gift of feeling and the power of conveying it to others, while in point of intelligence he leaves but little to desire. Mr. Tew essayed last evening songs of widely contrasting kinds and of various countres, but the manner and spirit proper to each were easily revealed, and the result was a conspicuous success."—May 23 1901 essing the distress of the people; now and again this is ated at while the swirl of phantoms grows wilder and e picture more nebulous until with the thunderous romatic ascent in fortissimo brass the mountain seems ft and the apparition of Barbarossa is suggested by the ring reappearance of his theme.

Under the influence of this quieting vision there comes a dden lull of all sounds martial and instead creeps in a collection of those happy days when Barbarossa reigned; this end the composer has given a heavenly melody to strings, followed by a simple, playful theme for the oodwind which succeed so admirably in veering the od completely. But immediately comes again that ever esent sign of the times—distress. And before care flees mentary happiness; the cry of need insists and the ture of Barbarossa fades darkly away. With the re-rence of the ghostly dance the scherzo ends.

"Das Erwachen" consistently begins with an introduc-n which harks back to the first movement and reiterates Not cry, in which many combinations of themes are d to logical advantage, and which continues at length til a sustained trumpet call introduces a new expectant od. This culminates in the "Barbarossa" theme, which nounces the final awakening of the Kaiser, who leads people in victorious war to the martial march, a stir-g melody, built on the themes of Barbarossa. With s the main body of the movement begins and is con-ued by the introduction of former themes skillfully ted against each other, indicative of conflict. Out of all s resounds again the "Kaiser March" and marks the iod of development; once more the old cry of distress ils warningly and gives way only to the pastoral epi-da in which the very first motif is coupled with an in-h the "Kaiser March," introduced by the "Barbarossa" me, significant this last time of victory. A closing la in which the very first motif is coupled with an in-sion of the cry of need, the whole a pæan; and finally "Barbarossa" in the most joyous of accents. So the rk closes.

Of the orchestration there is naught but praise. Of rse, the composer draws liberally upon the resources the modern orchestra; but only in one or two in-nces does one feel that he exhausts these. Never does join themes simply to show his skill. The constant re-ation of the cry of distress is justifiable, and it lends tinge of monotony to the work. Of melody—good, melody—there is an abundance, and it is not of cloy-sweetness to clog the speed of the musical narrative. ove all the composition abounds in character of the oic sort—not the mock Teutonic heroic of a Piloty vas, but rather the uncompromising daring of the nger school. The unflinching figure of Stuck's rieg," heavy with misery, stalks abroad in this com-ition. "Barbarossa" is a remarkable work.

Mr. Paur's conducting was superb; he made clear oted parts of the poem, and never for an instant did lose absolute control of his forces. He worked up his naxes with tremendous discretion—always avoiding the al and the obvious. His attitude toward compositions his kind—especially toward those of Richard Strauss—should be praised. And we have the assurance that when he essays to interpretate one of the moderns he takes the composer at his word—or at his note—and gives us a broad, comprehensive reading, free from over-refinements.

The orchestra played very well, indeed. There have been a few changes in its personnel, which probably will work out to advantage later. But it is apparent with each concert that Mr. Paur is making his orchestral material more flexible. And upon this he and New York are to be congratulated.

THE H. W. GREENE STUDIOS.—At the H. W. Greene studios there have been a considerable number of rare voices registered this season. Mr. Greene's prestige in the South and West gives him some of the most promising pupils which those sections afford. A brilliant young tenor, Claude H. Selby, of Fostoria, Ohio, is more than redeeming the promise his voice gave last year. He is already being sought for engagements, the most notable of which is an appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra toward the end of the month, where the Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger" will probably be his number. He is also booked for a concert in Ohio in December.

Miss Lalla Griffin, of Johnson City, Tenn., is among the most promising of Mr. Greene's Southern pupils. Miss Griffin has given up church and college engagements to make New York her musical home, and she is unquestionably a great addition to the soprano forces of the metropolis, having a voice of exceedingly rare quality, which she uses with great effect.

A musicale will be given at the studios the first week in December at which Miss Griffin, Miss Cecile Stollberg, Miss Bessie Hoople, Robert Bruce Pegram and Mr. Selby, with a number of others, will appear.

THE SERRANOS.—Among the most successful voice teachers in New York are Emilia Benic de Serrano and Carlos A. de Serrano, teachers of Charlotte Maconda, the celebrated soprano.

Two of their pupils, Miss Hattie Jacobi and Miss Rose Marie Campbell, have recently filled a number of most successful engagements. On Labor Day Miss Jacobi sang with Sousa's Band at their last concert at Manhattan Beach. More recently she sang with Berlinghoff's Military Band and at the annual concert of the Cecilia Club, given at the New York Maennerchor Hall. Miss Campbell has been engaged by the Arion Club, of Providence, to sing Verdi's Requiem on Tuesday, November 19. Her success while with the American Opera Company may be gauged by the following press notice:

Those who heard Miss Rosemarie Campbell in the comparatively small part of the Gypsy Queen in "The Bohemian Girl" must have recognized in her an artist of more than ordinary powers; but only in the later productions has she had a full chance to display her ability. The charming impersonation of Nancy in "Martha" will not soon be forgotten; and her dramatic rendering of Azucena in "Il Trovatore" has given the keenest pleasure. The long and difficult passages in the third act could hardly have been better done. Miss Campbell has a voice of great range and remarkable purity of tone, and her phrasing is distinctly artistic.—Providence News.

John C. Weber and His Band.

SINCE his return to Cincinnati from Buffalo, where he filled an engagement at the Pan-American Exposition, John C. Weber and his band took in the Lexington races, where it is a prime favorite, and now bookings are being made of the band for some of the big musical events during the winter and spring.

The following press notices and testimonials speak for themselves:

John C. Weber's band played under most unpropitious circumstances, its engagement extending through the weeks of the President's illness and death, when the attendance was small and the hearts of the visitors not in tune with strains of joyous melody. In spite of this Mr. Weber, by his affable personality and unquestioned musical ability, and his band by its superior work, made a lasting and distinctly favorable impression. This organization contains a number of excellent soloists, who had little chance here to show what they could do. The list includes three cornetists, William Kopp, Ferdinand Weiss and Joseph Loebker; Carl Kohlmann, euphonium; piccolo, George Lehmann, and xylophoner, Howard Kopp.—Buffalo Express, October 27.

John C. Weber, director, and his famous band arrived yesterday morning from Cincinnati, having just finished an engagement lasting two weeks at the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo. In the Electric City the band made a hit and won new laurels as a musical organization. Mr. Weber is an Elk and is well known in this city. At the trots yesterday the band rendered excellent music. It caters to all classes, and there is always much applause after each piece.—Lexington (Ky.) Morning Herald.

BUFFALO, September 30, 1901.

John C. Weber, Weber's Military Band:

DEAR SIR—I wish to commend you on the fine work of your band during your two weeks' engagement at the Pan-American Exposition. The Exposition officials praised the band highly on its sweetness and softness of tone. We class the band as one of the best at the Exposition during the entire season. Trusting you will meet with as good success in the future, I am, very respectfully,

Yours, HARRY F. HENSHAW,
Superintendent of Music.

BUFFALO, October 2, 1901.

John C. Weber, Cincinnati, Ohio:

MY DEAR SIR—I sincerely regret that you had to leave us so soon, as we enjoyed your evening concerts so very much, and take great pleasure in telling you so, for I believe when a man does well he deserves credit for it and ought to know that his work is appreciated. I don't believe in keeping all praises for obituaries and tombstones. I received many thanks from all the Oregonians in selecting your band to play for us on "Oregon Day," and they have not got over yet praising your interpretation of the pieces selected, and that is one of the best points of your band. You seem to grasp the composer's idea and give it the way it ought to be given; another point I admired in your band is the smoothness and harmony with which each piece was presented. I listened very closely and am considered a good judge of these things.

Now, I don't say this simply to flatter you, but because you merited it, deserve it and ought to know it.

Wishing you success in the future, I desire to express the hope to have the pleasure to hear you again. Cordially yours,

HENRY E. DOSCH.

ESTELLE HARRIS FOR "THE MESSIAH."—The young dramatic soprano with the beautiful voice has been engaged for the Christmas performance of "The Messiah" at Goshen, N. Y., under Conductor Rev. Robert Bruce Clark, with a full orchestra. She sang last night with great success at the concert at Trinity M. E. Church, Harlem.

J. H. MAPLESON.

By Hugh Craig.

J. H. MAPLESON, whose death is just announced, was born in London in 1830. One of my friends, who believes that all good things come from Galilee, used to believe that the maple tree of which the impresario was the son must have grown in the same stretch of woodland in which flourished the almond tree, the ancestor of Felix, and that, as the latter Germanized his name to Mendelssohn, the former just Anglicized his into Mapleson.

At all events, the child made its first appearance on any stage at the early age of two months as the understudy of a property baby in the christening scene of "Henry VIII.," personating the infant Princess Elizabeth. At the age of fourteen he began to study music, the violin being the instrument of his choice. On leaving the Academy he published two piano pieces and a song, and made his appearance among the first violins at Her Majesty's Theatre, playing at the same desk with Remenyi, who had just escaped from Hungary. At this period the great operatic war began in London. Costa left Her Majesty's Theatre to establish the rival house at Covent Garden, and his successor, Balfe, then in all his glory, induced the young violinist, by no means reluctant, to try the stage. He gave him singing lessons, and he, Gardoni and Belletti assured him that he had in him the stuff of a primo tenore.

But before he had completed these vocal studies he took a company into the English provinces, which included Sontag, Lablache and the pianist Thalberg. This was followed by other tours, and in one of them, as his tenor, "for some reason or other" (Dare we guess what it was?) left him. Mapleson took his place, as he says, "with success." After a dip into musical journalism and study in Italy, he made his first operatic appearance as Carlo in "Linda di Chamouni." On his return to London he found his throat affected and had to undergo a serious operation that deprived him of tonsils, uvula and voice. The operation, we may add, did not injure his conversational powers, in later years at least.

In 1856 he started a musical agency, and in 1858 joined E. T. Smith (his gentleman described himself in legal documents as of Pennsylvania Castle) in organizing a third opera company, which during its first season gave "Don Giovanni" "with a body of singers whose united ages amounted to nearly 500 years." In the following season Arditi was engaged as conductor. Smith was an enterprising fellow; he ran half a dozen restaurants, had a special box at the opera given to Heenan and Sayers, and was with difficulty restrained from having the champion's belt presented between the acts of the opera. In spite of all these artistic devices the sheriff's officers seized the wardrobe and finally were left in possession of the house.

In 1861 he made the acquaintance of Adelina Patti, and set about trying to raise funds and a company to open the Lyceum with her as the star. But, alas for struggling managers! while he was thus running about the lady had signed to Gye at Covent Garden. Still he possessed such artists as Giuglini, Delle Sedie, Alboni and Tietjens, but before the close of the season the choristers struck for pay, and the impresario was $190,000 to the bad. Tietjens at this period and afterward was his most loyal supporter, and refused all offers from Gye. In fact it was reported that during her whole career she helped him out of many serious scrapes. In fact it was only at her death the idea of visiting America came into his head.

In 1868 Mr. Gye made a proposal for the union of Mapleson's Drury Lane company with Mr. Gye's Covent Garden contingent. The first season was reported to be a success, but lawsuits between the partners sprang up. Mapleson was accused of having shown ingratitude to his first patron, Lumley, and of trying to ruin Gye, and he in turn accused Gye of attempting to seduce his artists and of stealing his version of "Lohengrin." How he was getting along financially may be seen in his "Memoirs," where he tells us that in his last season he dropped "Les deux Journées" after one performance because there was only $500 in the treasury, and "Otello" (with Tamberlik, Faure and Nilsson) after a one night run, because there was only $800 in that receptacle. Then came a scheme for a Grand National Theatre on the Thames Embankment. Poor Tietjens, then dying, laid the first brick, and the Duke of Edinburgh the first stone (a charming distinction), but the building was never roofed in; the portion erected was sold for $2,000 for building materials for a police station that now stands on the site.

Mapleson's career of disaster may be assigned to many causes. The fact that opera did not respond to a popular demand, but supplied the jeunesse dorée of the aristocracy with new playthings, is at the bottom of his failure; to these may be added the multiplication of opera houses when London could not support one, with the consequent cliques among patrons and artists; but most of all Mapleson's temperament. "At the close of the opera season," he writes, "I found myself a loser of £1,800. Therefore I resolved to carry on the opera on a larger scale next year in order that I might get straight, vowing, as the Monte Carlo gambler does, that as soon as I got quite straight I would stop." In plain English, he carried on the enterprise trusting to luck.

As a preliminary to his American tour he paid a flying visit to this country, and in a sojourn of nine or ten days knew all about it or thought or said he knew. He entitled his company "Her Majesty's Opera Company" to dazzle our democratic imaginations, and on August 31, 1878, set out to conquer the new world. In his company he had Gerster, Minnie Hauk, Trebelli, Campanini and other old friends, and they arrived safely at Cork, but there Mapleson met his first trouble. His exchequer was almost exhausted and he had to telegraph to his New York agent to cable him $10,000 to pay the passage money of his artists. The season opened October 16, 1878, and the list of the artists compared unfavorably with Maretzek's old company in 1874, leading one sarcastic journal to ask "Where is the new era in operatic management?" In fact, "Her Majesty's Opera Company" was a misleading description, as a body bearing the same name began its season on the same day in London. This first Mapleson season was saved by Gerster. That lady was seized on her arrival by typhoid fever, and till she was able to appear the general verdict was that the performances left much to be desired and that many were inferior to what we had often had before. As Carlberg said: "This little woman is the soul of the box office and makes the season successful." The rest of the company were dismissed with the remark that there is "one thing they can do, that is 'Carmen,' and one thing they cannot do, that is 'Der Freischütz.'"

Of course, there were all sorts of squabbles. First came the Steinway-Weber piano squabble, which was amicably settled by all the artists indorsing fully both pianos. Then came a Minnie Hauk quarrel, a much more serious affair; a difficulty with the ticket speculator Rullmann, and finally one with the stockholders of the Academy, which Mapleson vowed to leave for Booth's Theatre next season, as the Metropolitan Elevated Railroad would support him handsomely.

The season proved once more that it was the "star," not the opera, that the public went to see.

Mapleson's London season of 1880 was noticeable for a performance of "Lohengrin" under Richter. He gave the piece fifteen rehearsals, during which he found 430 mistakes in the orchestral parts that had been passed over by Costa. In New York the most noticeable work was Boïto's "Mefistofele," and in the following year the Opera Festival of Cincinnati and the engagement of Patti for the ensuing season, and the firmness with which s held to the terms of the contract, "deposit of $50,000 signing." The troupe consisted of Patti and her husba Nicolini, Minnie Hauk, Madame Scalchi and others, t novelty being M. Mierzwinski, the phenomenal ten In London a dispute with the Royal Italian Opera Co pany, which had acquired Mapleson's lease of Her M esty's Theatre, took place, the company claiming fr him $50,000 losses incurred in America and leaving h responsible for Patti's contract. Abbey had tempted l with higher terms, but Mapleson finally outbid him, t shareholders of the Academy voting to him a subsidy $40,000 to guarantee the contract. In fact, the old fe with the Gye family had broken out again. They kn that the last Mapleson season had been disastrous; th did not think Patti at $5,000 a night would pay, and th were to open the New Metropolitan Opera House, wh gave its first performance October 22, the same night Mapleson's at the Academy of Music. With two ope in New York the end could not be doubtful. The she took possession of the Academy, while Mapleson tra ferred what he could into Nilsson Hall. The veter however, was undaunted. He rehearsed where he cou one day at Steinway Hall, one day at Tony Pastor's; was driven from the stage of the Academy by the c penters of the new American company organized by M Thurber, and was thankful when the New York season 1885 was over. Henceforth comes a period of steady cline, and the Colonel's late career is so well known t it need not be recapitulated here. During all this ti Mapleson was always the same cheery, good natured low, with a genial smile; with a rich fund of anecdote a most plausible conversation, wheedling stockholders, pa fying prime donne, fighting their husbands and promis mountains and marvels, year after year, to a public t finally became incredulous. Nothing seemed to ca him any serious trouble. He deserved a better fate. with his "star" system, cannot be credited with promot musical art; he adhered too closely to the old school, was engaged in the impossible task of making antiqua opera pay.

"The Messiah" in Philadelphia.—A performance "The Messiah" was given by the Temple Chorus in P adelphia on Thursday last, the 14th inst., the basso o occasion being Henri G. Scott. Some of the press o ions on his work are given below:

* * * Mr. Scott is so well known to Philadelphia audiences his work needs no comment. It is but necessary to say, howe that he was in fine voice and sustained his part with his usual quisite finish and artistic interpretation. It is invidious to comparisons, but Mr. Scott was especially fine in several of his notably in "Why Do the Nations Rage?"—Evening Telegraph.

Basso Scott received double his share of applause in his "Why the Nations Rage?"—Inquirer.

The basso, Henri G. Scott, was quite at home in this music, was heard with pleasure by the audience.—Press.

For their tenth annual production of oratorio the Temple Ch last evening presented Händel's "Messiah." The vast auditor was crowded by a brilliant and enthusiastic assemblage. And manner in which the work was sung entirely justified the close tention and liberal approval given it. The superior work of Hr G. Scott, the basso, lent artistic beauty and impressiveness to occasion. He quite captured the audience by the masterful rend of his solos.—The North American.

Mr. Scott showed a good quality of tone and facility of execu —Evening Bulletin.

A Charming Encore Song.—"'Tis Love That M the World Go 'Round," by E. Presson Miller, is a br little trifle which made a hit when sung at the musica a well-known vocal teacher lately. Had Miller stuck writing songs he would have made the undoubted rep tion and success which he has achieved as a teache voice.

BEATRICE TAYLOR is a young contralto pupil of Miss Machin, heard recently, and who bids fair to in for herself as well as her teacher much renown. She ng "Sorrow and Consolation" with superb control and sy confidence, based doubtelss on the knowledge that e knows how to sing. If Miss Machin can do as much r her other pupils, this modest lady will make an indel- le name. Miss Taylor's range is from low E to high E, id the voice is full and even throughout; there is no ap- rent weakness in any register, and this is all certainly e result of the right method, rightly applied, by the right acher.

Perry Averill is busy in his dual capacity of singer and acher, and will on December 18, at Architectural Hall, 'est Fifty-seventh street, create Arthur Whiting's set- ng of the "Rubaiyat," the composer's op. 18, for solo ritone, a work said to be full of Oriental color, with e composer at the piano. December 1 he sings the ork in Boston, and the Kneisel Quartet will participate the concert. Mr. Averill has some pupils with prom- ing voices who already occupy important places in New ork and vicinity.

Edwin Lockhart sang last week at the Catholic Club ncert, on West Fifty-ninth street, his pupil, Ralph Cur- s Brown, tenor, assisting. Together they sang duets and ch solos. Lockhart also sang in the performance of The Holy City" at Plainfield, N. J., at the Episcopal hurch, and December 4 he sings at a Brooklyn concert. e is planning the resumption of his musical receptions his studio, perhaps about December 1; these are al- ays enjoyable affairs, for Lockhart knows how to com- ne the social with the musical.

Pupils of Madame Finkel come to the fore, Hannah L. eene being the latest prominent singer who is to sing a concert at Carnegie Hall, at the concert arranged for e benefit of the Homeless Women institution.

Belle Newport, the contralto, another pupil, sang in e "Elijah" performance at Carnegie Hall last night, nesday, in the "Angels' Trio."

The Wirtz Piano School will give the second "Musical our" of the students' course on Friday evening, No- mber 22, at 8 o'clock, to which strangers are also in- ted. The topic for the evening will be the concerto. fter its analysis Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor will e played by Gustave C. Wirtz, with orchestral accom- animent on a second piano. Other numbers to be ayed are Impromptu in A flat, Ambrose, by Miss Isabel ough; two Waltzes, op. 69, No. 1, and op. 16, Chopin; The Trout," Schubert-Heller, and Impromptu, Reinhold, y Gustave C. Wirtz.

These musical hours are proving very helpful as well enjoyable to the students. They are begun early and erefore over in time for those living at a distance to rofit by them, as well as those who live near the school. The next children's recital will be given on Saturday ternoon, December 7, at 3 o'clock.

Mr. and Mrs. Walter H. Robinson have received an fer of a position in Pittsburg, Pa., a contralto and nor being wanted. The Robinsons are, however, too sy and successful here to consider it, Mr. Robinson be- g solo tenor of St. James' P. E. Church, Madison ave- ue and Seventy-second street, and Mrs. Robinson being lo alto at St. Paul's, on Vesey street. Both have pupils d concert engagements also. Mr. Robinson sang with cided success at the Swedish Aid Society's concert, cademy of Music, Brooklyn, last week, receiving a most thusiastic recall. Mrs. Robinson was called upon at ort notice to sing at a funeral with Estelle Harris, Al- bert Quesnel and Gwilym Miles, and acquitted herself with credit.

Charles E. Moscow, of Newburgh, where the next meeting of the New York State Music Teachers' Association is to be held next June, and who will naturally be the leading spirit in that prosperous city on the Hudson, writes as follows:

DEAR MR. RIESBERG—We, Us & Co. in Newburgh have no choral society. They left us long ago. Rag-time societies are our hobby. It is high time that something musical exploded in our midst, and I hope the New York State M. T. A. will be the party to touch it off. C. E. Moscow.

Mr. Moscow has been a vice-president for some years of the association, and it is mainly through his efforts that the association will meet there.

Aileen Brower, who gave a recital at the Waldorf-Astoria last week, studied some time with Miss Thursby, who has returned to the Gramercy, from which she was a short time absent. Geraldine Farrar, who has been engaged at the Royal Opera of Berlin, studied with her also. Recently the writer heard Miss Martha Henry, of Cincinnati; Josephine Schaffer and the Misses Grace, Clare and Cornett, all at present studying with Miss Thursby.

Florence Clark, of Ridgewood, N. J., sang last week at a musicale, and quite covered herself and teacher, Mrs. Morrill, with glory. She sings church music well, also, and should find a position worthy of her noble voice. Händel's aria, "Hear Me," little sung, and Ambrose's perennial "Come Unto Me" were her church numbers, in which she made a pronounced impression. "A Dream of Paradise" she also sings well, and altogether this young woman is a most promising singer.

Miss C. E. Hanselmann sang at the concert given at the Bushwick Avenue Reformed Church, Brooklyn, last week, and many present said she was "the best thing on the program." She certainly won great applause, and did credit to her teacher, Parson Price. Miss Hanselmann is the soprano of the church.

J. Warren Andrews returned from his brief Western trip last week, having given a number of organ recitals. At Columbus, Ohio, he gave this program:

Fourth Sonata, op. 65.....Mendelssohn
Gavotte in F.....Martini
Vesper Bells.....Spinney

Mr. Andrews.

Recitative, For Behold Darkness.....Händel
Air, The People That Walked in Darkness (Messiah).....Händel

Oley Speaks.

Toccata and Fugue in D minor.....Bach
Largo in G.....Händel
Marche Funebre et Chant Seraphique.....Guilmant
Daphne's Love.....Ronalds
April Rain.....Speaks
Ethiopia Saluting the Colors.....Wood
The Break o' the Year.....Smith
Had a Horse, a Finer No One Ever Saw.....Old Hungarian
The Quest.....Smith

Oley Speaks.

Caprice in B flat.....Guilmant
Serenade in F.....Gounod
Gavotte, Mignon.....Thomas
March Militaire.....Gounod

The Harold Osborne Smith, whose "The Break o' the Year" was sung by Mr. Speaks, is the young organist of the French Episcopal Church du Saint Esprit, mentioned in a recent issue of this paper.

Mr. Andrews' choir gave Gounod's "Gallia" at the Church of the Divine Paternity last Sunday evening, the solo in the work by Miss Estelle Harris. The church was crowded, and the work was effectively given. December 1 the "Stabat Mater" will be given complete. Preceding the service there is always a fifteen minute organ recital.

Amanda Dye is the name of a young singer heard recently, who has a pretty voice. She is from Little Rock, Ark., and studies with Saenger. Her sister, Miss Martha, reads, and has made pronounced success in the Southwest. She already has engagements here.

PITTSBURG AFFAIRS.

PITTSBURG, November 18, 1901.

IT may not be generally known that, like the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra also makes periodical tours, and, as a matter of course, to cities much smaller than the large Atlantic Coast cities. The first tour of the orchestra this season begins to-night at Sharon; Tuesday night Akron, Ohio, will hear the orchestra, under the auspices of the Akron Tuesday Musical Club. Wednesday afternoon the Oberlin University will have a concert and at night the orchestra plays in Cleveland. Nordica is the soloist. There are to be two more concerts this season at Cleveland, at one of which the piano virtuoso Zeldenrust will be the soloist, and at the other Schumann-Heink.

JESSIE SHAY.

The program of this week's Symphony concert here is as follows:

Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, Bizet's "L'Arlesienne," the Huldigungs March and the Moszkowski Concerto by Miss Jessie Shay, a pianist who has come to the front of the keyboard with rapid strides. If I mistake not Miss Shay is to play on a Wissner grand piano, one of those new American pianos now striving for a public recognition of their artistic merits through the usual medium of the concert stage. I heard Miss Shay play a Wissner grand in the spring at the St. Nicholas Rink in New York, when she gave a brilliant exposition of the Henselt Concerto, and I must say that the piano surprised me with its scintillating brilliancy, its evenly distributed dynamic qualities, its great volume and its singing ability, for Miss Shay actually sang the slow movement on the piano and this could not have been done had the grand not been her coadjutor.

It is an encouraging sign of the times to observe these new candidates for piano honors step boldly into the arena and challenge comparison with the old renowned makes, but there is no reason why piano manufacturing should not expand and why an artist like Miss Shay should not play on one of the new line of concert grands.

She studied a short time with Moszkowski, but she has brains and musical instinct, and she plays with breadth and a fine, delicate conception of her work.

MISCELLANY.

The Pittsburg Musical Institute is coming to the front with some excellent concerts. On Thursday Dr. Carl Hoffman, W. Whitney Huber and Mrs. Marie Eleanor Hoffman were the soloists at a concert given by the Institute.

Frederic Dean, of New York, sends the Pittsburg Dispatch New York musical letter on Sundays.

FIRDUSI.

D'ANGELO BERGH "STUDIO TALKS."—Students of singing are cordially invited to the "Studio Talks" being given at the D'Angelo Bergh Studios on Monday and Thursday afternoons at 3 at The Albany, Broadway, corner Fifty-second street.

Many valuable hints can be obtained by young students in learning of the early experiences of singers who have attained prominence. Miss Bergh's strong mentality and personal magnetism in addition to her unusually cosmopolitan education and experience in teaching in Europe and America lend a charm and a rare value to these Studio Talks. The topics, "Breathing and Personal Magnetism," "Musical Speaking Voice," "Singers' Secrets for Everyone" and "On and Off the Stage," are fascinating ones to those who are interested in the divine art of song, either as students or as singers.

SEVERN TRIO.—The Severn Trio, assisted by Francis Walker, baritone, will give their first concert of the season at the Tuxedo, Tuesday evening, November 26.

BOSTON, November 17, 1901.

LAST Monday night and all last week "Iolanthe" was performed at the Bijou Opera House. The revival was a melancholy affair, not so much on account of the performance itself as on account of the thoughts suggested by hearing once more the crisp lines of Gilbert.

I read the other day in the Era (London) an article entitled "The Death of Opera Bouffe." The writer states that Offenbach practically invented it—which is possibly true, although Hervé claimed he was before Offenbach—and started the Bouffes Parisiens at the "Salle Lacazes"—Lacaze is right—and then moved to the Théâtre Comté, which is right when you strike off the acute accent. He says that opera bouffe is constructed on too trivial a scale to entitle it to rank as opera comique or English comic opera; and he hastens to add, for he hears laughter, that English comic opera is "the opera of comedy, which has nothing to do with that hybrid, 'musical comedy' or 'musical farce.'" I was afraid at first that he was about to prefer the libretto of "The Geisha" to those written by Meilhac and Halévy. Perhaps he would not call "Patience" or "The Mikado" a "musical comedy," but a comic opera. Admirable as these works are, are they any less "trivial" than "La Belle Hélène," "La Vie Parisienne," or "La Grande Duchesse"? It must be remembered that Offenbach was treated cruelly in London: H. B. Farnie translated and adapted some of the librettos to suit the English taste, and Emily Soldene played dashing parts—to her own satisfaction, as may be seen by consulting her memoirs. The writer speaks of Audran, and then he comes to the imported American farce. He complains of their monotony of plot and construction. "The music is of one pattern to a large extent, with the everlasting 'coon' song, the American-German and the comedians, who are too much of one style." He prays for a manager bold enough to try and revive "the lost glories of comic opera pure and simple."

There comes a time in the life of a man when he obtrudes his age in the hope that somebody will contradict him and a woman say "I should never believe it." I never saw Edmund Kean, or Macready, or Jenny Lind at Castle Garden or the Fitchburg station in Boston, but I remember distinctly the rise and fall of Offenbach in this country, just as I remember the sudden popularity of Sullivan's operettas and then the gradual neglect. I saw Tostée at the Grand Opera House, New York, in "La Grande Duchesse," and I lived to see—Lillian Russell in the same part. Miss Russell's production was as far as scenery and costumes were concerned far superior to that of Mr. Bateman's company; but neither Miss Russell nor any member of her company had the slightest comprehension of the lines or the music or the spirit of the piece.

Offenbach for a time ruled the world, and Americans who had read "Telémaque" with extreme difficulty went to see his operettas and laughed uproariously at such lines as "Well what do you advise me to do?" or "I'll be there to-morrow at 12 o'clock"—because they had been told that the librettos were highly spiced, and one line to them was like another. I observed the exhibition of the same cheerful hypocrisy in Boston when Coquelin or Sarah plays. When Yvette Guilbert was here she sang a tragic, bloodcurdling thing, "La Soularde." The "best people of Boston" sat near her—those seats were the most expensive—and after she had sung one verse they began to giggle. One said to the other, "Isn't she delightfully droll? What comic gifts! And do you know, Mrs. Higgleston-Worth tells me that off the stage she is a very estimable person; lives with her mother, and sews for the poor." After the second verse there was a gale of laughter. "Yes, that is the most amusing song yet!" "But what is it all about?" asked an honest young woman, who did not understand French. "Oh, you know well enough; do you think I'm going to explain those dreadfully improper jokes?" Miss Guilbert saw that the audience was pretentiously ignorant, and from that moment played and sang as suited her whim—which was contempt.

But there were many who honestly and intelligently enjoyed the companies that came over from Paris. (I wonder if Edouard Colonne remembers his experiences in this country, when, as conductor, he also played violin solos between the acts?) There were companies in English that gave pleasure. And surely Alice Oates had Gallic blood and nerves and deviltry. Perhaps many of your readers never saw her! It is a sad thought—what we all have missed on account of the dilatory conduct of our parents.

Aimée was the last of the French women who could draw all men unto her, and opera bouffe met a formidable adversary in the church choir. It must also be said that the later French operettas introduced were generally a rehash and dull. "Pinafore" and the church choir worked a great change in theatrical life. Many who had looked upon the theatre as the favorite playground of Satan were persuaded to see "Pinafore"; they were told that the company was made up of church singers; Deacon Zenas Field recommended the show and saw no harm in it; and in some cases the church member knew one of the company. The result is well known. Thousands of dollars were made out of Sullivan's operettas. "The Bostonians" are still traveling on the reputation of the first years. But would any manager to-day dare to prepare a cycle of Gilbert and Sullivan operettas?

To-day is the reign of the farce comedy, the musical comedy, the extravaganza, however you are pleased to call the show. There is no need of describing the character of the entertainment. If it comes from London you can easily draw up the scenario and whistle the tunes before you take your seat. If it is by "Hugh Morton" and Gustave Kerker, you will not be surprised even though you carry with you a weak heart. Even Mr. De Koven or Mr. Englander does not startle you from your respectable composure, and Harry B. Smith is as familiar to you as Joe Miller. But this is the kind of show that the great American public wants. Therefore the managers give just this kind of a show to the public. If the public yearned for Offenbach or Gilbert and Sullivan the managers would accommodate it. Some eminent dramatic critics are always cursing the manager; they picture him as a wily, slimy person with a low, retreating forehead, who curses Shakespeare thrice a day and plots how he may best debauch the taste and morals of the community. These critics—who often have rejected plays on their writing tables—in early Victorian days they wore them in their hats—are not unlike certain prohibitionists who really believe that saloon keepers sprinkle the sidewalk with cheap whiskey or gin, that the odor like a lodestone may drag the reformed and the temperate into the Palace of Sin. As a matter of fact the manager is anxious to find out what the public wishes, and when he does he will strain every nerve, and incidentally his conscience, to gratify his patrons.

Nor should a few think that they can regulate these matters. I myself seldom go to the theatre, for I do not enjoy the plays that are given, even where they are played by certain men and women who are "presented" by Charles Frohman; they are sometimes "offered" I see by the billboards—offered on the altar of art. I should like to see a theatre where I could see plays by Shakespeare—that is, some of Shakespeare's plays—Ibsen, Maeterlinck, George Bernard Shaw, Sheridan, Goldsmith, Molière, Pinero, John Ford, Beaumont and Fletcher, Becque—and some of the blood curdling melodramas like "The Tower of Nesle," "Belphegor, the Mountebank," "The Duke's Motto"—that is a catholic list. I should like to hear "The Death of Tintagiles," with Loeffler's Symphonic Poem as a prelude; "Pélléas and Mélisande," with the music of Fauré or Debussy; "The Seven Princesses," with the music of De Bréville; but I shall no more hear them than I shall see Carcussonne. The public prefers plays founded on popular novels; it takes Miss Maude Adams seriously in Shakespeare and Rostand, it tolerates Shakespeare for her sake; it revels in the art of those subtle comedians, the Rogers Brothers. The public is indeed a thankful public. The American theatre public does not answer fully to the description of the ideal playgoer attributed by some rude parodist to George Alexander, of London, play actor and manager: "The ideal playgoer is one who puts himself unreservedly in the hands of some ingenious manager. He takes that manager absolutely on trust, because he feels that he can trust him. He leaves it to him to say what the play shall be, and as he listens he knows exactly the frame of mind that the manager wishes him to be in at the fall of the curtain. He will say: 'This is the most laughable farce, the most delightful comedy, the most powerful tragedy, the most subtle problem play, as the case may be, that I have witnessed for many a long day.' To the manager, the author and the performers he raises his hat, and after cheering himself hoarse goes to his club to supper and tells everybody he meets to go and see the best play in town."

It is true that in some cities he has childlike faith in the manager; that he has acquired the habit of going on a regular night to a particular theatre, no matter what the play may be, to exhibit his ability to go and his wife's dress; but there are many who would not think of going to a revival of an operetta by Offenbach or Sullivan, even if the manager should send a personal invitation and a carriage.

You and I prefer "La Princesse de Trébizonde" to "The Lady Slavey"—"The Mikado" to the latest child of Messrs. Smith and De Koven; but the great public is a-weary of our preferences; it wants the swish and the whirl of skirts, the kick that reveals Miss Polly Dingbat's lingerie intime—which is truly a goodly and delectable sight; it wants the graveyard humor of Dan Daly; it wants glimpses at the naughtiness of New York as dreamed of by deacons along the Connecticut River. Gilbert's satire on human beings when put grotesquely into the mouths of stage Japanese or fairies, or pirates and policemen of England does not interest them. What would this class of theatregoers make out of Calchas in "La Belle Hélène," or would they see the political animus that embitters the story of that noble dame, "La Grande Duchesse de Gérolstein"?

The public does not wish these pieces, and the traditions that regulated the playing of them are almost gone. They complain at Paris that no one plays and sings to-day i rue Offenbachian vein; and where are the men and romen to play in true Gilbertian manner? The Savoy tage was ruled as rigorously as though it were at Meinigen. The early companies in this country were discreet, nd sly and serious. Some of the early members are still live; some are rheumatic; some have heart disease, and ome are still with the Bostonians. At this performance f "Iolanthe" at the Bijou the first honest applause came hen Mr. Gilbert, who was playing the Lord Chancellor, rankly abandoned the lines of Mr. Gilbert, the comedian, nd introduced topical verses which referred in limping ayme and with vacuous intent to the Buffalo Exposition, ie automobile, the elevated and the subway, and other bjects of industry and commerce. The original lines of ie piece were for the most part read abominably by all ie members of this company, as though a high grade eading book had been put into the hands of a six year ld pupil; but as for that, in how many theatrical comanies of loud pretensions do you find a man or a woman ho can read well written lines intelligently?

The times are changed and some of us are not changed ith them. We wonder why the younger playgoers do ot relish what gave us delight in the seventies and early ghties. There is no such woman now as Alice Oates, o Stockyard beauty can take her place, for she was all eel-springs and ginger. How her eyes snapped! And ow we envied Charley Drew as Ange Pitou! Then ere was Jones, the wonderful Jones as the Spy with the uff box and the gag. "And once again remember—I n all ears." No, there never will be another Jones. nd if we should see him to-day we should probably be bliged to class him with the hamfatters as bum, disctly bum, sir.

Yet at that time we all had seen Fechter and Booth and avenport (E. L., not Fanny or Harry) and Barry Sullin, and "excellent" stock companies in fine old crusted medies, and we had heard Rubinstein and Von Bülow ay, and the voice of Campanini was young—no that as not a barbarous age.

Operetta as well as opera changes constantly with the price of the public. You read occasionally of a new peretta produced in Paris: "Here is a return to the od old opéra comique of our fathers." Offenbach was econd Empire. Gilbert and Sullivan had their little ty. The music of the latter is almost always charming. he librettos of the former will for a long time be good ading; but irony is seldom appreciated by the great ublic. When the barbed points are shot against a swoln fad, as in "Patience," there is the fierce laughter of c revenged, but as soon as the fad passes into history, e irony requires footnotes and commentators begin to arrel. and the playgoer asks: "What's it all about?" and s heavily scented girl says: "Say, don't you think this's lly?"

Furthermore the American public is extremely sentiental. There is no true sentiment in Gilbert's librettos, d when there is a love song the audience of to-day spects insincerity or mockery.

Now we have an entertainment compounded of farce d vaudeville, with music and dances. How long will last? And what will follow?

There are several books which I should like to discuss. ere is "Die Fürstliche Hofkapelle zu Sondershausen," 01, with portraits of three princes and several conductrs. There are thirty-nine thrilling pages. The last ates the fact that Olga Ellinger, pupil of the celebrated arie Neumüller, is now a teacher at Arnstadt, and then ere is a prayer for princely protection, in which no ubt Miss Olga devoutly joins.

There is "Das französische Bayreuth," by Ludwig rautigam—does any German bearing this name actually arry? The book begins: "Few mortals have been so nored as Wagner was toward the end of his life"; and ten lines we are at Orange, France. There are picres of the theatre, a few dates and a quotation from chiller's "Maid of Orleans."

There is a little pamphlet, "Heinrich Vogl," by Dr. ermann Freiherr von der Pfordten. "Vogl was not a brilliant stage apparition, not a knight of the high C, not even a singer by the grace of God, but one of the few genuine men of German art," &c. Dr. Herman, &c., insists that he was a tenor and not a baritone, and yet on one occasion he sang the part of Christ as well as the Evangelist in the "Passion according to Matthew." "His breath was incredible." I hasten to explain that he sang in a room sixteen measures from "athmest du nicht" to "geb' ihrem Zauber" in "Lohengrin," in a sonorous mezzo forte with the greatest ease and without the use of any mechanical appliance. Vogl believed in singing as much as possible even in measures of declamation. He rose majestically from the lyric to the dramatic. The author says that the disappointment of Vogl over the fate of his opera "Der Fremdling" fretted his nerves and hastened his death. There was great applause the first night; then the critics came, recognized the existence of the friendly audience, and declared that the opera itself had no chance of life.

Last Sunday the Handel and Haydn performed Verdi's Requiem. The solo singers were Mrs. Kileski-Bradbury, Gertrude Stein, Evan Williams, J. S. Baernstein. "Elijah" was performed Monday night, with Emma Juch, Gertrude Miller, Mrs. Clara Poole King, Glenn Hall, Gwilym Miles. These concerts were for the establishment of a fund for building a hall. I understand that practically nothing was added to the treasury. The concerts were for a charitable purpose; the solo singers, conductor and organist gave their services; criticism, therefore, would be out of place.

The program of the Fourth Symphony Concert (November 16) included Mozart's Symphony in C, "Jupiter"; Tschaikowsky's piano Concerto in B flat minor, No. 1 (Mr. Slivinski), and Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, "Scotch."

Josef Slivinski comes from the fair land of Poland, the land of exiles and pianists. Possibly the pianists account for the exiles. His personality is romantic. He might have stepped out of a picaresque tale; he might sit for one of Hoffmann's "Night pieces"; but this personality is backed by substantial qualities. When he was first here in 1894 he was not heard with orchestra. Last March he was here with Winderstein's orchestra and he played the Tschaikowsky Concerto one night and Chopin's in E minor and Saint-Saëns' in G minor at two concerts the next day. Last night he appeared with the Symphony Orchestra for the first time.

His was a brilliant and exciting performance. Nor was it merely a reckless display of virtuosity. His reading was poetic, romantic, imaginative. At the same time it was carefully studied; there was a fine sense of proportion, an infinite variety of tonal gradations, an abiding comprehension of the whole purpose of the composer, alternate subordination and predominance. Then there was unusual accuracy, clearness that was marked in the swiftest pace, the absence of even the suspicion of a difficult task, extraordinary rhythmic grasp. Furthermore, there was authority, tempered with magnetism.

The audience was electrified. The pianist was recalled again and again.

If I were a prince, merchant or hereditary, I should have two halls for concert purposes—one a little smaller than Symphony Hall, and better shaped—for the orchestral music of the modern school; and a small hall, which would not seat over, say, 600 or 700, for the symphonies of Mozart and Haydn, suites by Bizet, old dances arranged by Mottl and Gevaërt; just as there should be a small theatre for operas by Mozart, Auber, the delightful comic operas of Donizetti. ("Carmen" and "Lakmé" would sound better in such a theatre.) For the performance of these symphonies there should be a small orchestra, and the members should be a picked body. Why double the woodwind and have the full force of strings that you would employ in music by Tschaikowsky or Richard Strauss? It is especially the great mass of strings that does injury to these old symphonies. The temptation to take the work "out of the frame," to magnify it until it becomes preposterous is well nigh irresistible, especially when the conductor is of ultra-modern sympathies. Neither the best symphonies nor the operas of Mozart are dull or of merely historical interest. "Don Giovanni" and "Figaro" are still dramatic masterpieces when they are presented in proper form. "Don Giovanni" in a great opera house, with endless waits on account of clumsy scene shifting, and with Edouard De Reszké as Leporello, is indeed ponderous and dismal.

An article might be written on the influence exerted by Tschaikowsky over Mozart. In other words less paradoxical and clearer, did the concerto of the Pole-Frenchman kill the "Jupiter" Symphony? By no means. There is a Grecian beauty of melodic line that is not found in the music of the feverish, hysterical, melancholy modern. There are unearthly passages of the woodwind in the slow movement that Tschaikowsky, an adorer of Mozart, no doubt often read and pondered. The suave grace of the minuet recalls the Mozart who danced and wrote for the ridotto. The finale is interesting, not because it is a "polyphonic marvel," but because it sounds beautifully. And all this music has such composure, in melancholy, in passion. Tschaikowsky's music is the music of our time; Mozart's is that of all time.

Nor did the concerto kill certain portions of the "Scotch" Symphony, which must be ranked among Mendelssohn's best—or least objectionable works. He is not here the landscapist of "The Hebrides" overture, which is one of the most beautiful orchestral pieces in the whole repertory; but he caught nevertheless the spirit of the gray and the mist, the bleakness of the landscape, the eerie feeling of ballad and legend. If it were not for that final fuss! Music for a gathering of the Clans in some Mechanics' Hall.

NAHAN FRANKO AS CONDUCTOR.—Nahan Franko is coming to his own. He has conducted a number of performances of the Grau Opera Company, now on a tour. Following are some of the criticisms of his ability as an operatic orchestral leader:

The chorus was large and strong, and the orchestra, under the able directorship of Nahan Franko, was quite superb. As an evidence that the orchestra work was duly appreciated, Mr. Franko, at the conclusion of the second act, was called from the pit to the stage to respond to a most enthusiastic encore.—Houston (Texas) Daily Herald.

And the conductor! He is in no sense a mere time-beater—a human metronome. He is a mediator between the composer and the audience. He is a virtuoso who plays upon men instead of a keyboard, upon a hundred instruments instead of one. Music differs from her sister arts in many respects, but in none more than in her dependence on the intermediary who stands between her and the people for whose sake she exists. Wagner himself, of course, never used a baton. He hypnotized the members of his orchestra by his personal magnetism and the wonderful changes of expression on his powerful and plastic countenance. * * *

* * * Compelled Mr. Franko, the conductor of the orchestra, to come and join hands with them all in bowing their acknowledgments.—Houston Daily Post, November 5, 1901.

Wasn't that a dear thing for Schumann-Heink and Eames to do—to compel Nahan Franko to leave his stand and come to them upon the stage to receive the homage so justly due him? Justly due him, yes, but when one knows opera singers and the intense jealousies and idiosyncrasies which prevail among that class of people more than any other, they can appreciate all the more the womanly sweetness of those two great artists in compelling Franko to appear with them. It was one of the prettiest bits of the evening.—Houston Chronicle, November 5, 1901.

JULIAN WALKER.—The well-known basso has been reengaged by the Brooklyn Institute, a repetition of his recent appearance, and has also a number of important bookings, where he will either give entire song recitals or appear as soloist, in part as follows: Brooklyn Institute (reengagement); Washington, D. C.; Cleveland, Ohio; St. Louis, Mo.; Sioux City, Dak.; Milford, Conn.; Boston; Newark; East Orange, &c.

Mr. Walker's singing in the recent performance of the "Stabat Mater" by Cornell's choir, at Calvary M. E. Church, Harlem, was one of the most successful things of the entire evening; the flexibility and ease in his singing and musicianly interpretation, united with distinguished personal appearance, all caused his numbers to receive enthusiastic applause.

KUBELIK SAILS TO-DAY.

Famous Young Violinist and His Party Now on the Ocean.

A CABLEGRAM to Daniel Frohman from Hugo Görlitz announces that Jan Kubelik, the famous young Bohemian violinist, and his party sailed from Liverpool to-day on the steamship Majestic. Kubelik will make his début in this city on Monday evening, December 2, with Emil Paur and his orchestra. While his program is not definitely arranged he will play the Paganini D major Concerto and probably a Spohr Concerto. This will be one of the principal events of the opening season, as Kubelik comes with a reputation accorded to few who seek fame at the hands of critical metropolitan audiences.

Young Kubelik's party will be one of the largest ever accompanying a violinistic star. With him are his valet; Herr Scriven, his secretary; Rud. Friml, accompanist, and Hugo Görlitz, who, with Mr. Frohman, are managing the young artist's tour. When the party reaches here it will be joined by Miss Jessie Shay, the pianist, who will share in the solo work with Kubelik, and R. C. Heck, who will handle the financial part of the tour.

Kubelik's last appearances in Europe were full of interest, according to a letter received by Mr. Frohman from Mr. Görlitz. On the 13th inst. the young artist played in obedience to a command for the King of Wurtemberg and the latter's praise was generous. The next day Kubelik left for London, where he arrived on the 15th and on the 16th he played at Brighton. His concert in Queen's Hall, London, on the 19th, was a tremendous success, of which more will be heard later. A reception will probably be given the young violinist on his arrival here next week.

Here are a few remarks of Kubelik's secretary anent his last appearance in Prague:

"His second concert was sold out in three hours. During the sale the people fought for places in line, and there were hand-to-hand encounters for priority of seats. When Kubelik made his appearance at the first concert he was received with musical honors by the Philharmonic Orchestra, and the president of the society addressed him in the following words: 'Great and young master, you were the first who laid the foundation stone, morally and financially, for the existence of the Bohemian Philharmonic Society, and you shall therefore be the first one who receives the festive greeting, the musical honors of the Philharmonic Society'; after which musical honors were kept up for some time. He received enormous ovations, many presents, wreaths and palms. In Vienna everything has been sold out for days before, even the standing room is gone. Herr Rudolf Friml, the accompanist, too, had a great success."

The following extracts are from a handsome booklet issued in conjunction with Kubelik's visit to this country:

"Dr. Hans Richter heard Kubelik first in Vienna, and although he is very much adverse to introducing new artists to the public, he immediately decided that the boy, then nineteen years of age, should make his début with the Richter Orchestra at St. James' Hall, London. He played in June, 1900, and electrified his audience—an audience of Wagner worshipers and Beethoven enthusiasts—who are accustomed to sit silently through an entire Richter program without giving vent to their feelings, except to greet their favorite conductor and to recall him at the end of his evening's work. But this young boy, Kubelik, aroused the people to the highest pitch of enthusiasm. It is impossible to say how many times he was recalled, but contrary to all rules at Richter concerts and symphony concerts in London, he had to play an encore. Ere twenty-four hours were over Kubelik's name was known to every amateur in the country. And now began a series of successful recitals, and his audiences became larger and larger at St. James' Hall, until, after his fifth recital, each entertainment tested the capacity of the hall—a record that has been without equal.

"The most remarkable part of his success was his quick popularity in society. Not one musical party among the aristocracy has been given during the last season without Kubelik as the great attraction. Mr. Astor, who engages only the leading artists of the world for his two annual concerts, asked him to play and to name his own price.

"In the meantime the King heard of this wonderful violinist, and he received two commands, one for Windsor Castle and one for Marlborough House. This, indeed, also is an unheard of success. The King was so pleased that he was instrumental in securing Kubelik's release from all military duties in Austria, and it is safe to say that for many years to come Kubelik will be the chief musical attraction of the London season. During the last three weeks of the season no less than eleven London musical societies nominated Herr Kubelik as an honorary member."

A well-known London correspondent writes:

"The success of the season has undoubtedly been the wonderful Bohemian violinist. Always full audiences and sometimes crowded have attended his six recitals, while most unaccountably audiences for other attractive concerts have been small. But Kubelik is the fashion, and fashion is magnetic. The public having started the Kubelik boom, the critics are now speaking critically of it, and say there is much pleasure to be gotten from works needing the utmost brilliancy of execution, such as Vieuxtemps' Concertos, Wieniawski's Variations, Wilhelmj's Arrangements, Paganini's Compositions, Hubay's Scenes, Ernst's Airs, Tartini's 'Devil's Trill,' and that Kubelik possesses the knowledge and sympathy for works of greater depth is evident from the inclusion in his programs of such works as the Mendelssohn Concerto, the Grieg Sonata in C minor, melodies by Spohr, Beethoven, Gluck, Bach and Händel, and Edward Schütt's Suite for violin and piano.

"Society has gone Kubelik mad. Kubelik, I must inform you, is the new Paganini. He plays the violin so divinely that he is never allowed to have a moment to himself. His doorstep is besieged by messengers with notes from admirers, his rooms are choked up with flowers, his postbag is jammed with invitations, and his agents and secretaries are overworked with the detail of his correspondence. And with it all the youth is simply dazed with his success. He cannot understand it. He speaks no English, and French is to him an unknown tongue. So he is narrowed down to his queer Bohemian German, with which he carries on conversations with ladies of the nobility. The King sent for the young man the other day and asked him to play for him privately. He did so, and captured Marlborough House. The Queen was simply overcome—so I am told by those who pretend to know—and insisted that some mark of royal favor should be shown the young genius; and with that tact for which the King is noted, it was done at once. It is a marvelous sight that one encounters at a Kubelik concert. There are dozens of young women loaded down with arms full of flowers, which they shower down upon their young hero at every turn. In the meantime society sends out cards for 'Kubelik parties,' which have become quite the most popular diversion of this season."

"All these unprecedented successes have not been the means of depriving the artist of his modesty and almost proverbial kindliness. In manner he is entirely simple and unaffected; but he has a most fascinating personality, not being handsome, in the regular way, but his face is most interesting. His hair grows back from his brow, and in amount satisfying the exact standing of the virtuoso, and his dark eyes are wonderfully expressive. While playing he seems almost transformed, and is a most fascinating picture to the auditor."

FLORENCE RANSTEAD'S NEW YORK DEBUT.

OF the débutantes heard in New York last week none are more promising than Miss Florence Ranstead, a young contralto who has sung with success abroad. Miss Ranstead studied with Bouhy in Paris and with Reinhold Hermann in this country, and also in Berlin. Her singing shows the results of careful study, but no teacher could give a young singer the good taste with which Miss Ranstead sings. That is an inborn quality, no matter how much some persons dispute it. Miss Ranstead's voice is very sympathetic, particularly in the middle register. Her enunciation is delightful, because it is not marred by affectations in the French and German. Miss Ranstead sang songs in German, French and English, as follows:

Gut Nacht	Nicod
Die Lotusblume	Fran
Aus Meinen Grossen Schmerzen	Fran
Pensée d'Automne	Massene
Elegie	Massene
Noel Paien	Massene
Air, Ditta	Reye
A Garden Song	Willeb
On Waves	Elga
Where Corals Lie	Elga
Red Clover	Del Rieg
When the Swallows	Whit
Let Us Forget	Whit

The German and French songs were far superior to those by English composers; at least we know some of the writers to be English. Miss Ranstead returns to us fresh from London, and so she may be forgiven for putting in the sentimental drawing room selections. The Willeby and Elgar songs are beneath criticism. Songs a good and better are burned every year, because the composers come to their senses before they send them to the publisher. In dear old London everybody does something. People with a musical bent, who can neither play or sing, compose. That is why so many poor songs are sung by artists who come here from London. The composers are often people of social importance, and therefore have the power to push themselves.

Miss Ranstead sang the Massenet songs extremely well revealing in them all pure diction, excellent phrasing and that good taste for which other critics commend her. She interpreted the Franz songs sympathetically. In Victor Harris Miss Ranstead had an accompanist who did more than play the piano parts of her songs. Mr. Harris, as all New Yorkers know, is a composer himself, and when he accompanies a singer he does it with unerring musical intelligence and taste. Miss Ranstead received numerous bouquets of roses and violets, and after the recital held a reception. The home of the young singer is in Baltimore.

HENRY HOLDEN HUSS.—Henry Holden Huss took a short trip abroad this summer. At Bayreuth, in the intermission between the second and third acts of "Parsifal," he had an interesting chat with Dr. Hans Richter, who lives during the summer a stone's throw from the Wagner Theatre. Dr. Richter took a decided interest in Mr. Huss' piano concerto and desired him to send the score to his Manchester address. Arthur Nikisch, whom Huss saw at Ostend, was very enthusiastic about the concerto. In Paris Raoul Pugno played his new and most interesting "Concertstück." He hopes to play Mr. Huss' new violin Sonata, op. 18, with Ysaye this season. Mr. Huss played this sonata at the first Kneisel concert on November 1. See criticism elsewhere in this issue.

He has been engaged to play his piano concerto with the Pittsburg Orchestra in Pittsburg, January 10 and 11.

HAROLD BAUER.

AROLD BAUER, the pianist, whose latest portrait appears on the title page of this issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER, has achieved brilliant success in his tours igh Spain, Holland and England. The pianist will n to the United States in January to begin his second Bauer will play with every orchestra of importance is country and with the Kneisel Quartet. He will be heard here in recitals. Mr. Bauer will play the on & Hamlin piano exclusively, as he did last season as he has been doing on his Holland tour.

ilip Hale is the author of the subjoined biographical ch of Bauer, published in the Musical World:

asionally a pianist comes to America without flourish of trumbeating of drums and general alarum without. He comes, is and conquers by the display of art and temperament. Such nist is Harold Bauer.

Bauer is not a man whose life is enwrapped in legendary . The story of his career is a simple tale of indefatigable, contious work. He was born in England in 1873 of mixed parent- his father was German by birth, his mother English. As a he showed musical instinct, and he began as a violinist. He d in public when he was nine years old. Although he had ed the piano, he did not dream of a career as a piano virtuoso, Paderewski heard him and urged him to devote himself exclu- to the piano. It was in 1892 that Mr. Bauer went to Paris udy with Paderewski. No doubt the latter was of assistance m; but Mr. Bauer in a great measure is self-taught. A man nsitive, receptive, analytical mind, of liberal knowledge and d reflection, he worked out his own salvation. In 1893 he his début as a pianist in Paris, and for the last eight years as called that city his home, but he has traveled extensively given concerts in Germany, Spain, the Netherlands, Austria, ia, Sweden. His first appearance in America was at Boston, mber 1, 1900, when he played, with the Symphony Orchestra, ns' Concerto in D minor. * * *

should be an interpreter, not merely a speaking tube. He d have individuality, but he should not stand between the oser and the hearer. Never should he deliberately attempt "to the bourgeois sit up." Never should he be obsequious in the nce of a composer.

Bauer has displayed all these qualities.

le following excerpts from critiques of Bauer's play- in Spain in October are of interest:

fame which the English pianist Harold Bauer enjoys caused Teatro Principal to be filled with his friends and admirers. n he appeared on the platform he was greeted by a vehement use which repeated itself at the end of every piece. Bauer ter- ed this previous concert with an Air de Ballet of Gluck-Saint- , played in a marvelous manner, and with an incomparable tion superior to anything we have ever heard in Barcelona, and n brought him a great and well merited ovation.

ere are some Boston and New York criticisms:

the slow movement of the Beethoven Sonata the tone seemed op from the pianist's fingers like so many pearls. But this was one of the charms of Mr. Bauer's playing. Another lay in this, he made the listeners entirely oblivious of questions of technic. his greatest claim to distinction lay in the way in which he d emotion into the music—emotion now tender, now passionate, in surging waves to a thrilling climax. After the dry, languor- playing we have heard in our concert halls, Mr. Bauer was as hing as a shower bath in August. is a musician for whom the message of the composer is the ry consideration. There is a violin timbre in his touch, the est and most mellow heard here since Paderewski. His ten s sing, sing in velocity passages, chant in cantilena, and to ll there is strong mentality, a sense of just historical values, color sense that at times becomes overpowering; at times sts Pachmann in his most sensuous moods. Yet he is himself, and ever the sound, well-balanced musician. His success is unequivocal.—J. Huneker, in New York Sun, December 21, 1900.

His first recital showed that he was a most accomplished musician as well as a virtuoso of the very first rank. He is not merely a draughtsman, although he draws finely; he is a rich colorist, a master in the art of mixing tonal colors. He has great power, but in the stormiest passages his tone is always musical, and there is a suggestion of reserve force. He is an unusually intelligent player. —Philip Hale, in Boston Journal, December 23, 1900.

His playing of the Bach Prelude and Fugue was wonderful. I have long been waiting to hear some one play the Fugue—the "Polka" Fugue—in just that way: in a sufficiently slow tempo to give the theme its sly, roguish wink. Here was fugue playing of the very best sort, making the voice-leading perfectly clear and distinct, yet without that over-insistence upon subject and response which seems to take for granted that if these are heard all that is needful is done. In Brahms' F minor Rhapsody the pianist opens endless vistas of poetic imaginativeness. He made you feel the vastness of the thing.

Upon the whole, Mr. Bauer not only continues to make good all the implied promises of his first playing here, but seems to go from good to better. A most satisfying, soul-filling player, mindful alike of the claims of both the bodily and the mental ear.—W. F. Apthorp, in Boston Transcript, December 28, 1900.

Mr. Bauer still further increased the high opinion of his powers and his refined musical taste that his early performances here excited. Of all players who have visited us of late, he must be accorded a special distinction as the musician's player. It is unalloyed delight to listen to him, not only for the perfection of his technic, the beauty of his tone, his utter freedom from anything resembling mere display for the sake of stimulating the applause of the unthinking, his refraining from forcing the tone of the instrument, and his thorough artistic reserve generally, but for the largeness and intellectuality of his style, and the sincere musicianly quality that is exceptionally characteristic of his playing.—Ben Woolf, in Boston Herald, December 28, 1900.

The criticisms from Holland will also be read with interest:

For several seasons Harold Bauer has been a regular guest among us.

Each year his appearance has been for me the most beautiful and the most joyful moment. When the door of the small concert hall opens, and the attractive, simple, young face of this man appears, it seems to me as if all the fragrance of the oak leaves of spring were coming toward me and I seem to feel the gigantic strength of the oak, adorned with the young leaves resplendent in unblemished freshness and beauty. * * * Then I realize how his fresh and unspoiled spirit, living in a young and sound body, begins to work, how his great mental power convinces me beyond any possible doubt of the undeniable truth of all that he says. Then, too, do I realize that nature has bestowed indeed much on him, but that he increases the talents with which nature has so richly endowed him, and that he never neglects his gifts; that he does not put himself above the public, but endeavors to raise it to his own height and standing in order to become one with his hearers in the enjoyment of his art. * * * After the Sonata of Beethoven I knew full well that Harold Bauer is the greatest pianist.—Amsterdam Echo.

The Beethoven Sonata in A major, op. 101; the Bach Prelude and Fugue in C sharp, the Rondo in C major, the "Perpetuum Mobile" of Weber, the Liszt Etude in F minor, the Schumann "Kreisleriana," the Chopin Scherzo in C sharp minor, Etude in C minor and Prelude in F minor, were the works in which Harold Bauer was heard and admired yesterday. We are aware that this great artist is equal to the very best pianists, and yet he has made a greater impression than ever before in the Sonata of Beethoven and in Bach's Fugue.

Regarding the technic of this great artist, we need not lose a word. What he wants to do he can do. * * *

In the first part of Beethoven's Sonata Bauer produces, as if by enchantment before our imagination, the disposition of a young, innocent and simple mind, of a mind that is still susceptible to all that is impressive and tender, and that tenderness is the fundamental note which gives the whole movement its character.

In the second part, life with all its fullness asserts its rights; the youthful and tender mind is tossed about in the storms of life; it must take up its trouble with the world, and it must learn how to fortify itself against the vicissitudes of life. * * *

In the last allegro the great work has been brought to an end. We no longer hear the utterances of a young, natural and tender mind; the soul has passed through all the strifes of life and is resting now in the peace that follows the sinister battle. Bauer's noble interpretation of Beethoven's masterpiece was convincing and final. —News of the Day, Amsterdam.

Julia C. Allen has charge of the violin department at the Powers-Alexander studios, and has already quite a class in this her first season. She comes here regularly from Scranton, Pa., where she is exceedingly busy with violin students at the Southworth Studios of Music. She has also a large class in Wilkesbarre.

GREGORY HAST'S NEW YORK DEBUT.

GREGORY HAST, the English tenor, made his New York début at Mendelssohn Hall, Monday afternoon, in a program of twenty-one numbers. A large audience greeted the artist, and among those who applauded him were the leading singers and musicians of the metropolis.

The list of songs presented by Mr. Hast showed a wide range of schools, and at the same time established the singer as an artist of uncommon taste. His program follows:

Es hing der Reif.....Brahms
Die Mainacht.....Brahms
Lockruf .....Rückauf
Ein Ton.....Cornelius
The Self-Banished (old English) .....Dr. Blow
Ma Mie (old French).....
(Arranged by A. L.)
How Deep the Slumbers of the Floods.....Löwe
(Arranged by A. L.)
Ich wanderte unter den Baumen.....Schumann
Minnelied .....Brahms
Gone ..... { From Tennyson's / The Letter { Songs of the Wrens. } .....Sullivan (1870)
Le Baiser.....Goring Thomas
Phillis Has Such Charming Graces (old English) .....Anthony Young (1625)
(Arranged by Lane Wilson.)
Rose Kissed Me To-day.....Dal Young
Ye People Rend Your Hearts (from Elijah).Mendelssohn
(By desire.)
If With All Your Hearts (from Elijah).....Mendelssohn
(By desire.)
She Is a Maid of Artless Grace.....Taylor
Immortal Love (MS.).....Arthur Nevin
O Were My Love Yon Lilac Fair.....Somerwell
The Sands o' Dee.....Clay
Roses in the Garden .....O'Neill
To Mary.....White

Mr. Hast possesses that rarest of all voices, a real tenor, very sympathetic, true and sweet and even in all of the registers. But even if nature had blessed him with a voice less beautiful in quality, his singing would place him at the top of concert and oratorio singers everywhere, as it has done in England. His distinct enunciation, correct phrasing, sincerity, all commend him, and with this all he has that gift from the gods—temperament, but it is temperament under good control.

The Brahms and Schumann songs proved a revelation as Mr. Hast sang them. It is doubtful if "Die Mainacht" and the "Minnelied" of Brahms were ever more beautifully sung here. The "Monotone," by Cornelius, or as it is in the original German, "Ein Ton," all sung in the one note of B natural, showed the purity of the singer's voice and his poetic instinct. In the recitative and aria from Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Mr. Hast arose to great heights, but that was expected after what the London critics have said about his singing.

In all of the English songs Mr. Hast evoked the heartiest of applause, for in them he gave the poetic sentiment that value which appeals especially to women. Several ladies in the audience removed their gloves in order that their applause might be more emphatic. The manuscript song by Arthur Nevin, "Immortal Love," was redemanded. Nine of the twenty-one songs in Mr. Hast's program were sung for the first time in New York. The novelties and unfamiliar compositions were "Lockruf," by Ruckauf; "The Self-Banished" (Old English), by Dr. Blow; "Gone" and "The Letter," by Sullivan; "Phillis Has Such Charming Graces" (Old English), by Anthony Young; "Rose Kissed Me To-day," by Dal Young; "She Is a Maid of Artless Grace," by S. Coleridge Taylor; "Immortal Love," by Arthur Nevin, and "Roses in the Garden," by Norman O'Neil.

Victor Harris at the piano played Mr. Hast's accompaniments with taste and always with intelligence. Recalled enthusiastically after the closing song, Mr. Hast returned and brought Mr. Harris on the stage with him to share in the ovation.

Mr. Hast's appearance has been one of the successes of the season.

PHILADELPHIA, November 14, 1901.

FOR the past few years there has been a taeit understanding in Philadelphia that as soon as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has given its first coneert the musical season shall be understood to have commenced, and not till then. Ail that goes before is as the tuning of the instruments before the coneert begins. It is to be sincerely hoped that the whole season may shine out with something near the brilliancy of this first concert given on Monday evening, November 4. The program was as follows:

Tannhäuser—Overture, Bacchanale and scene between Tannhäuser and Venus from the first act (Paris version).
Die Meistersinger—Walter's Prize Song.
Die Götterdämmerung—Siegfried's parting from Brünnhilde. Siegfried's Death. Funeral March. Closing Scene.

Both this concert and the one on the Wednesday evening following have already been heard several times this year in other cities, so I do not propose to speak about them at any length.

It is difficult to conceive a more artistic reading of the "Tannhäuser" Overture than that of Mr. Gericke on Monday evening. Seasons come and seasons go, but this overture still remains one of the most glorious and entrancing of orchestral works. If anything the orchestra has always erred on the side of intellectuality, but there was no trace of this at the opening concert. The woodwind was particularly well handled. In the four grand scenes from "Die Götterdämmerung" Fräulein Ternina sang magnificently. Her voice filled the building, but never lost a whit of its mellowness. Ellison Van Hoose, who sang with Ternina in the "Tannhäuser" and "Siegfried" music, was also in splendid voice. The Academy of Music was crowded. There was not a single seat available and very little standing room.

At the second concert on Wednesday the audience was only half as large. Two concerts only two days apart seem to be more than the musical digestion of Philadelphia can take care of Unfortunately the itinerary of the orchestra prevents any change being made in this respect. The program was:

Overture, Richard III., op. 68.....Volkmann
Concerto for 'cello and orchestra.....Lalo
Symphonic poem, No. 7, Festklaenge.....Liszt
Symphony in A major, No. 7, op. 92.....Beethoven

Smith and De Koven have written a sequel to "Robin Hood," and, like most sequels, it were better left unwritten. It is called "Maid Marian," and was produced for the first time on any stage by the Bostonians at the Chestnut Street Opera House on Monday, November 4

THE LEONORA JACKSON TOUR.

THE Leonora Jackson tour is a brilliant success. With so famous a star as the violinist herself at the head; with two such gifted and popular artists as Harry J. Fellows and William Bauer assisting, and with the thorough work and zealous desire to please all patrons which is characteristic of Miss Jackson's management, it is not surprising that a solid tour is being booked. Miss Jackson's dates have been taken solidly from early October to the latter part of December, a great list of bookings from Michigan to Maine and back through Pennsylvania to Washington for Christmas, not a free day remaining except Sundays. Her dates in the West and South and on the Pacific Coast are filling rapidly, and the indications are that last year's brilliant record of 160 concerts will be fully duplicated. It goes without saying that Leonora Jackson receives enthusiastic ovations wherever she appears. Harry J. Fellows and William Bauer are also great favorites.

Charles Baumann died a few days ago at his hom Baltimore, of Bright's disease. He had been ill for s time and his death was not unexpected. Mr. Baum was a prominent figure in musical circles throughout eity, and had played with the various symphony orches there.

JULIAN PASCAL'S RETURN.—Julian Pascal, the pia has returned to New York with his family, and it is purpose to remain here permanently. Mr. Pascal spent summer at his old home in Bridgetown, the capital Barbados. During the summer he gave recitals in bados, Jamaica and Trinidad. As soon as Mr. Pascal rived at Bridgetown he was welcomed by the Gover Sir Frederick Hodgson, who bestowed upon him unu attention and made him his guest at the Governr House. Mr. Pascal's first recital attracted a large audi of musical people, and his second recital drew more p ple than could gain admission into the hall. At King the pianist achieved equally as brilliant a success. Pascal repeated his success in Port of Spain, Trini where he entertained an audience made up of English, r man, French and Spanish. When Mr. Pascal reached town he found that everybody was mourning for Presi McKinley. As a tribute to the dead President of adopted country Mr. Pascal opened his recital with pin's "Funeral March." No sooner had the pianist st the first chord than the Governor of Trinidad, Sir Al Moloney, gave the signal to the audience, which at rose and remained standing until the last measure had played. After giving three recitals in Trinidad, Mr. P returned to Bridgetown, where he gave his farewell cert, under the patronage of the Governor and his l ship the bishop, a very large audience being present

Just before he left New York, May 25, Mr. Pascal pl in the hands of the John Church Company the manus of "God's Love Divine." Upon his return he was infor that the composition had won a quick success, a large n ber of copies having been sold.

Mr. Pascal has resumed his piano teaching in his st Steinway Hall. It is his purpose to give several rec in New York and neighboring cities this season.

ollection of the easiest piano etudes is "The Pupil's First Album," by Ferdinand Meyer. They are progressively arnd, and extend from a selection from Cornelius Gurlitt's op. 187 re Notes in Two Hands") to an "Octave Study," a "Study in s," and similar works. The volume is of fifty-five pages, and ns fifty-two compositions. These compositions represent more twenty composers. The volume will prove helpful to teachers alone or in conjunction with a more or less definite course of The pieces are short (none is longer than two pages), and represent the principal hand and rhythmic problems. At the end (four pages) there are scales and chords in all the major and minor keys, each with a cadence group.

"Summer Dreams" is the title of the six new piano duets by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. They are for medium grade playing, admirably prepared, very musical, and they make an appeal to the earnest pupil that makes for the cultivation of refined taste. The titles are imaginative—"The Brownies," "Robin Redbreast," "Twilight," "Katydids," "Elfin Tarantelle," "Good-night."

"Me." A Cycle of Songs. Text from "A Child's Garden of Verses," by Robert Louis Stevenson, has been set to music by Thomas G. Shepard. Melodically these songs are simple and natural. The piano is used independently. The poems, selected from the ever-improving volume of Stevenson's, are "Foreign Lands," "The Land of Counterpane," "My Shadow," "The Lamplighter," "My Ship and I," "Farewell to the Farm."

EMMA NEVADA.

The Prima Donna and Her Company Arrive on the St. Paul—Their Long Tour About to Begin.

EMMA NEVADA, the celebrated prima donna, arrived on the St. Paul last Saturday. With her came the following members of her concert company: Dr. Raymond Palmer, manager; Pablo Casals, violoncellist; Leon Moreau, pianist, and M. Maquarre, flutist.

A number of the singer's friends were at the dock to meet her upon the arrival of the St. Paul and she was given a cordial welcome. As she stepped down the gang plank Madame Nevada looked the picture of health. The passage across the Atlantic had been smooth and she was not seasick one minute.

"I have a vivid remembrance of my experience when last I landed in New York," said Madame Nevada. "Then I was so ill that I had to be taken in a carriage to my hotel. Now I am perfectly well and feel in excellent condition for the long tour that lies before me."

The members of Nevada's company enjoy a very high European reputation, but never before have they visited the United States. They come with the warmest commendation of the foremost critics in Europe.

Leon Moreau, the pianist, ranks among the greatest of the French pianists. He has played frequently in France, Spain, Portugal and England, and his success has been unequivocal. Moreau is not only a pianist of great ability, but an excellent composer as well. He collaborated with Charles Lamoureaux in the production of "Tristan and Isolde," and won great distinction on account of his ripe musicianship. Some of his larger works, such as his piano concerto and his symphonic poem, have received the unqualified approbation of the most discriminating critics and the most distinguished pianists. But for his coming to America Moreau would have played this concerto in London and Paris this season. As a pianist Moreau exemplifies the elegance of the French school. His technic is adequate and his musical scholarship is undoubted. It is confidently expected that he will during this tour through America duplicate his transatlantic successes.

Another novus homo to the American public is Pablo Casals, the violoncellist. He is a protégé of the Queen Regent of Spain, and has received no less than four royal decorations. He has also been decorated by the King of Portugal. Casals has played with success in all the musical centres of Europe. He played for the Prince of Wales only a few weeks before Queen Victoria's death, and later was summoned to the Queen's palace. He so charmed Queen Victoria that she bestowed upon him a costly gift. He was the last musician who was in the Queen's presence. At the Crystal Palace concerts in London Casals appeared as soloist, and won the praise of audiences and critics.

Maquarre, the flutist, is esteemed as one of the greatest flute players in Europe. He was a prize pupil of the Paris Conservatoire, and subsequently achieved a great reputation as a soloist.

Heathe Gregory, the young basso, is too well-known to need any extended comments here. His work last season stamped him as an artist.

To-morrow Madame Nevada and her company will leave New York for Boston, where their tour will begin. They will appear in the Colonial Theatre in that city the night of November 26.

THE NEW HUSS SONATA.

AT the concert of the Kneisel Quartet, Tuesday evening of last week, the novelty was a Sonata for violin and piano, by Henry Holden Huss. This work, still in manuscript, was heard here for the first time, and confirmed the impression made by other works of the same composer, namely, that he has something to say. In addition to this he boldly departed from the usual manner of saying it, casting convention aside and preferring his own idea of presenting his subject.

The scheme upon which this work is built is that of a certain thematic unity, joining the several movements and welding them into a closer whole by a careful treatment of theme, which, either in its entirety or as a reminiscence, recurs in the different movements.

In carrying out this plan Mr. Huss succeeded. And so well did he choose his subject that it was easily recognizable in whatever form it appeared.

Altogether the work is very pleasing, and as special features there stand out the first theme, an irregular melody of wild beauty, and the second one of the Andante, a tender, singing cantabile. The composition is in three movements: Allegro, Andante (with an alternating Presto) and Allegro.

The composer played the piano part, and made interesting that usually thankless portion of the task. By its applause the audience testified its appreciation of the composition.

FERDINAND CARRI'S RECITAL.

THE forthcoming tours through the United States of several famous violinists from abroad have stimulated our local violinists and put them on their mettle. Already this season they are showing unusual activity.

For many years Ferdinand Carri has been esteemed as oen of the leading violinists of New York, and he holds a very large following. Within the past two or three years, however, he has but infrequently appeared before the public. It is his intention to do much playing this season. The first in a series of recitals which he will give in Knabe Hall this winter took place last Tuesday night, and was attended by a large and musical audience. In the hall were many of the professional and amateur violinists of New York and Brooklyn.

The following judiciously arranged program was gone through without hitch or omission:

Sonata .....Le Clair
The Language of Flowers.....Hermann Carri
Canzonetta .....Godard
Larghetto .....Nardini
Le Labyrinthe de l'Harmonie.....Locatelli
Concerto No. 1.....Paganini
Cadenza by Ferdinand Carri.
Air on the G String.....Bach-Wilhelmj
Dance of the Elfs (Etude in Thirds).....F. Carri
Menuetto .....Veracini
Legende .....Böhm
God Save the King!.....Paganini

This unconventional scheme was well thought out, and afforded the violinist rare opportunities for displaying his virtuoso powers, as well as his musicianship. It is but seldom nowadays that such antique works as those of Le Clair, Nardini and Locatelli are heard. Mr. Carri deserves praise for reviving them. He revels in the classics of the old Italian masters, and is a loyal adherent of Paganini, having been a lifetime student of his works.

While Mr. Carri played the entire program in masterly style, evoking great enthusiasm and winning many encores, he was distinctly at his best in the Paganini Concerto (No. 1), his own cadenza being a marvelous performance. It may be said with truth that in this recital Mr. Carri was at his best and rose to a high point. He played his famous Maggini, known as "Jupiter," which is beyond doubt one of the most valuable Magginis in existence. Mr. Carri was assisted by his brother, Hermann, who played the accompaniments with good judgment and refined taste.

BERLIN, W., LINKSTRASSE 17.

Berlin Concerts.

COLONNE and his Parisian orchestra were here last week for one concert. They used the Royal Opera House, graciously lent by Emperor Wilhelm. Thus the occasion was not without a certain political significance. For us musicians the concert was interesting, because we saw in Colonne the man who had taught Paris to like Wagner, and because we were afforded a rare chance to compare olonne with our Berlin conductors, and his men with our unted Philharmonic Orchestra. By the way, odious as ey are, there is nothing that your musician likes better an comparisons.

The very first number called for some. When a strange nductor plays here Beethoven's third "Leonore" overe it is equivalent to throwing a gauntlet in the face the critics. Colonne's boldness went even farther. He ayed as though he had never heard of the dread word adition." His tempi were his own. And so were the ecision and finish of his band. The audience suddenly oke to the fact that in order to conduct Beethoven operly a leader need not stand like a wooden image and op off measures, phrases and periods with the fatal regarity of a cutting machine. This was a suave, smooth ethoven, and he pleased his hearers immensely. Mainly ponsible for the polished reading were the strings and woodwind. It were difficult to imagine a finer body first violins. In volume, quality and unanimity their rk seemed ideal. It is the fashion always to praise ench woodwind instruments. After hearing them last ek I am content to go with the fashion. I found the ass a trifle blatant at times, but not disturbingly so. e Germans seem to get more mellowness and variety of e from their brasses. It is difficult to say whether the yers or the instruments are responsible.

Apropos of the tendency on the part of our Berlin crit- to arrogate to themselves the sole right of dispensing horitative Beethoven lore, I would recall a certain inci- nt that happened here about two years ago. Every Ber- critic will tell you that he knows Beethoven's third eonore" overture in his sleep, backward and forward, m memory. At one of the Philharmonic concerts Ni- ch placed this piece on his program. By way of an eximent, and in order to hear the opinion of the critics, did not end the piece with its own coda, but used in- ad that of the second "Leonore" overture, entirely dif- nt in harmonic and orchestral treatment. Of all the rded music sages who listened severely, not one noticed substitution. It was left to an American critic—oh! se unmusical Americans—to discuss the change in his er. The critic, Otto Floersheim; the paper, the New k MUSICAL COURIER.

ut to return to our concert. Charpentier's richly col- d orchestral suite, "Impressions d'Italie," was music ch these Frenchmen played con amore. Here Colonne wed that he, too, is a master of nuance. In the Bee- ven number he had drawn a larger design, had made arent the fact that it is music cast in one mold. But Charpentier piece was a delightful succession of vary- musical moods, a series of many hued miniatures, cal, humorous, grave, triste, sentimental. Colonne dis- ed all the tricks of phrasing and dynamics that belong he modern conductor's technic of characterization.

aint-Saëns' A minor Symphony is pleasant music, and pleasantly played. The work should figure more fretly at orchestral concerts.

Wagner's "Venusberg" music, from "Tannhäuser," was done with force and fire. The tempi were exceedingly rapid. This was the more curious as Colonne had played the Beethoven Overture much slower, in all its parts, than it is usually read here by Nikisch and Weingartner.

"Le dernier sommeil de la vierge," by Massenet, gave the strings a fine chance to display their wonderful pianissimo, and Lalo's Norwegian Rhapsodic did not want for brilliancy and temperament.

Two bits of Berlioz's "Damnation de Faust" won demonstrative plaudits from the audience. The "Marche Hongroise," long one of Colonne's famous show pieces, was an inimitable piece of orchestral virtuosity.

The audience was large and most enthusiastic. One ass hissed after the Massenet piece, and was promptly urged into the street. The newspaper reviews are unanimous in their praise.

Of the second musical feast given by Leopold Godowsky at Beethoven Hall, I missed the most important part, the meat, Tschaikowsky (Sonata, G major, op. 37), Brahms and Schumann. I came for the dessert, Liadow, Rosenthal and Henselt-Weber-Godowsky. And what a dessert it was! Rosenthal's "Papillons," rapturously redemanded, as bright and stimulating as port; Liadow's Berceuse, musical sweets of the most saccharine, and to end with the most difficult technical nuts cracked for us with prodigious ease by that wizard, Godowsky.

For the thoughtful musician, there was food in the pianist's masterful arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Dance." Of course the main purpose was to heap up technical obstacles in order to display the performer, but Godowsky's musicianship and musical taste ever go hand in hand with his virtuosity. The Weber number contains contrapuntal and harmonic episodes of supreme beauty and skill.

Cheered by a solid phalanx of auditors who made most determined front, Godowsky came forth again, and in his version of Weber's "Moto Perpetuum" did the quickest piano playing imaginable. Once more he was forced to his instrument, and as a compliment to Professor Leschetizky, who sat in the parquet applauding enthusiastically, Godowsky added the famous pedagogue's "Arabeske" in A flat. It was another triumphal night for this triumphant pianist, Godowsky.

The Baginsky Trio, a local organization of three talented young women, gave an extremely interesting concert at the beautiful new recital hall of the Philharmonie. In a Schubert Trio, the brave band displayed reliable musical training, and in Rubinstein's melodious B flat Trio they played with vim and brilliance.

Their chief merit, however, lay in the fact that they introduced to the Berlin public a singer hitherto unknown here, Minnie Methot, of New York. She chose as the vehicle of this introduction Mozart's "Deh vieni" aria, and Liszt's "Loreley," a severe vocal test. She has a soprano voice of purest quality and most sympathetic timbre. These, together with musical taste and dignity of interpretation, rendered the Mozart number a perfect performance, a fact which the large audience recognized and rewarded with an encore. In the "Loreley" Mrs. Methot proved that she understands also how to win dramatic accents from her voice. The song was done with consummate expression and effect. Volume, a rarely smooth legato and enchanting piano were all in evidence. Again the success was unequivocal, and after much applause the singer added an English song.

Gottfried Galston is by all means a recital pianist. At Bechstein Hall, without orchestra, he was a much better player than at Beethoven Hall recently, with orchestra. In the smaller room his lack of strength was not so apparent, and closer contact with the audience revealed many details that were lost at his first concert. His best playing was done in the Brahms numbers, delivered with poetry and insight. His audience were of my opinion, and proved it by compelling Galston to many bows and encores.

Eva Lessmann, the daughter of one of Berlin's venerable critics, gave a song recital at Beethoven Hall. In a program embracing lyrics by Schubert, Liszt (welcome sight), Brahms, Cornelius and R. Strauss, Miss Lessmann displayed interpretative gifts of no mean order. She knows well how to fathom the mood of a song, and how to send that mood across the footlights. These are separate arts, not always combined in some of our best known singers. Particularly was this rare power noticeable in the Brahms group. Miss Lessmann's voice needs further careful training and more experience in large concert halls. At present it seems to lack flexibility and freedom. Given unhampered vocal resources, in a few years Miss Lessmann should make of herself one of the best German lieder singers.

The French invasion of Berlin was continued by the Parisian sisters Chaigneau, Therese, Suzanne and Marguerite, who played trios for piano, violin and 'cello at Bechstein Hall. Vincent d'Indy (in B), Camille Saint-Saëns (in F), and Ed. Lalo (in A minor), constituted their program. My nightly sprint through Berlin's concert halls allowed of only twenty minutes' stay with the pretty, white gowned sisters. During that time I heard them play the Scherzo and the Allegro of Saint-Saëns' clever Trio. Vivacious music it was, and brightly played. Extreme delicacy of touch, precision of attack, and absolute refinement marked what little I heard from the Chaigneau sisters.

Two other trio concerts drew large audiences last week. Professor Georg Schumann (piano), Prof. Carl Halir (violin), and Royal Prussian chamber virtuoso Dechert ('cello) held forth at the Singakademie. I heard them play a new piano quintet, by Ludwig Thuille, whose opera "Lobestanz" was performed here about two years ago. The quintet is well made, interesting and effective. There is nothing strikingly original about its form or content. Who does write anything strikingly original nowadays in the overworked field of chamber music? I often wonder whether it has a future, whether it will ever find its Wagner?

At the Philharmonie one could hear another professional trio, consisting of Messrs. Barth, Wirth and Hausmann, all of them teachers at the Royal High School for Music (Hochschule). Hear these gentlemen one season, and you have heard them always. The same programs, the same readings, the same audiences (with a goodly sprinkling of patriarchs wearing black velvet caps, and kindly faced grandames busily knitting shapeless socks), and the same promiscuous applause. This year there were two changes. Professor Hausmann's tone on the 'cello has grown sour, and Professor Wirth's bowing made one think he was turning an ice cream freezer.

I must smile when I hear American musicians refer to their German colleagues as "lazy idealists, untainted by the desire for money." (I read this in a musical monthly.) Give them the chance to desire, with some prospect of realization, and they work music for all there is in it. An example of this type is Professor Halir. He teaches violin at the Hochschule, has a large private class, is assistant conductor to Joachim, trains a quartet class, belongs to the Joachim Quartet, gives concerts here, all over Germany and in England, heads the Halir Quartet, belongs to the Schumann Trio and is concertmaster at the Berlin Royal Opera! There is a record for you. Show me its duplicate in America!

The Singakademie Choral Society gave a concert of unusual interest under the distinguished direction of that most accomplished musician, Prof. Georg Schumann. The work presented was César Franck's "Les Béatitudes." Did you read what Philip Hale and Otto Floersheim said in these columns about that fine piece of choral writing? If not I'm sorry for you, because I don't intend to try the hopeless task of improving on their analyses. The Sing akademie were in fine form, and at times found accents intensely poignant and human. Try as you might to look like a hardened critic of twenty years' sitting, you were gripped by the throat and had to swallow hard.

There came here a singing society of 180 voices from the town of Kattowitz. I looked up my railroad map and found Kattowitz to be in Silesia. Last week, on two evenings, it was in the Singakademie. I went there to see and hear the town. And a very musical town it is, under the leadership of a finely cultured musician named Oscar Meister. We opened our ears wide, we people who talk of "art centres," "homes of music" and the like. There is an art centre and a home of music wherever there are some talent, serious endeavor, untiring industry and a leading spirit to guide the way.

A number of difficult choral works, large and small, from Stobäus (1580-1646) to Max Bruch, proved that the Kattowitz Club has created a healthy musical atmosphere of its own. Every piece was done with intelligence, taste, accuracy and finish. Meister is a meister indeed in the drilling and leading of a choral body.

If every small town in Germany can boast of such a chorus I shall take two weeks off to think out the musical future of Germany. "To her belongs the future," said James Huneker in these pages a few weeks ago. I wonder if he has heard the Kattowitz Singverein?

They had Berlin soloists at their concerts, and distinguished ones, too—Professor Joachim and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Joachim played a Barcarolle, by Spohr, and "Tambourin," by Leclair! That is one of the privileges of fame, to inflict such a program on a cultured audience. Young Gabrilowitsch was more dignified. He chose the Händel-Brahms Variations, and played them superbly. Gabrilowitsch is growing broader in style. His performance was masterful and convincing.

Etelka Freund is a pianist of power. She was powerful in Beethoven's "Les Adieux" Sonata, op. 81a, she was powerful in Brahms' two books of variations on one inoffensive theme of Paganini, and she was powerful in Busoni's tasteless version of a Bach Toccata and Fugue. I could not stay for Schumann's "Davidsbündler" dances, but I'm sure Miss Freund must have been powerful in that. Withal, the young lady has unusual talent, and if she will forget Carreño for a time, and imitate—let us say Clothilde Kleeberg—Miss Freund will possibly strike the happy medium and find herself on the road to the pianistic Parnassus.

Miss Marie Geselschap dared us with a Sabbath matinee. She is a bold pianist in more ways than one. Her program was almost a challenge. It started off with eight preludes, op. 31, by C. V. Alkan, the man who wrote the studies recommended by Hans von Bülow, and continued with a well worked out ballade, op. 94, by Philipp Scharwenka; a pretty waltz, op. 54, by Dvorák; "Papillons," very trashy, by Ole Olsen; three pieces, melodious, by P. Juon; a lachrymose elegy, by Busoni, and finally, for a finish, Liszt's two legends of St. Francis. Miss Geselschap played exceedingly well, but she pedaled badly. Her program was more extraordinary than her performance. However, it takes bravery to break away from tradition, and I admire her for it.

The Philharmonic Chorus, under the leadership of its tried and trusted conductor, Siegfried Ochs, gave a glorious performance of Bach's great B minor Mass. That was one of the few occasions when a critic felt himself totally disarmed. The grandiose work had been prepared with the utmost care, and every detail was worked out to perfection without in any way marring the unity of the whole. The technical difficulties of the mass were under such absolute control that nothing interfered with one's complete absorption in the spirit of this most marvelous composition. The soloists? I heard none. I heard Bach's B minor Mass.

Of song recitals there have been many. Space begins to grow valuable, so merely as a matter of record I shall run cursorily through a list of the doughty vocalists. Raimund von Zur-Mühlen (Beethoven Hall) has a large following here, and his annual concerts are crowded. He is an interesting artist, but lays more stress on the interpretation of a song than on beauty or variety of vocalization. And he forces his voice—a common fault in Germany. Maria Spies, of Dresden, is an alto, who has some voice but no vocal art. Her concert (Singakademie) was too soon by at least one year. Arthur van Eweyk, an American (Bechstein Hall), is a painstaking singer, with goodly vocal gifts. Even if not always strictly artistic, he never fails to win applause. Agnes Leydhecker is an artist of rare ability. She has unusual vocal powers, and knows full well how to use them. Charm of delivery and abundance of temperament, too. What more is necessary? Jeanne Golz and Hjalmar Arlberg (Singakademie), solos and duets. Miss Golz was too nervous. Mr. Arlberg has a sweet voice of the parlor type, and is a blonde, pretty man. Dr. Mannreich (Beethoven Hall) suffers from excess of sentiment. Magda and Franz Henri von Dulong (Beethoven Hall) suffer from too many zealous friends, although they sing well. Thea von Redwitz should do her practicing at home. Eugen Brieger should give up his entirely. Ludwig Strakosch is one of the loudest singers that ever came Berlin. Max Rothenbücher (Singakademie) should reci less and sing more. A noble record. Where are the co petent German singers?

The position of "third" conductor is vacant at our Roy Opera. Candidates are being tried for it. One of the Edmund von Strauss (Bremen Opera), directed "Lohe grin" last week, and made a highly favorable impressic He has confidence, tact and knowledge. It was no ea matter for a novice to lead on that evening, as the singe seemed to be suffering from frog in the head or sunstrol A worse performance I never heard anywhere. It was feat for Strauss not to become "rattled."

At a church concert I heard Miss Gertrude Smith, American, do some exceedingly interesting organ playi She possesses musical intelligence of a high order, r taste in registration, and firm rhythm, qualities that are dispensable in connection with really artistic performan on this most difficult of all instruments. She knows w how to handle her feet—curious paradox! Clearness pedaling and accuracy of voice leading marked all her p formances. Max Gulka, of New York, played at this c cert two movements from Bach's G minor Violin Sona Mr. Gulka has a reliable technic, firm command of bow, and a large tone that lends itself admirably to vari of color.

Marquis de Souza, that fat baritone buffoon who m such a picturesque fiasco in America, is singing at leading variety hall here, the Wintergarten. They advert his salary, an enormous figure per week. No one belie it, not even he.

Just as I am about to close this budget, there come w derful reports from Moscow of Moriz Rosenthal's sen tional success there. The papers speak of it as the great triumph ever achieved in Russia by any pianist. But tails must keep until next week or I'll lose this steamer.

THE AMERICAN METHOD OF SINGING.
A recently discovered science which develops every accepted voice into the same tones with which Patti, De Res é and all great artists were born. Thus far no singer has ever known the possibilities of his voice in quality, volu e or compass. The American Method is not taught outside the Chicago Studio.

inces next fall, after the Bayreuth Festival. The singers elt themselves called upon to ask permission of Her Majesty, Cosima I. "By all means accept" was the edict rom Bayreuth. This looks like the bloodless ending of a attle that promised to be long and bitter.

Prof. Richard Hausmann and the composer Victor Hausmann announce a new concert scheme, to begin here ery soon. The two shrewd gentlemen propose to give natinees of works seldom or never before heard in Berlin. Considering the dearth of good concerts, the new enterrise should be a welcome addition and a brilliant financial success.

A Montreux paper says: "Young Raoul Koczalski, whose piano recitals are so popular in Geneva, made his irst appearance there this season, on October 29. Following what strikes us as an unnecessary and extraordinary ashion introduced lately in Germany, this young gentleman announced that during the performance of 'Des Morceaux' the lights would be turned down, and the hall arkened." We have heard nothing in Germany of this custom. The critics would soon jump on such a cheap attempt to gain notoriety.

Ladislas Gorski, the Polish violinist and first husband of the present Madame Paderewska, has settled in Montreux, where he intends to teach and give recitals.

Hans Pfitzner's new music drama, "The Rose of Love," is to be performed at Elberfeld on November 9. The composer will conduct. Pfitzner teaches harmony here at Stern's Conservatory.

She—"Have you seen the new Murillo bought by the city?"

He—"I never get time to go to the 'Zoo.'"—German Times.

The Bohemian String Quartet is having its usual successful fall tour through Germany. Next week we are to hear them in Berlin. During December they will play in Bucharest, Sofia, Constantinople and Belgrade; January and February, in England and Holland; March and April, Italy and France.

In Warsaw there is talk of erecting a Chopin statue. Among the eminent Polish musicians who have already joined the committee are Sembrich, Stojowski, Paderewski, Hubermann and many others. French, Russian and Polish sculptors will be asked to submit models.

Franz Fischer, one of the leaders of the Munich Royal Opera, has been "lent" for two months to Barcelona (Teatro del Liceo), where he will rehearse and direct "Götterdämmerung," "Siegfried," "Lohengrin" and "Hänsel und Gretel."

Pianists should be careful. A man was recently arrested and fined here for pedaling without a license.

Rosenthal's European recital tours annually resolve themselves into an unbroken series of resounding triumphs. Advices just received from Budapest chronicle the extraordinary impression made by the Roumanian pianist at the first Philharmonic concert. It might interest American readers to know that while all the Hungarian critics acknowledge Rosenthal's technic to be as supreme as ever, it is mainly about his splendid musicianship and the beauty of his tonal effects that they rave. Thus the Pesther Lloyd says: "The tearful sentiment of the Larghetto (Chopin's E minor Concerto), so often degraded by Chopin specialists into hysterical sentimentality, under Rosenthal's hands sounded like a deeply affecting song of sorrow painted in colors of marvelous beauty." This is the least rhapsodical of the criticisms. All the papers speak of Rosenthal's "stormy" reception, and of the countless recalls and encores.

Rudolf Christians will not leave our opera in order to go to America, as reported by several local dailies last week. Christians is under contract here until 1903.

The program of the second Symphony concert under the direction of Richard Strauss will include D'Indy's symphonic legend, "La forêt enchantée," Tschaikowsky's symphonic ballad, "The Woywode," and "Dionysian Fantaisie," by Hausegger. The soloist will be Professor Halir, who is to play a violin concerto by the Boston composer, A. Löffler.

The soloists of the celebrated Gürzenich concerts in Cologne are to be Mesdames Dietz, Fremstad, Gmeiner, Brema, Schleger, Geyer, Herzog, Hövelmann, Kraus-Osborne, Morena, Muriel Foster, Edith Walker, and Messrs. Felix Kraus, Van Rooy, Hans Schütz, Sistermans, Siewert, d'Albert, Pugno, Staub, Joachim, Thibaud, Willy Hess and Grützmacher.

Hausegger's "Barbarossa," symphonic poem, which met with a very cool reception here at the first Nikisch concert, was recently performed with exceptional success in Leipsic. Who is right?

"The Improvisator," d'Albert's new opera, will be produced in a few weeks at the Royal Opera. Rehearsals have already begun.

Conrad Ansorge is touring Germany. Newspaper criticisms from various cities express some disappointment at the performances of this pianist, who has managed to gain some little reputation in certain musical circles of Berlin.

Professor Halir will give a concert soon with orchestra. The program is to consist of his own new Concerto in D, that of Brahms, and Mozart's in A.

Teresita Carreño, the young daughter of Teresa Carreño, recently gave two very successful piano recitals in Helsingfors, Finland.

Elfrieda Rohda, a singer from New York, will be heard here on November 13 at her own concert, in the Singakademie.

The German Times said last week: "Edouard de Reszké arrived safely in New York. The stock market remained firm."

Among the recent callers at the Berlin offices of THE MUSICAL COURIER were Frida Quehl, violinist, from Cologne; Hugo Görlitz, impresario, from London; Sada Wertheim, violinist, and Mrs. Wertheim, mama, both from New York; Mrs. Samuel Seabury, Maurice Kaufmann, talented American violinist; Miss Selma Pfeiffer (New York), student of piano; Hans Winderstein, conductor, from Leipsic; Mr. and Mrs. Hugo Mansfeldt, pianists and pedagogues, from San Francisco; Mrs. Leopold Godowsky, Miss Frances McElwee, pianist and writer; Alvin Kranich, the Leipsic representative of this paper; Edmund von Strauss, operatic conductor, from Bremen; Minnie Methot, singer, from New York, and Royal Concertmaster Dessau, of the Berlin Opera.

Judge—"What is your business?"
Witness—"I am an American composer."
Judge (angrily)—"This is no place for jokes. You are to tell how you support yourself."

When Leschetizky was here last week I asked him how American music students compare with European. He answered: "The Americans have amazing powers of acquiring knowledge. In that respect they are my best pupils. They have quickness of comprehension, keenness of insight and ability for practical application. They are unswervingly industrious. But their main fault is their extreme hurry. They come to Europe in a hurry, they want to learn everything in a hurry, they complete their studies in a hurry and they return home in a hurry. Hurry is the curse of art in your country. In business it means progress; in music, superficiality. Make haste slowly should be the motto of your young musicians."

Saint-Saëns' "Danse Macabre" was played at a recent orchestral concert here. Asked what number of the program had pleased her most, a young American vocal student replied, "'Micawber's Dance,' by Saint-Saëns."

HARMONICA.

CRANE MUSICALE.—Mme. Ogden Crane will give a pupils' musicale and tea Wednesday afternoon, November 27, at 3:30, at Genealogical Hall, 226 West Fifty-eighth street. Tickets are complimentary and may be obtained at the studio, No. 3 East Fourteenth street, on application.

SONGS SUITABLE FOR PUPILS.—Mrs. Alice Kraft Benson, a well-known singing teacher, writes as follows concerning the "Three Songs From Some Verses," words by Helen Hay, music by Berenice Thompson:

MY DEAR MRS. THOMPSON—Because of the long delay in writing to thank you for so kindly sending me your lovely songs, please do not think me unappreciative. * * * I agree thoroughly with the very nice notice the Star accorded your songs. I feel they are something I can offer some of my pupils, to whom I never give anything (or aim to) except something of true value.

Most sincerely yours, ALICE KRAFT BENSON.

AMY MURRAY.—More than 1,000 persons attended the recent concert in Jersey City given by Clan McLeod. Miss Amy Murray, the Scottish recital singer, was one of the "stars" of the evening. The Scottish-American published a report of the affair, and among other things paid this tribute to Miss Murray:

Miss Amy Murray won enthusiastic plaudits by her rendering of "Young Lochinvar" and "Caller Herrin'." Had she been on an Edinburgh street with a creel-fu' o' herrin' Miss Murray's cry to be relieved of her "halesome fairin" would have been irresistible.

Owing to bookings with women's clubs and musical societies in the Middle West, Miss Murray was obliged to refuse numerous engagements for "Burns' Birthday" celebrations in the States of New York, Massachusetts and Connecticut.

"HERR PROFESSOR."

DO you know Professor Struppelfinger, the teacher who talks piano so beautifully?

There's no teacher by that name in the city of Berlin? Let me take you to his studio, and you will recognize him instantly.

Scene: Elegantly furnished music room. Two grand pianos. Paintings, rugs, bric-à-brac, photographs of all the well-known musicians, their busts, music racks filled with neatly bound volumes labeled "Bach," "Haydn," "Mozart," "Beethoven."

Enter young woman, unmistakably American. Herr Professor is seated at his desk, oblivious to everything and everybody. Young woman divests herself of wraps, and coughs several times. Finally she ventures to seat herself before the piano and to touch the keys very softly.

PROFESSOR S. (turns)—"Ah, Miss Goodthing, you here? Pray pardon me; I was composing. A new concerto for piano. I'll probably play it here soon." (Turns the manuscript face downward.)

MISS G.—"You're a remarkably quick worker, Herr Professor. Have you finished that symphony you were writing last week?"

PROFESSOR S.—"Symphony? (quickly) Oh, symphony! Why, yes. Yes, indeed. Finished it a few days later. Quite a job, too, I assure you."

MISS G.—"How I wish I could do such things."

PROFESSOR S. (charitably)—"All in due time, my dear Miss Goodthing. I did not always compose. It seems like a dream to me to-day, when I think of composing concertos and symphonies. Have you been to any concerts of late? Godowsky, Sauer, Carreño?"

MISS G.—"I heard Sauer and Godowsky."

PROFESSOR S.—"I don't care for Sauer; there's no form about his playing. It's all extremes; either pianissimo or pounding. And Godowsky is dry. He lacks magnetism. I pointed out several places to him—I know him very well—in the Tschaikowsky Sonata last week where I thought he could have obtained better effects. He was very grateful, of course. Did you hear Kreisler?"

MISS G.—"Yes; at the Philharmonic concert."

PROFESSOR S.—"A very gifted young man; but with him virtuosity exceeds intellect. It is a predominance of the material over the spiritual, so to speak."

MISS G. (fingers her music nervously)—"Yes, sir."

PROFESSOR S.—"I'm afraid I'm getting beyond you. (Pulls out his watch.) Dear, dear; here's ten minutes of your lesson gone. You mustn't ask so many questions."

MISS G.—"I"——

PROFESSOR S.—"What am I to hear to-day?"

MISS G.—"I prepared the Schumann 'Arabeske'."

PROFESSOR S.—"Ah, Schumann; one of the greatest of our tone poets. What melody, what true inspiration! That second part in the 'Arabeske,' that sad part, you know"——

MISS G. (rises)—

PROFESSOR S.—Never mind—there's no time this morning. Some day I must play it for you. Do you know what the Romantic Epoch in music is? No? Schumann belonged to that."

MISS G.—"Was it a club?"

PROFESSOR S.—"Oh, dear, no. It was a certain period of time when every composer wrote romantic music. Romanticism in its simplest form"—

MISS G.—"When did Schumann die?"

PROFESSOR S.—"Eh? Schumann? He died in an insane asylum, you know. Jumped from the window. Very sad, very sad, indeed. Well, let us begin."

MISS G. (plays a few measures, then stops and says)—"I'm not sure about the fingering here."

PROFESSOR S. (quickly)—"I was about to say that the passage sounded rather uneven. Let me see the place. (Examines it critically.) Um—yes—that's very tricky. Well, you know, almost any fingering would do here. I believe in Liszt's system. 'Struppelfinger,' he used to say, 'fingering is a matter of individuality. Some persons finger one way, others another. Everybody must find his own fingering.' It's a great system, Miss Goodthing; and, even though you think me tyrannical, I shall adopt it with you. That's how I acquired my knowledge of fingering—which is like nobody's else, as Rubinstein often assured me. Now go on, please."

MISS G. (plays some more measures, stops, and says timidly)—"I think that was wrong."

PROFESSOR S.—"Play it again."

MISS G. plays again and looks inquiringly at Professor S.

PROFESSOR S.—"It doesn't sound right, does it?"

MISS G.—"No, indeed."

PROFESSOR S.—"Play it once more, very slowly, and without pedal."

MISS G. plays for the third time.

PROFESSOR S. (mops his forehead and stares hard at the music)—"It is certainly extraordinary. You are playing the notes printed there?"

MISS G. (anxiously)—"Yes."

PROFESSOR S.—"It must be a misprint. Now, once more, please."

MISS G. (begins, and breaks out)—"Oh, dear; how stupid of me. I see it all now. It's major, of course, and I've been playing minor."

PROFESSOR S. (brightens up and laughs with strange vehemence)—"Well, at last. Really, Miss Goodthing, I did not expect that from you. I felt like telling you, but was certain that you would find out for yourself. That was Tausig's method, you know. 'Never point out a mistake,' he would say; 'a pupil will remember better if he finds the error without being shown.' That's Tausig's picture over there, to the left—yes, certainly, look at it, and turn it around—there's an autograph on it."

MISS G.—(reads, brokenly)—"'*Pas pour publication—Carl Tausig.'"

PROFESSOR S.—"You don't understand French, do you?"

MISS G.—"Not a word."

PROFESSOR S.—"That means: 'To my dear friend and assistant.'"

MISS G. (admiringly): "How lovely to have such souvenirs, and to know all those famous pupils. Did you meet Chopin, too?"

PROFESSOR S.—"No; he was before my time; but I would have known him had he lived long enough."

A knock is heard at the door.

PROFESSOR S. (glances at his watch)—"How the time flew to-day. That must be Miss Easy."

MISS G.—"Isn't my month up to-day, Herr Professor?"

PROFESSOR S.—"I'm sure I don't know. I never bother about money." (While Miss G. replaces her bonnet, Professor S. pulls out his cuff several inches and glances at it quickly.)

PROFESSOR S.—"Oh, by the way, I remember that my secretary did mention something about your month ending to-day. I never should have thought of it."

MISS G.—"Very well, I shall bring the money next time. Good-bye, Herr Professor."

PROFESSOR S. (bows her out)—"Good-bye. I was greatly pleased with your lesson to-day. You are improving. Never get discouraged. 'Slow, but sure,' as Rosenthal always says to me."

MISS G.—"It's so easy for you great players to make light of your ability."

PROFESSOR S. (modestly)—"No, we mean it. Rosenthal and I can afford to tell the truth in such matters. Ah, Miss Easy, good morning; come right in."

(The two young women pass each other in the corridor.)

MISS G. (whispering to Miss Easy)—"He's great this morning. I tell you, he's one of the best teachers in Europe."

And Miss Goodthing spoke the truth.

New York College of Music.

ELEVEN students of the New York College of Music, Alexander Lambert director, appeared at a concert in the hall of the college last Thursday afternoon. The selections played and sung were not beyond the abilities of the young musicians. Several of the performers afforded great pleasure to the audience, which taxed the capacity of the hall. The program for the afternoon was as follows:

Reminiscence of Wagner, arranged for four violins.....Lambert
Miss Grace Imlach, Messrs. Sergius Mandel, I. Segal and R. Davis.
Piano solo, Rhapsodie.....Brahms
Miss Nellie Baldwin.
Soprano solo, aria from Barbiera di Sevilla.....Rossini
Miss Agnes McNeil.
Piano solo, Etude.....Chaminade
Miss Marion Luyster.
Violin solo, Fantaisie.....Vieuxtemps

Piano solo, Alceste.....Gluck-Saint-Saëns

Piano solo, Variations, op. 91.....Raff
Gussie Zuckerman.
Violin solo, Polonaise de Concert.....Wieniawski
Sergius Mandel.
Piano soli—
Etude.....Moszkowski
March Militaire.....Schubert-Tausig
Miss Mercedes O'Leary.

Gussie Zuckerman, the child with the Madonna-like head and face, played brilliantly the Raff Variations, and the young pianist was heartily applauded and compelled to bow three times before the applause subsided. The sensible rule, "no encores," prevails at this college of music.

Miss O'Leary, who may be classed as a professional, delighted the audience with her fine playing. She played particularly well the Moszkowski Study. With the Schubert-Tausig "Military March" she did not succeed so well. Marion Luyster, who played a study by Chaminade, revealed talent, and all of the other instrumental performers showed the results of good schooling.

Miss Anna Toohey, one of the vocalists of the afternoon, gives promise of becoming a good coloratura singer. In Chaminade's song, "Summer," the young girl's execution was quite remarkable. With the Bohm song, however, it was different. No young girl and no high soprano should ever be permitted to sing this song, one of the most impassioned in modern German lieder. "Still Wie die Nacht" is essentially a song for low pitched voices, and in the singing requires a perfect legato and the interpretation which inexperienced young women and men cannot give to it.

Francis Walker.—Francis Walker, the baritone, and Miss Charlotte Walker, soprano, who, by the way, is not related to Mr. Walker, gave a recital at Carnegie Lyceum last Wednesday afternoon. The program was varied and most interesting. The duo from Verdi's "I Masnadieri" was effectively sung, as was the closing number, "Endymion," a dramatic scene still in manuscript and sung for the first time. Mr. Walker sang a group of German songs by Ries acceptably. Miss Walker, whose voice is true and even in quality, and whose enunciation is delightfully distinct, sang artistically. Lindsay B. Longacre's accompaniments were sympathetic and well played.

New York School of Accompanying.—The advanced pupils of the New York School of Accompanying recently gave evidence of their progress in a varied program, assisted by Heinrich W. Meyn, tenor.

Last Thursday the pupils had the assistance of Anna Slade, soprano of Rutgers Church.

BOSTON, November 24, 1901.

MRS. FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER and Josef Slivinski gave piano recitals here last week, and Miss Pauline Woltmann, a mezzo soprano, gave a concert—all in Chickering Hall.

Miss Woltmann's concert was on the 20th, and she sang ten songs in German, two in Italian and five in English. Her voice is rich, warm, eminently agreeable, and in seven songs by Brahms she showed genuine emotion. Her voice and other musical gifts warrant the attention paid here to her recital, although it must be confessed that she did not always have control of her breath; and therefore there was occasionally unsatisfactory handling of the phrase, as well as undue accentuation of unimportant notes, and a falling below the true pitch.

Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler gave her recitals on the 20th and the 23d. I heard only the first, and as the program was the same as that of her first in New York, reviewed last week in THE MUSICAL COURIER, I shall not reprint it. Her playing was admirable, most admirable. The Sonata by Beethoven—op. 111—had been studied with infinite pains, no detail, however, seemingly insignificant had been neglected; yet spontaneity and breadth and the grand style distinguished the performance. Her reading of Chopin was neither sickly nor mannered; it was neither feminine nor, what is worse, mannish; and it was brilliant without hard polish. Only the familiar nocturne (op. 27, No. 2) disappointed me, for it seemed to creak in movement, as though there were overweight. The performance of the strictly bravura pieces was electrifying. No doubt Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler has pleasant associations with Vienna, but I beseech her that when she next plays here she will forswear the company of the vapid and salon Schütt. His pieces are not worthy of her unusual abilities.

One of the most marked features of her performance was the individuality in treatment, and also in the means of expressing her conception. There is an originality that exerts itself in discovering things in a familiar piece—as in bringing out strongly a contrapuntal figure so that it lords it over the chief theme, as in reversing the long accepted proportion of things. This species of originality is born either of perverted taste or an insane longing after the applause of the unthinking, who always welcome something new, and shout in sweaty joy: "Did you hear that? I never knew the piece before. He's a true genius." I do not refer to such outrages on art. The individuality of Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler is not to be confounded with such originality; it is compounded of authority, which is not vixenish, of a feminine delicacy which is free from the sentiments of Laura Matilda, and of something that is subtly felt, and is irresistible, something exotic, something intoxicating, madding. There was a time when this pianist tried by undue strength to convince the audience that after all she was not a woman. She delighted in what Christopher Marlowe called "great and thunderous speech." It is not a compliment to say that a woman plays like a man, and the sight of a woman playing as though she had been training for violent deeds is not a pleasant one. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler has all the necessary strength; she uses it more discreetly; and she also uses her intellectual faculties with surer results. She is by herself, nor would it be easy or profitable to compare her with others.

Mr. Slivinski gave recitals on November 19 and on November 21. At the first he played Beethoven's Sonata, op. 53, Mozart's Rondo in A minor, Schumann's Papillons and pieces by Chopin and Liszt and Schubert-Liszt. At the second he played Schumann's Fantaisie, op. 17; Tschaikowsky's Sonata, op. 37; Chopin's Sonata, op. 58, and pieces by Chopin, Schubert, Rubinstein, Schubert-Liszt, Liszt.

These were formidable programs—too formidable—and the programs of Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler were too long. Mr. Slivinski plays exceedingly well; his interpretation of Chopin is particularly delightful; he is entitled to respect and admiration—but is it wise to play the sonata by Tschaikowsky immediately after the fantasie of Schumann—and then bring on a sonata by Chopin?

Some applaud the practice of playing the heavy things in a lump at the beginning, then bringing in the sentimental numbers and then closing with a grand exhibition of fireworks and the apotheosis of the pianist, who is surrounded by maidens, young and old, kneeling at his inspired feet hot from manipulation of the pedals.

If I were the Tsar of Boston I should issue as my imperial will a proclamation that no pianist should play a sonata in public under penalty of enforced attendance at the Lowell lectures and residence in Roxbury; that no recital—actual performance, encores, apotheosis and all—should last over seventy minutes; that death should be the penalty for even putting Liszt's arrangement of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," &c., on the program.

A pianist—these remarks are of general application—is none the greater because he has incredible staying power because he can outlast his audience. If he cannot show his abilities during the first hour he is not likely to thrill or move during the second.

And what a delight it would be to find a pianist dismissing an audience with gentle, beautiful, contemplative music and not turning the piano into a volcano in full operation during a thunder storm, a preparation for the din of the street with electric cars and roar of traffic. The finale must always be an arrangement in which the original tune is strappadoed and tortured till it shrieks and its face is no longer to be recognized.

The recitals of visiting pianists and singers have thus far been poorly attended. The visitors have deserved better fate. They were known, they have been applauded. Did they come too early in the season? Were the prices of admission too high? It is an interesting problem which managers would like to have solved. The seats for the Symphony concerts this year were by no means cheap and it is easy for the subscribers to argue that they will hear the chief pianists and singers at these concerts. There there are subscribers to the Handel and Haydn, the Cecilia, the Apollo, the Kneisel Quartet. To these subscribers the prices asked for recitals are like the grasshopper in Ecclesiastes. Bostonians are not spendthrifts.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its second concert November 18, when the program was of a far more interesting nature than that of the first. The selections were Grieg's Quartet (three movements); Vincent d'Indy's Piano Quartet op. 7; Haydn's Quartet in D major, op. 64, No. 5. The Quartet by D'Indy was first played here by Messrs. Lachaume (piano), Ysaye, Marteau, Gérardy. It was one of the early works of the ultra fastidious Frenchman, for it was first played in 1878, the year of his orchestral legend, "Forêt Enchantée," the year he left Colonne's Orchestra, where he had served as chorus master and drummer. He had then written his "Piccolomini" and "Antony and Cleopatra" overtures and a symphony in three movements. And he had journeyed to see at Tutzing one Johannes Brahms, who received him sourly.

There is an austerity in the music of D'Indy that is not merely the austerity sometimes found in the works of his master, Franck. Franck was intensely religious; D'Indy is intensely, fastidiously intellectual. He was brought up by his grandmother, who herself loved music; his father played the violin for an amusement—oh, ghastly thought—his uncle was a wealthy amateur who had studied seriously and written chamber music, and opera comique, dramatic scenes, songs, &c., so Vincent was turned naturally toward music. But his individuality was not shaped by home influences. He fell under the spell of Berlioz, Wagner, Bach, Brahms, César Franck. He went as a pilgrim to Munich and Bayreuth to hear the music drama of Wagner. He himself was by instinct what the French call a progressionist. At the same time, working hard and in most practical ways, at Paris, he longed for the mountains and plains, the harvest fields and the pines and beeches of Ardèche, where his family was originally at home. "It is only here that one feels in full repose and at the true spring of all art," he wrote from Vernoux. And what did he read? At first Poe, Hoffmann, Uhland; then he adored Dante, then Goethe, Schiller, Molière, Shakespeare, and later Flaubert, especially the Flaubert of "La Tentation de Saint-Antoine" and Tolstoi. He worships the Assyrian art, the paintings by the primitive Germans and Flemings, Holbein and Rembrandt. He is chiefly fascinated by the art of races that long ago became as thoug ey never were, lost in the night and under "drums and mplings."

He is an aristocrat in his cool disdain for that which he lls vulgar. He is brave in the open expresson of his ws, nor does he spare the feelings of those who think herwise. His handwriting is precise, cold, elegant.

All these qualities, all that he has absorbed from read-g, picture viewing, closeness to nature, are felt in his sic. His melody, even when it comes from folk-song, inclined to be short and bitter. He walks far to avoid commonplace where a commonplace might be a wel-me relief. At times his harmonic progressions are evi-ntly labored. Perhaps Mr. D'Indy would consider sweat be a vulgar word as well as action; but it would not just to say that he ever glows over his work. I like think of him with drawn, pale face, agonized in his at-npt to escape an expected cadence or a too familiar suc-ssion of chords. The Baron Grimm said of Grétry, "He young; he looks pale, wan, a sufferer, anxious—all the mptoms of a man of genius." I am sure D'Indy an-ered this description when he was composing this piano artet, in which he appears as a man of a very high order talent, if genius be denied him. For the most part re is the clearness of expression that is—or rather was—haracteristic of French music, and which Saint-Saëns ssesses in eminent degree. The workmanship is admir-le throughout. The second movement is nobly sombre its mood of contemplation. The finale is irresistible in rit. In the whole work there is no sensuous phrase; re is no juggling with rhythm; there is no apparent sire to fascinate or startle. The style is ebon, not rple. The only extravagance lies toward seriousness. e performance was excellent, and Mrs. Helen Hope-k, the pianist, deserved her share of the applause.

mentioned some time ago the "Revue d'Histoire et de tiques Musicales," published in Paris. It displays a long of "Adhérents et Collaborateurs" on the title page, but articles are chiefly by two or three men. The number October contains pages of a humorous nature, but the iter himself did not intend them to be funny.

He takes to task Mr. Riemann, of the new "History of sic Since Beethoven," for his views concerning Saint-ëns: Riemann judged the French composer too severely l with prejudice. The writer then adds that if Rie-nn's opinion were general beyond the border, it was the lt of French publishers who will not sell cheap editions the best French music.

He wrote to celebrated musicians of foreign lands, "for judgment of strangers is contemporaneous posterity." ey sent on their opinion in writing.

Max Bruch gave Saint-Saëns an excellent recommenda-n, which might be used in application for a job at a nservatory or presented to a festival committee in search a new work, especially for the dedication of a new hall. Siegfried Wagner wrote that he hoped to hear "Samson" Berlin, but the performance was put off. He admires a no concerto, but he doesn't know the number or the r. There is a touching allusion to Grandpa Liszt, and n Siegfried ends his letter with this burst: "Nothing uld be of more interest to the composer or of use to the blic or of greater moral and artistic importance for the sician-critic himself, than a minute and impartial criti-m of the work of his contemporaries."

Mr. Rodenkirchen, of Cologne, knows the organ works Saint-Saëns, "a worthy pupil of his great master and cher, Gounod," and he is always glad to see his name a program. Mr. Dingenkirchen, of Münster, locks his nion, like a Homeric hero, in his shaggy breast, nor does allow it to escape the barriers of his teeth.

Emile Sjögren is known, and he states that Saint-Saëns' sic is popular in Sweden, and that he holds a high place ong the musicians of France.

But did you ever hear of these eminent musical authorities: Di San Martino e Valperza, Oscar Chilesotti, Ippolito Valetta, G. Zuelli, E. Candella and Suarez Bravo? Yet they write letters which are published in withering rebuke of the presumptuous Riemann. Mr. Candella says without turning a hair that Saint-Saëns, with Berlioz, is the greatest modern reformer in music that France has ever possessed. "Has ever possessed" and "modern" are hard to construe in the same sentence.

Then there is our old friend, the man who does not wish his name to be published. Sometimes he is at Washington, D. C., and has exclusive information concerning a political measure. Sometimes he is on Cape Cod and could tell why a trained nurse wished to kill her patient by poisoning her gruel. He is of all times; he is everywhere. Some picture him as a tall, robust person, rather bald, with a brass voice, high collar, red face, flopping ears and a small wart on his nose; but I like to think of him as a sheep-faced little fellow, with sandy hair, butter eyes, thin, waving whiskers and a chin like a poached egg. The type may be described as a paper bag blown up with wind. A wise ass is this "gentleman who did not wish his name to be mentioned." This time he lives in Belgium and has his little say.

It was a curious idea, this sending out for opinions. It was worthy of the publishers of a great American novel, say "Old Poindexter," by Amos Parsons Belcher, with indorsements: "Our mothers should read it," the Rev. Darius Tarbox Griggs; "Balzac never wrote like this," John Thompson Thompson; "Mr. Belcher is the greatest analyst as well as the most powerful writer in the literature of all countries," Laura Lorena Buckalew. Has Saint-Saëns framed the originals?

I miss the names of certain eminent men whose opinion is revered by our leading pàtrons and patronesses of music—the Damrosch brothers and B. J. Lang. Is it possible that they were not invited to contribute?

It might be said with fairness that Saint-Saëns is a master of uncommon musical equipment, clearness in expression, logic, exquisite taste, tonal color. He is ingenious and shrewd. On the other hand he is not truly imaginative and he is seldom emotional. The music is like the man, polished, intelligent, elegant, fastidious. His melody is without warmth or perfume or savor; it is like an opening at chess, chiefly valuable for contrapuntal complications that may result therefrom. His technical skill leads him into deserts of development. Take his most characteristic songs—"The Drummer's Betrothed" or the "Pas d'armes du Roi Jean"—the hearer is never moved; in the former he is delighted with the cunningly devised orchestration, in the latter he keeps saying to himself, "Amazingly clever." Yes, Saint-Saëns' music is generally clever. His admired G minor Concerto for piano is clever and elegant, and at the beginning there is an excellent imitation of Bach. The canon is clever in the last act of "Samson and Delilah." The symphonic poems are clever. I prefer a little dash of coarse, homely, human emotion.

The program of the fifth symphony concert last night in Symphony Hall included Goldmark's overture, "In the Spring," Godard's Concerto Romantique for violin, and Tanéïeff's Symphony in C, which was played here for the first time.

Goldmark's Overture is a favorite winter piece. It was first performed at Vienna in December, and if you look over the concert records of various cities you will find that it seldom, if ever, is played even in March.

Godard's Concerto sounds old-fashioned, and it may be put away with tokens and keepsakes and other annuals that for a season bloomed with steel engravings of simpering and ringleted ladies with high foreheads, red, pouting lips, and long tapering fingers. The Canzonetta has a pretty salon grace and piquancy, but the rest is romantic in the narrow, restricted meaning, and is resigned to the burial which it has long expected. Otto Roth, who played it, has not been heard as a soloist for some years at these concerts. Possibly for this reason his performance was nervous and tame.

I wish someone would set the two Tanéïeffs in their respective and proper places. There is Serge or Sergei I. Tanéïeff, of Moscow, who has written some string quartets, choruses, an opera, "L'Orestie"—I think Mr. Gericke introduced the overture of this opera to you in New York last season—and this symphony. This Tanéïeff is said by Riemann to be an excellent pianist, and I am told that it is he who edited some of Tschaikowsky's posthumous works. He was for a time at the head of the Moscow Conservatory, where he had been for some years the teacher of composition. Then there is an amateur mentioned by Pougin ("Essai historique sur la Musique en Russie," Turin, 1897), an Alexandre S. Tanéïeff, who has written several works, among them two suites for orchestra.

But where is the confusion? you may ask. Because the suite played in Munich last season was attributed to Serge, and when Suite, op. 9, by Alexandre Tanéïeff was played in Dresden in 1899, the biographical sketch fitted the author of the symphony and not the amateur.

The younger of the modern Russian School do not follow in the beliefs of the old advance guard who swore solemnly that there was nothing more to be done with the symphony. Even Balakireff himself a few years ago produced a symphony in C which is said to be clean shaven and eminently respectable. Rimsky-Korsakoff, Borodin, Cui—they all wrote symphonies against their earlier convictions. Glazounoff wrote five or six before he gave himself up to the ballet. Scriàbine comes with his gigantic machine with solo voices and chorus, Liapounoff with his in B minor, and Kalinnikoff, who died lately when he was hardly more than a youth, left two behind him.

I like my Russian wild and gamy, even when he is a conservatory professor. I do not like him Germanized or with knees knocking together at the thought of the traditions. Nor do I take it amiss if his breath smells of vodka, or if he proceeds to cover the sacred images if a woman enters the room. There was a tragic gloom and wildness about the overture to "L'Orestie" that pleased me mightily; but this symphony is painfully free from any exhibition of imagination. The themes of the first movement are inconspicuous, and the development is precise. The slow movement ends prettily, but it is without originality of thought, and any emotion is superficial. The scherzo is by far the best movement in conception and orchestral dress. Here the composer really speaks above a whisper his own thoughts. The finale, in which side drum, cymbals and triangle are introduced, begins with a march movement; there is a short "Cossack Oriental" episode which is not displeasing, and then soon after is one of the most vulgar bursts of beer garden sentimentalism in the long catalogue of atrocious platitudes. Nor had Tanéïeff given any hint that he was about to perpetrate such a deed. That night I heard no more. Let me add that the symphony calls for three flutes, three clarinets, a double bassoon, a tuba, besides the extra pulsatile instruments above named.

Ernest Tissot contributed an article, 'Jenny Lind; or, the Modern Saint Cecilia," to the Revue Hebdomadaire. I was struck by this passage. She wished to endow foundling asylums. Tissot writes: "She then exposed her plan to God and accepted the proposition of Mr. Barnum."

CARL ORGAN RECITALS.

FOUR novelties were presented at the second in t series of organ recitals at the "Old First" Presb terian Church, on Tuesday afternoon, November 19, William C. Carl. Charles Schuetze, the harpist, assist the organist in this program:

Sonata for Organ in C minor, op 25.....Salo
Interlude (Andante Expressivo) (new, first time).....Fletc
Scherzo Symphonique (new, first time).....Debat-Pon
Harp solo, Consolation (No. 2).....Li
Charles Schuetze.
Pièce Héroique.....Fra
Béatitude (new, first time).....Lo
Praeludium and Fugue in B flat.....B
(Breitkopf & Härtel, Book IV.)
Variations on an Ancient Xmas Carol.....Deth
Harp and organ, Andante.....Von W
(Concerto for harp and organ.)
Messrs. Schuetze and Carl.
Grand Chœur in D major (new, first time).....Faul

Although this was the only recital to be given in t afternoon, the church was crowded to overflowing. M Carl's programs are never too long, and then the mu always represents the catholic tastes of the director. T new works played by Mr. Carl are by French and Engli composers, and they all four proved worthy of a heari The Interlude, by Fletcher, and "Beatitude," by Clém Loret, are examples of contemplative, tender music, su able for offertory or as a voluntary before service. T Scherzo Symphonique, by Georges Debat-Ponsan, is stronger and more original composition. The writer w compelled on account of another engagement to leave t church after the charming variations on an ancient Chri mas Carol, by Dethier, of New York, were played, a hence missed hearing the novelty by William Faulkes.

Mr. Schuetze played well, but his solo would have be more effective if accompanied by the organ. To our mo ern ears the harp as a solo instrument is not particula agreeable.

The third recital in the series was given last eveni (Tuesday). The soloists were Mrs. Antonia Sawyer, co tralto; Miss Helen L. Reynolds, violinist, and Miss Mal Reynolds, 'cellist. The closing recital will be given Tu day evening, December 2. Then Mr. Carl will give a co cert on December 10 to celebrate the tenth anniversary Dr. Duffield's pastorate.

ADAME NEVADA, THE GUEST OF HONOR.

ıe Manuscript Society Opens the Season with a Reception.

WITH Mme. Emma Nevada as the guest of honor and a musical program of works by women composers, the Manuscript Society opened its twelfth season st Wednesday night at the National Art Club, on West hirty-fourth street. The prima donna, occupying the seat honor on the stage, shook hands with several hundred :ople, and did it all so graciously as to not even suggest e thought of fatigue. It was whispered that she would ıg informally, and as a result many guests lingered until ıe herself departed, which was about midnight.

But the prima donna did not sing, and let it be said ·re that the officers of the society were not responsible r the foolish rumor. Under one form and another there altogether too much free music dispensed in this town, ıd the very thought that a singer of Nevada's rank ould sing gratis at a function so crowded and public as at of last Wednesday evening was highly absurd. Although announced as a "private meeting," the cards of lmission were not required upon entering, and thus the sy access resulted in the usual discomforts for many of e guests who were there because they had the right to . The reception to Madame Nevada was brilliantly ccessful, but for the rest—the least said the better.

Because THE MUSICAL COURIER believes in the Manuript Society and its purpose, and wants to see it fulfill mission, we point out here some of the mistakes of the st private meeting last Wednesday evening. As delightl as are the rooms of the National Arts Club, no music n sound well in the place. The rooms, quite naturally ough, were not designed for music performances, but for e exhibition of art and entertainment of artists. The usical program last Wednesday night was at least one ur too long. It was 11:15 when the closing number was ing sung. As THE MUSICAL COURIER representative asgned to report the event was crowded out in an outer artment, where seeing and hearing were impossible, no iticism of the music can be given. We present the proam:

MUSIC AND CHILDREN.

Mrs. E. Fletcher-Copp Illustrates Her Kindergarten Method.

THE teaching of music, to little children so that they may read it easily, distinguish notes and chords by ear absolutely, and become as familiar with the symbols, keyboards and instruments as they can be with anything else they try to learn, says the Hartford, Conn., Courant, of September 27, was illustrated at Jewell Hall by Mrs. E. Fletcher-Copp yesterday afternoon. The theory she presented was that music being the universal written language of all civilized nations, it ought to be and is easy for the mind to express itself through that medium. If children are trained logically in music, they can arrive at results that are equal to those attained after many years of hard work by the ordinary musical student. The training must be from within in the natural order, and the child would then learn music and be happy and enjoy the instruction. It was perfectly possible to teach the child notation so that reading music would be as easy to it as reading ordinary English was to the average person who speaks and thinks in the English language. It was also possible to train the ear of the child so that it could at once distinguish, absolutely, the note or the chord produced on the piano without having sight of the keyboard. These were simply the results of logical and natural training.

Mrs. Fletcher-Copp, while not being a disciple of Froebel, had been surprised to learn that she had evolved the system of musical instruction, which she claims for her own, after the general line of natural methods that the great kindergarten founder brought to light. Her plan of teaching music is much on the line of kindergarten work, although it seems to be a little more definite in securing immediate results. By means of materials, such as the symbols of the notes, the staff, the various modifying symbols, flats, sharps, rests and the like, which she has made in large size, she has the children play games in which they make little compositions in music by placing the symbols on the staff, being instructed as they do so, in the pleasantest method of play, just what the symbols mean, and, by the voice or the piano, at the same time, being taught their value. There are fourteen of these games, referring to the teaching of notation, and the children learn the position of the notes absolutely, instead of relatively, and are able at a glance to tell what they are and their meaning, thus making sight music readers before they are six years old, and accurate sight readers, at that.

In the matter of time and rhythm the material she uses is simply representations of notes by means of wooden strips, the longest being a whole note and all the others fractional parts of a whole note. The children thus become familiar with the value of the note, its place in the time and rhythm of the composition, while scarcely knowing that they have been trying to learn anything, the entire system being one of pleasant occupation and play.

For becoming acquainted with the piano the instructor has a model of a keyboard which is made in an attractive form. The keys being removable, the child is taught to remove any note, chord or series of harmonies from the board, and insert them in proper place again, thus becoming thoroughly familiar with the positions. The scale is taught in a similar manner by symbols. At the piano the child is equipped with many things that, by the old system of learning from books, it could not have mastered. As to practice on the piano, the speaker did not believe that half as much was necessary as is commonly given to a child. A simple process of gymnastic exercises for fifteen minutes, morning and evening, would keep the muscles used in piano playing in fine condition and the body healthful. The technic would much more easily care for itself than it would under the old methods. Mrs. Fletcher-Copp carries the same concrete system into teaching music to children of the higher grades, but in much less of the game or play system. She is an attractive speaker, and, with a table full of the material she uses in her classes, gave the members of the Motherhood Club and the Froebel Club an attractive, instructive and thoughtful address.

An Invitation.

THE American School of Opera gives to all teachers and those directly interested a cordial invitation to call at the school, No. 23 West Forty-fourth street, any day between 10 a. m. and 1 p. m., and watch the work being done by the pupils. A special invitation is also offered to the "make-up" class, which takes place each Tuesday from 12 to 1 p. m., when an hour's performance can be seen with costumes. At all times thoughtful criticism is solicited, as the school must work hand in hand with the vocal teachers to insure the ultimate success of that long cherished project, opera in English.

The American School of Opera does not claim to be the only place where Englsh opera is being cherished, as several of our best known managers are doing all within their power to promote such an end, but it is contended that these same managers are very much handicapped by not having acting singers—there are plenty of great singers—and the American School of Opera is trying in its humble way to overcome this deficiency. Hence this invitation, as honest criticism by those who have real English opera at heart will be of immense value to the faculty of this school. It is requested that cards be presented, and all criticisms be in writing to be used for reference.

Ernest Hutcheson and the Mason & Hamlin.

ERNEST HUTCHESON recently give a recital in Baltimore at which he used, as he always does, the Mason & Hamlin piano. In the criticism of the recital, which appeared in the Baltimore News, written by O. B. Boise, the eminent theorist, musician and critic, the following paragraph appeared:

"The concert grand (Mason & Hamlin) upon which Mr. Hutcheson played responded to his every demand in a manner reassuring to the player and delightful to the listener. Its singing quality and elastic power were apparently inexhaustible."

MRS. STOCKER'S "SEA SONG."—Mrs. Stocker's "Sea Song" was sung as an encore at Columbus Hall last Thursday evening. It was received with so much enthusiasm that Miss McKenzie, the soloist, after repeatedly answering the applause with a bow, was compelled to repeat the song. This number and "While Thou Wert By" were sung at the Manuscript Society concert on Wednesday night. Miss McKenzie is delighted with the songs, and means to make them a feature in her recital work.

MADAME VON KLENNER TO DIRECT.—Mme. Evans von Klenner will direct the program at a musicale to be given at the residence of Mrs. Esther Hermann on Thursday evening, December 5, for the benefit of the Mary Fisher Home. This is one of the truly deserving institutions of the city, devoted as it is to the care of aged people of culture and education.

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN.

Ethics and Singing Societies.

GERMAN musical circles in New York have been stirred over the announcement that Arthur Claassen is about to resign the conductorship of the United Singers of Brooklyn. As some forty societies belong to this union of singers, it is a matter of some importance when the conductor resigns. Men in their prime do not usually withdraw from the things they like. When they do it is safe to assume that something unusual has happened. Ten days ago a concert was given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music for the benefit of the German Hospital of Brooklyn, under the auspices of the United Singers of Brooklyn. Over 4,000 men belong to the United Singers, and as it was not possible to ask them all to sing at the concert, selections were made from most of the societies. For several years a feud has existed between Mr. Claassen and Mr. Koemmenich, the conductor of the Saengerbund. Besides being the conductor of the United Singers, Mr. Claassen is also the conductor of the Brooklyn Arion, the leading singing society of the borough and one of the first in the ranks of the United Singers. Now the members of the Arion and Saengerbund are, as might be expected, loyal to their respective conductors. But we hardly believe that the members of the Brooklyn Saengerbund are alone responsible for the open and shameful insult offered to Mr. Claassen on the night of the hospital concert.

According to the arrangement of the program the United Singers were to sing the opening and closing numbers. The Staats Zeitung report stated that only 220 singers presented themselves for the opening song, and for the closing piece the number of singers appearing upon the stage dwindled to the members of the Arion Society and one dozen other men. After reading this lamentable condition of affairs we have reached the conclusion that the men composing the United Singers of Brooklyn are more in need of ethical teaching than they are of musical instruction. The insult to Conductor Claassen is without parallel, and he did the only dignified thing in resigning his place as conductor. Bad manners in public merit stern rebuke. We trust the lesson administered by Mr. Claassen will strike home, and that other boorish, ill-mannered and vulgar people of high and low degree in musical life may learn something from his act. A public insult such as he received is one no high-minded man can condone. The United Singers will learn to their sorrow that Mr. Claassen was more important to them than they are to him. We have had our disagreements with Mr. Claassen, but we recognize him as an excellent choral conductor. It is reported also that Mr. Claassen's individual society, the Arion, will withdraw from the United Singers of Brooklyn. The plain facts are the Brooklyn Arion should long ago have withdrawn. Let this society come out and be independent, like the New York Liederkranz and the New York Arion, of the petty jealousies, wrangling, greasy, noisy, beer drinking saengerfests. After all, these "fests" have accomplished very little for the advancement of music in the United States.

As the artists all volunteered for the concert in aid of the German Hospital, criticism is out of place. Hans Kronold, 'cellist; Mrs. Maric Rappold, soprano; Miss Fannie Levy, pianist, were the soloists of the evening.

The illness of Mr. Kneisel caused the postponement of the Institute concert on Wednesday night at which Miss Helen Niebuhr was to have been the vocal soloist.

Dudley Buck, the organist and choirmaster of Holy Trinity Church, conductor of the Brooklyn Apollo Club, and one of America's best known composers, will sail for Europe to-morrow. Mr. Buck was the guest of honor last week at a musicale given by General and Mrs. McLewee, of 319 Washington avenue. A good program was contributed by the hostess, who is the contralto soloist at Holy Trinity; Miss Maud Kennedy, soprano; Hugh Williams, baritone; Henry S. Brown, basso, and F. W. Riesberg, accompanist.

The Amateur Musical Club gave its first concert of the season at the Pierrepont Assembly Rooms, Monday afternoon, November 18. Herbert Witherspoon, basso, and Miss Ethel Fitzhugh, pianist, were the soloists. In its report of the concert the Brooklyn Eagle referred thus to the singing of Mr. Witherspoon:

> Mr. Witherspoon's voice was admirably adapted to the group of ballads, which he rendered very effectively. They included "Ich Trage Meine Minne" (Richard Strauss), "Was I Not Thine?" (Chadwick), "Had a Horse," Hungarian melody (Korbay); "Soupir" (Bemberg), "Viens, Mon Bien Aimé" (Chaminade); "Remember—Forget" (Van der Stucken), "Memory" (Edna R. Park), "Corrymeela" (Irish), Willeby.

Mr. Witherspoon, however, is not a "tenor," as the Eagle reporter stated in his (or her) report.

A concert was given at Packer Institute last Thursday afternoon by Mr. and Mrs. David Mannes and Emilio de Gogorza, for the benefit of the Brooklyn Hospital.

The faculty of the Klingenfeld College of Music and School of Elocution gave a successful musicale last Tuesday night (November 19), Miss Cornelia van Etten, whom Mrs. Klingenfeld recently engaged as assistant vocal teacher, made her first appearance at the musicale. Miss Van Etten sang delightfully the "Jewel Song," from "Faust"; Paul Listermann, the violin soloist, played like the real artist he is. Henry Gaines Hawn gave some fine recitations, and other numbers were given by Arthur Vernon Bunker, the mandolin teacher; Carl Wilk, the zither teacher, and Mrs. A. M. Calkins, teacher of elocution. Members of the Woman's Republican League were the guests of honor.

FROM PARIS.

PARIS, NOVEMBER 7, 1901.

T was noticed that the program of the last Lamoureux concert was purely symphonic, no number from any eratic work being offered to the public. Without enter- g into the vexed and often disputed question as to the sirability of performing works of a master like Wagner iginally destined for the theatre on a concert platform, was proved last Sunday, by the immense audience pres- t, what an interest is taken by the public in purely clas- al music. As the conductor of these concerts—Chevil- d—has formed the idea of giving the nine symphonies Beethoven in their chronological order, he began by e performance of No. 1 in C major. Its rendering was solutely perfect, the exquisite adagio and minuet, played th the utmost delicacy, especially delighting the audi- ce. M. Hayot, with whose name I was not before miliar, gave a very large and dignified performance of ethoven's Concerto for Violin. This great work seems ways the test piece for a violinist, as mere technic does t suffice for its interpretation. M. Hayot's perform- ce entitles him to rank very high among the foremost lin players. Tschaikowsky's Pathetic Symphony, which s been performed here a good deal of late, the foreign nductors who come seeming to affect particularly this rk, received a careful interpretation, the grand style of e adagio lamentoso producing a strong impression. ne may like or not this work, one cannot deny its value d originality. The noisy "Marche Hongroise" of Ber- z finished the concert.

The usual Colonne concert was not given last Sunday, ving to the absence of this conductor and his orchestra a concert tournée in Germany.

At the Opéra nothing of any importance to notice, ex- pt a little incident recently proving how liable singers e to indisposition when they do not want to sing. Sun- y night, ordinarily, there is no performance at the péra, but last week a free performance, of which there e four every year, was announced for the night of Sun- y, the 3d, "Astarte" being the work offered. This was anged later to "Les Huguenots," owing to the indis- sition of some of the artists who were to have sung in e previously announced work. This again was changed "Faust" at the last moment, with Acté and Riddez as arguerite and Valentine. A later announcement in- rmed that these roles would be sung by Bosman and té.

As readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER are probably are, things have not been going smoothly of late at the médie Française. It has been stated in the Temps that e post of Claretie, the director, has been offered to sev- l people. According to one scheme Carré, the present nager of the Opéra Comique, was selected. His place uld then, it is thought, have been taken by Capoul, for om a post had been created at the Opéra as assistant nager. It appears, however, that Carré is not anxious to leave his present post, except it might be to act as director of the Opéra. At all events, it appears probable that the present manager of the Française will remain at his post.

Paris has many private salons where all that is best in music and art generally may be met. Among them none more distinguished than the home of Sebastian B. Schlesinger, the composer, well known on both sides of the Atlantic. This genial host and popular composer held the first of his musicales last Saturday at his new residence Avenue d'Antin. The daughters of the host, Madame Braggiotti and Mlle. Berthe Schlesinger, not only played the part of hostesses, but contributed most admirably to the entertainment of their numerous visitors. One of a group of four songs composed by Mr. Schlesinger, "Toujours," was most tastefully sung by Mlle. Schlesinger, and produced a decided impression. I do not know if this song is translated into English, but I can strongly recommend its addition to the repertory of any concert soprano. Among the many distinguished visitors to this function were the Countess de Coetlojon, Mr. and Mrs. Marchesi, Baron and Baronne de Tubœuf, Colonel Mapleson, Haslam, Mr. and Mrs. Kussak, &c. DE VALMOUR.

LILIAN CARLLSMITH TO EUROPE.—Miss Lilian Carllsmith, the singer, sailed for Europe last week on the steamer Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. She expects to remain abroad until next April.

Mme. Gertrude Albrecht's Concert.

THIS young woman gave a recital on Wednesday evening, November 20, in Carnegie Lyceum, with the assistance of Paolo Gallico, pianist, and Leo Schulz, 'cellist. The concert was opened by the beautiful Sonata in D, by Rubinstein. Then followed the concert giver, Mrs. Albrecht. Her first three numbers were: "Oh! Moon, Conceal Thy Golden Light," B. O. Klein; "Elegie," Massenet, and "May Morning," by Denza. Mrs. Albrecht was nervous and did not do herself justice in the first three numbers, but, as she was making her début, this can readily be overlooked. She warmed up when she got to her second group of songs. "Du Bist Die Ruh'," Schubert; "Neube Liebe," Mendelssohn, and "Freudvoll und Leidvoll," Beethoven, and on singing the beautiful aria, "Casta Diva," from "Norma," she was quite herself again, and gave it beautifully. Her coloratura was clear and brilliant, she sang the aria in good style, and the applause she received showed how thoroughly it was enjoyed.

Mrs. Albrecht is the possessor of a beautiful, sympathetic, high soprano, with a range to high F, and shows the good schooling she has had by her teacher, Prof. M. J. Scherhey. Solos by Messrs. Gallico and Schulz were artistically played. The concert closed with the songs, "Mondnacht," Schumann; "Solvejg's Lied," and last but not least Brahms' "Vergebliches Ständchen"; all three were admirably presented. Mrs. Albrecht can be congratulated on this her first concert, and we hope she will continue progressing. Miss A. Zur Nieden accompanied sympathetically.

Madame Von Klenner and "The Stage."

"THE STAGE" from various points of view was discussed last Friday afternoon before the Women's Alliance of the Lenox Avenue Unitarian Church, Lenox avenue and 121st street. The speakers were Mme. Evans von Klenner, Mrs. Sydney Rosenfeld, Mrs. Edwin Knowles and Heinrich Conried of the Irving Place Theatre. "The Educative Force of Music" was Madame Von Klenner's topic and she spoke with her usual intelligence for the improvement of the drama through the best music. Mr. Conried advocated a national theatre. Mrs. Rosenfeld deplored the inferior character of the plays of to-day.

ANTON KASPAR.—Anton Kaspar, the violinist, is preparing for a busy season. He has already filled several engagements and is constantly receiving inquiries for future dates. The story has leaked out that some well-known society girls in one of the Southern cities surreptitiously obtained a photograph of the popular violinist while he was en tour last spring, and that as this was the only photograph the violinist had with him at the time, he was put to great inconvenience in supplying the demands of Southern newspapers. Following is a clipping which will prove of interest:

Mr. Kaspar, who has just returned from a very successful tour of the South, again demonstrated his fine musical and technical qualities, playing the concerto of Vieuxtemps in D minor, op. 11, in an artistic manner, and adding fresh laurels to his reputation.—Washington Times.

IF all the many foes with which concert givers have to contend fog is perhaps the worst. Such unfortunate artists as have elected to give their concerts during the present week have been peculiarly ill-fated in this respect, for London has been visited by one of the most objectionable and continuous fogs that have fallen to its lot for many years. The consequence is that singers with bad husks in their throats have been producing the choicest efforts of their vocal art for the exclusive benefit of rows of empty seats.

The concerts that took place on Saturday, November 2, were many and varied. At St. James' Hall yet another quartet performed at the Popular Concert. On this occasion the quartet was led by Signor Arbos, his associates being Julius Klingel, Friederich and Alfred Gibson. These constant changes cannot but militate against the success of the Popular Concerts. Plenty of ensemble practice is a sine qua non if quartet playing is to be good; but such practice is, under these circumstances, quite out of the question. London has now several resident quartets and the Popular Concerts will, if they are not careful, soon find themselves left behind.

The program on Saturday was interesting enough and included Beethoven's Quartet for strings in C major and Dvorák's Piano Quintet in A, in which the executants mentioned above were joined by Miss Fanny Davies. The vocalist was Dr. Theo. Lierhammer, who gave songs by Schumann, Reynaldo Hahn and Hans Herman in admirable style.

While St. James' Hall was occupied by the Popular Concert Miss Margaret Vereker and the Saltaire Prize Choir, describing itself as the "Premier choir of the North, and holders of the Yorkshire Challenge Shield, 1901. Winners of twenty-seven first and twelve second prizes, including the 100 guinea prize, London, 1896." The choir is one of great merit, so far as its singing is concerned, but it wasted its talents upon the veriest trash; out of the rich field of part music it only selected two good specimens—Brahms' "Night Watch" and Elgar's "My Love Dwelt in a Distant Land." The less said about its other selections the better. Miss Vereker is a contralto with a good voice and a better taste than the choir. Her phrasing, however, was sadly at fault.

The first London Ballad Concert, given at Queen's Hall on the same afternoon, has already been chronicled.

On Monday afternoon the Wietrowitz Quartet, consisting of Fräulein Wietrowitz, Miss Lucy Stone, Miss Cecilia Gates and Miss Florence Hemmings, gave an attractive concert at Bechstein Hall. Two concert pieces were played, Schumann's Quartet in A minor and Mozart's Piano Quintet in G minor, Miss Margaret Wild being the pianist. The vocalist was James Campbell McInnes.

At Steinway Hall Hayden Coffin gave the first of a long series of concerts. Mr. Coffin is, of course, best known to frequenters of Daly's Theatre, where he rarely is able to do himself justice as a singer, owing to the fact that his roles of lovesick heroes afford few opportunities for anything except a peculiarly uninteresting type of song. On Monday he made the most his temporary freedom and sang a number of songs, principally by young English composers, with some success. He was assisted by George Giddens, Maurice Farkoa, Johannes Wolff and Mr. Hollman.

In the evening the most important concert was the Richter at St. James' Hall, but it calls for little notice, as the program was principally made up of Wagner excerpts, which Dr. Richter has often played before over here.

Simultaneously with this a piano recital was given by Mlle. Správka, a very clever young pianist, at Bechstein Hall. She took Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue somewhat fast, but she played several Brahms pieces with great neatness and taste.

At this concert the somewhat unusual spectacle was afforded of a reigning sovereign on the concert platform, the Ranee of Sarawak joining the concert giver in an excellent performance of Schumann's Andante and Variations for Two Pianos.

Plunket Greene seemed to be suffering from the fog, but he nevertheless succeeded in giving excellent performances of Brahms' "Feldeinsamkeit" and "Vergebliches Ständchen." The latter, indeed, could hardly have been more beautifully sung.

Miss Fanny Davies provided an interesting program for her recital at St. James' Hall on Tuesday afternoon. It included Schumann's "Novelleten," op. 20; Bach's English Suite in A minor and a set of compositions by such modern French composers as René Lenormand, Louis Aube Saint-Saëns and Fauré. Her interpretations were all tho oughly sound, if not supremely interesting.

The Chaplin Trio, three admirable players, gave a co cert at Steinway Hall on the same afternoon. The gre advantages to be derived from constant ensemble practi were very evident in the playing of these three sisters, a Schumann's Third Trio went remarkably well, particular the slow movement.

At this concert Mcurig James sang William Wallac four freebooter songs. His performance was noticeab for two reasons: one was the dramatic power with whi he sang and the other was the remarkable hardness of l tone. If he could mend the latter he should make a go singer.

In the evening Miss Aline May gave a concert at Bec stein Hall.

On Wednesday afternoon an enormous audience asse bled at St. James' Hall to hear two hours and more ballads of doubtful worth. The singers were mostly tak from the front rank, and included Mme. Ella Russe Mme. Alice Gomez, Ben Davies and Kennerley Rumfo while Mlle. Chaminade was the pianist. The musici who knows what to expect shuns these concerts like p son. They are, however, very popular with a certain ty of amateur.

In the evening Kalman Ronay gave a violin recital St. James' Hall. When a performer drops the "Mc" b fore his name, as does this violinist, one is generally giv the impression that he has become justly famous like Pad rewski, Kubelik or Ysaye. Those, however, who appli the rule in this case were doomed to disappointment. f Mr. Ronay proved as ordinary a violinist as ever appear on the platform. His reading of Mendelssohn's Viol Concerto, to which he only had a piano accompanime was dull and thin to a degree, and he displayed a terrib tendency to play out of tune. A bright spot in the pr gram was the singing of Mrs. Gordon Cleatner, who ga excellent performances of several songs by Korbay.

Apropos, one would like to put a question to the writ of the words of one of the tenor songs. What does he, she, imagine a "Forest Idyll" to be that it should be i pelled to "sink to rest," as distinctly stated in the song?

On Thursday afternoon a delightful concert was giv at Queen's Hall by Ysaye and Busoni. The progra consisted of three of Beethoven's sonatas for violin a piano, those in G, C minor and A (the "Kreutzer"). T two great players were at their best, and in the matter sympathy, delicacy and richness of tone their readin could hardly be surpassed. These recitals have now b come regular features of the London musical season, a long may they continue to be so.

In the evening the Royal Choral Society began a fre season, but not a fresh repertory. It would be difficult say how often that society has given Mendelssoh "Elijah," but it certainly forms part of their annual schem It must be a very valuable asset, too, for the big hall w packed with people. That the music was sung well go without saying; after all these years of practice the socie ought to be able to sing it without music. The princip quartet of soloists consisted of Mme. Ella Russell, Mi Ada Crossley, Ben Davies and Andrew Black, and the se ondary quartet of Mme. Mary Beare, Miss Emily Fo croft, Fred Norcurp and Bertram Mills.

On the same evening Edward Iles sang a number of i teresting songs at Steinway Hall, and Donald Tovey, young pianist and composer who is coming to the fron gave a chamber concert at St. James' Hall.

In the afternoon, Fräulein Wietrowitz gave a violin r cital at Bechstein Hall, at which she was assisted by Mr Montague Fordham and Miss Fanny Davies.

On Friday afternoon Mme. Blanche Marchesi gave song recital at St. James' Hall. Madame Marchesi ca not, it is true, lay claim to very remarkable vocal power but she chooses delightful songs and she knows how sing them. Her program included some charming o rench songs, a Villanelle by Berlioz, a group of songs y Schubert and Löwe's "Edward," which she sang very amatically. She also brought forward a peculiar "Song ithout Words," by Arthur Brahms, supposed to describe e "Birds' Sunday Morning Service." The description is rtainly not particularly convincing and the composition ust be set down rather as a curiosity than as a valuable ntribution to musical art.

The indefatigable Mr. Newman, besides taking over the rystal Palace concerts and arranging a series at the Al-rt Hall, now announces a series of organ recitals at ueen's Hall.

Much sympathy is felt with Mr. Henschel on the loss his wife, who was very well known as a singer. For any years the concerts given by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel ve been features of the musical season in London.

On Tuesday last, at the Queen's Hall Promenade Con-rt, Hans Wessely gave an admirable performance of the rahms Violin Concerto.

On Wednesday Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies sang Arthur ervey's setting—for voice and orchestra—of B. W. Fin-n's fine poem, "The Gates of Night." Mr. Hervey is e music critic of the Morning Post and Mr. Findon e music critic of the Echo and the Morning Advertiser d also president of the Playgoers' Club. The work was thusiastically received.

On Thursday a new Suite de Ballet, "Dance Rhythms," Percy Pitt was very cordially received. The first ovement, which is the most original and interesting usically, is Oriental in character and very effective.

Mme. Eleanor Cleaver will give a song recital, under the rection of Miss Alice E. Joseph, at the Bechstein Hall n November 26, at 8:30 p. m., when she will present an teresting program, assisted by Lady Hallé, Ingo Simon, ritone, and Henry Bird.

Madame Cleaver is an American contralto who gave a ccessful recital at St. James' Hall in the autumn of 1900, ice when she has had several appearances in London d the provinces. She has been engaged by the Dul-ch Philharmonic Society to sing in Sir Arthur Sulli-n's "Kenilworth" at the Crystal Palace on December 14.

Miss Margery Dale will give a dramatic recital, under direction of Miss Alice E. Joseph, at the Steinway Hall the afternoon of November 26. She will be assisted Miss Ethel Bankart and Mme. Lily Henkel, and among ier selections will introduce a scene from "Herod."

Mme. Marie Dulcken will give a concert, under the di-tion of Miss Alice E. Joseph, at the Salle Erard on the ening of November 28. She will be assisted by Mlle. lie de Lussan, Miss Ellen Bowick, André Kayà and the ulcken Trio, consisting of Madame Dulcken, Miss Edie ynolds and Miss Kate Ould.

Mme. Julia Rudge, contralto, will give a song recital, der the direction of Miss Alice E. Joseph, at Stein-y Hall on the afternoon of November 29, assisted by rcy Grainger. This will be Madame Rudge's first ap-arance in England, and she will give several groups of gs in various languages, introducing some new com-sitions by William Wallace. Mr. Grainger will prob-y introduce some compositions by Cyril Scott, a young glish composer, of whom report speaks highly.

LONDON NOTES.

Mme. Adey Brunel has been engaged by J. A. Mat-ws, the conductor of the Cheltenham Musical Festival Society, to give a further series of four poetic recitals on November 13, 14, 15 and 16. She will include selections from Longfellow, Tennyson, the two Brownings and Shakespeare. Vocal and instrumental assistance will be given by Cuthbert Whitemore, Robert Radford and Henry Plevy, and their items will include various songs from the poets.

Norman Concorde announces that Madame Anna Steinhauer and Albert Mallinson will give an afternoon recital at Bechstein Hall on Friday afternoon, November 22. During the first part of the performance Mme. Anna Steinhauer will sing selections from the works of Heise, Grieg, Sherwood, Lange-Muller, Harthan, Arlberg and Rubinstein, and the second part will be devoted to songs by Albert Mallinson, including his song cycle "My Garden." As before Albert Mallinson will be at the piano.

King Hedley, who has lately completed a very successful Australian tour, will give his first dramatic recital in England under the management of Norman Concorde at Bechstein Hall on Thursday evening, November 21, at 8:30 o'clock. His program will consist of selections from the works of Shakespeare, Hood, Bret Harte, Robert Buchanan, Maxwell Gray and F. Braden. The artists assisting will be Mme. Anna Steinhauer, the Danish soprano; Miss Mary Aukett (harpist), and at the piano Albert Mallinson.

Mme. Jutta Bell Ranske will give a vocal recital, under the direction of Norman Concorde, at the Bechstein Hall on Tuesday evening, December 10, on which occasion Mme. Ranske, who has so frequently lectured on the subject of voice production, will contribute the greater part of the program. The assisting artists will include her pupil, Miss May Warren, and her little daughter, Tullik Bell Ranske, who will make her professional début. The program will include traditional and folklore songs, vocal duets from Brahms and Dvorák, and songs from Wagner, Grieg, Delius and Emmanuel Moor. Martin Shaw will preside at the piano.

Mme. Jutta Bell Ranske will give two free lectures on "Voice Production" on Thursdays, November 14 and 28, at 3 o'clock, at the Brinsmead Galleries, 18 Wigmore street, W. (by kind permission of Messrs. J. Brinsmead & Sons).

The second Bedford Festival, which was fixed for October 30, has been unavoidably postponed until Thursday, December 19. The change of date will prevent some of the artists first engaged from appearing, and those now taking part will include Madame Sobrino, Miss Ethel Wood, John Coates, Robert Radford and Ivor Foster.

At the afternoon concert will be performed Elgar's "Caractacus" and a new work by Albert Mallinson founded on Longfellow's "Tegners Drapa," for soprano solo, chorus and orchestra. The solo part will be sung by Mme. Anna Steinhauer, and the work will be conducted by the composer. At the evening concert Berlioz's "Faust" will be performed. Norman Concorde's Fransella Select Orchestra has been engaged. H. J. Tiltman, the organizer of the Bedford Festival, will be the conductor.

Sousa.

THE famous Sousa and his band are continuing their great success in Europe, and will leave for home December 14 on the American liner Philadelphia.

Harry J. Fellows as a Teacher.

PROMINENT among the leading vocal teachers of this country stands the name of Harry J. Fellows, the tenor, now touring with Leonora Jackson. He had a thorough training abroad under Randegger and other masters and his own research in voice building and tone production and a scientific study carried on for years have given him a mastery of his subject. Mr. Fellows, beyond wide experience both as teacher and concert singer, has personal qualities which insure success. A man of artistic tastes, he is sympathetic, genial, full of enthusiasm and zeal, at the same time painstaking and discriminating. There is no forcing or ruining of voices in his studio. Correct breathing as exemplified by the most noted artists, tone color, timbre, resonance, poise, tone production, and lastly interpretation; be it opera, oratorio or ballad; be it French, German or English, all the details of the art are given careful attention by this teacher. His aim is the rational, careful development of talent, and he seeks the highest possible artistic results along scientific and common sense lines.

Little wonder that Mr. Fellows is sought for by students from all parts of the country. The past two years he has had at St. Louis a large and enthusiastic following of pupils from nearly every State of the Union. They were disappointed when he accepted an offer to tour with Leonora Jackson this season, and much pressure ever since has been brought to bear upon him to resume teaching. In response to requests Mr. Fellows has decided to conduct a summer vocal school next June, July and August at Cambridge Springs, Pa. This point is nearly on the direct line between Cleveland and Buffalo, is centrally located, and whether for recreation or study no more attractive region could have been selected.

De Wienzkowska Pupils Play.

THE pupils of Madame De Wienzkowska gave a recital Monday afternoon of last week at the studio in Carnegie Hall and many good things might be said about their playing. A warm musical tone and in the matter of interpretation the young people showed the results of their gifted teacher's instruction. The program, consisting of romantic and classical numbers, follows:

MRS. ALICE BATES RICE has been engaged to sing in "The Messiah" at the Eliot Church, at which time J. C. Bartlett and Stephen Townsend will also be soloists. Another engagement that Mrs. Rice has in the immediate future is as soloist before the Dorchester Woman's Club at a concert. It will be remembered that Mrs. Rice sang the principal role of John K. Paine's "Azara" when it was given at Cambridge; the other evening she sang a portion of the music at the St. Cecilia rehearsal, everyone being most enthusiastic. Mrs. Rice holds one of the most important church choir positions in the city, being the soprano soloist at King's Chapel, where B. J. Lang is organist.

Miss Van Kuren, pupil of Miss Clara Munger, will sing the soprano part of Homer A. Norris' Walt Whitman music, which is to be given at Waltham early in December. Miss Van Kuren has a charming voice, and those who attended the rehearsal the other day say the music is delightful.

The announcements for the twenty-sixth season of the St. Cecilia Society have just appeared. There are to be three concerts on the evenings of December 3, February 4 and April 2, with the following works: The B minor Mass, by Bach, for chorus, solo singers, orchestra and organ. This will be the first performance in Boston of this work and the second complete performance in America. Miss Kathryn Hilke and Ellison Van Hoose have been engaged.

The second concert will consist of a miscellaneous program, the soloists not yet having been announced. There will be a Motet for chorus and organ, by Arthur Foote; the 150th Psalm, for chorus and organ, by C. Franck; an entire scene from Prof. J. K. Paine's new opera, "Azara," and a chorus from "St. Christopher," by H. W. Parker.

At the April concert the oratorio of "The Promised Land," by Massenet, will be given. This is the latest work of that composer, and the right of production has been secured by the St. Cecilia Society for its first presentation in America. Heinrich Meyn is already engaged for this concert and other soloists will be announced later.

Madame Nevada will give her first concert in this city on Tuesday afternoon, November 26, at the Colonial Theatre.

Mrs. Caroline Shepard was soloist at the Choral Union concert given at Hartford on the 11th. The Hartford Courant says of Mrs. Shepard's singing in "The Erl King's Daughter": "Mrs. Shepard has a pure bell-like voice, well cultivated and modulated and sang with notably beautiful effect the scene with Sir Olaf and chorus, making a fine contrast in her rendering of the welcoming solo and the dramatic close, 'Then if thou wilt not dance with me, pain and death shall follow.' The second part of the program was miscellaneous and again Mrs. Shepard scored a success, being particularly complimented for Gounod's 'Repentance,' given with piano, organ and violin accompaniment."

Miss Marie L. Everett recently presented three of her pupils at a song recital in the Friday Morning Club rooms at Worcester. A large and fashionable audience was present. Those who sang were Miss Marian Smith, Miss Anna Metzger and Mrs. G. Gerry Boardman. The first part of the program was made up of selections from the Italian, German and French schools of singing. The second part consisted of songs with English words. Alfred de Voto was the accompanist.

Carl Sobeski will give another "at home" on Saturday afternoon, November 30, from 4 to 6, when there will be music by some of his pupils.

"The Ten Virgins," a cantata by Gaul, will be given at the Eliot Church on Sunday evening, under the direction of Everett E. Truette, organist of the church. The soloists will be members of the choir.

Students of the advanced classes gave the recital on Wednesday evening at the New England Conservatory of Music.

The Apollo Club gave its first concert of the thirty-first season at Chickering Hall on the 15th when the "Prayer of Thanksgiving," Gounod's "Sword Dance," Parker's "Three Words" and the chorus from "Alcestis," by Brambach, were given by the club. Mrs. Caroline Shepard was the soloist, giving a thoroughly artistic and enjoyable cycle of songs by Von Fielitz, also "The Dinja," by Reinhold Hermann.

W. H. Sherwood, who has not been heard in this city for a number of years, will give one piano recital at Chickering Hall on the afternoon of December 2.

The Euterpe Club will give its twelfth annual concert in Chickering Hall on February 18. Among the artists will be Stephen Townsend and Adah Campbell Hussey.

On Thursday afternoon, in Steinert Hall, a recital was given by five pupils of Mrs. Thomas Tapper, with the following assisting artists: Emil Mahr and Hermann Heberlein. Mrs. E. Horne-Donaldson, Alice Baker, Charles P. Anthony and Miss Alice Brown were among those who appeared.

Miss Bernardine Parker, pupil of Etta Edwards, gave a successful concert at Winthrop recently.

ELIZABETH HAZARD.—Mrs. Elizabeth Hazard, the soprano, and Charles Schuetze, harpist, were the artists who appeared at the musicale given by Mr. and Mrs. Olin D. Gray in "The Dorinton" last Friday night. The musical program proved delightful and in keeping with the handsomely appointed home. Mrs. Hazard, accompanied by the harp, sang, "Si mes vers avaient des ailes," by Hahn, and three songs by Cornelius, "Untrue," "Treue" and "Nachts." The harp solos played by Mr. Schuetze were "Consolation," by Liszt; "At the Seashore," by Obeithur, and "Winter," by John Thomas. Mrs. Hazard is in fine voice this winter. She and Mr. Schuetze have been engaged for "Ladies' Day" at the New York Athletic Club, December 7, and for a concert also in December at the Colonial Club.

Mr. and Mrs. Pratt aroused genuine enthusiasm by t rare exhibition of virtuosity which their difficult sele tions demanded and brought the program to a close am a storm of applause.

FROM A CRITIC IN BOSTON, MASS.—"What a pleasure is to listen to that fine artist, Baernstein; his mellow voi and his broad, refined style are a continual delight. Baer stein is essentially a colorist. The painter mixes his ma colored paints and blends them into perfect harmony, ma ing a picture beautiful to behold. Baernstein colors l voice in such a manner as to make it express every em tion, and bring pictures vividly to the imagination of l hearers, delighting their very soul with his noble voice a exquisite art. It was my privilege to hear a recital giv by him a few days ago, and in pronouncing his work triumph of art' I voice the opinion of a public discrimin tion. A. M. G."

The first of a series of lectures on "The Mechanism of the Voice," with illustrations, was given by Dr. John B. Singleton on Friday evening, November 22, at the Oscar Ehrgott Vocal School. Dr. Singleton is an authority on the subject.

A chorus, numbering about seventy voices, students of the Oscar Ehrgott Vocal School, is diligently rehearsing "The Messiah," to be given as a recital on Friday evening December 20, in Sutton Hall. Soloists are all students of Oscar Ehrgott.

The first lecture in the choir course of the Oscar Ehrgott Vocal School will be given by the Rev. Mr. Eccles of St. Paul's Pro-Cathedral, Friday evening, December 13. The lecture will be on the Episcopal service, with illustrations.

Oscar Ehrgott, baritone, has a number of concert engagements during the holidays.

An event of extraordinary interest was the first Chamber Music Concert of the Marien String Quartet in the Lyceum of the College of Music on Wednesday evening, November 20. The program embraced the Kaiser Quartet for strings, by Haydn; the quartet ("La Volga") for strings, by Afanasieff, and Dvorák's Quintet for piano and strings. The string quartet is the same as it was for several years, with the exception that Ralph Wetmore, second violin, a pupil of Mr. Marien, is substituted for Mr. Schneider. Mr. Wetmore is somewhat weak in his playing and needs more of the refinement and polish that come to the quartet player after some experience. In general the quartet playing had the ear marks of careful preparation and serious study. Much of it was of a finished character. In the Kaiser Quartet the playing was less satisfactory. The first violin was inclined to sharpness and there was in the general reading a lack of that simplicity and loftiness of style so essential to an appreciation of Haydn. The Russian Quartet was well played, although the composition itself suffers from sameness of character in key and treatment. The grateful composition of the evening was the Dvorák Quintet for piano and strings. It is characterized by a dress of exquisite modern coloring—and is full of direct purpose.

Romeo Gorno, who played the piano part, proved himself an ensemble artist of a very high class. Few pianists display a truer sense of values, a more delicate and poetic sentiment, and a better understanding of the laws of expression. At times he played with positive fire and passion. A uniform musicianly intelligence asserted itself at all times.

A concert was given this evening in the Odeon by Dr. N. J. Elsenheimer and Sig. Romeo Gorno, assisted by a vocal quartet of the College of Music. Program of the concert, which will be reviewed in my next letter, was as follows:

Toccata in C minor.....Bach
Arranged for two pianos by Albino Gorno.
Theme and Variations in F major.....Mozart-Rheinberger
Scherzo.....Albino Gorno
Gipsy Songs, op. 103.....Brahms

Scherzo, from Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn

Alma Stencel.

ALMA STENCEL, a very youthful pianist of about twelve to fourteen years of age, made her appearance lately in Berlin. She is a pupil of Hugo Mansfield and has already been presented to the public of Vienna and Budapest. We subjoin some press notices:

With the assistance of the Philharmonic Orchestra, the childlike Alma Stencel gave a concert in the Beethoven Hall, in which she performed the piano concertos, E minor of Emil Sauer and E flat major of Liszt, and some smaller pieces. If the public delights to listen to a child, its admiration must be increased when she gives a really artistic performance such as is scarcely expected on the average from full grown virtuosii. Her technic may still leave something to be wished, for bravura pieces are not written for children's hands. But the soft, child-like touch, especially in the cantilene, propitiated all critical judgment.—Berlin Musik and Theaterwelt, October 31, 1901.

If any conclusions as to pianistic gifts can be drawn from the fact that a girl of thirteen played by heart and with fluent technic the E minor concerto of E. Sauer or the E flat major of Liszt, then Alma Stencel possesses an extraordinary talent. She is not only gifted, but normally developed. That she is technically well advanced and has genuine pianistic talent, was seen in the G flat major Etude of Chopin.—Allgemeine Musik Zeitung, November 1, 1901.

Alma Stencel indisputably possesses extraordinarily great endowments. In a pure technical point of view, her remarkable dexterity, with her powerful touch, enables her to overcome the difficulties which, for example, Liszt's E flat major Concerto presents. The applause bestowed on her was a well deserved encouragement for a very promising talent.—Reick's Anzeiger, October 29.

Alma Stencel made the best impression in Liszt's Tarantelle. Her touch is—when no fortissimo is desired—very charming, her dexterity highly considerable, but the most surprising to me were the octave passages, resulting from a faultlessly developed wrist technic. She must be described as a very promising talent.—Das Kleine Journal, October 31, 1901.

The sureness and bravura with which Alma Stencel played the E flat major Concerto of Liszt gave to her performance the stamp of extraordinary talent. She has an intelligent face, short dresses and waving Loreley hair, and I think she will soon sing on the piano "a powerful and wondrous melody."—Volks Zeitung, October 29.

In the two concertos Alma Stencel gave astonishing proofs, far beyond the sphere of youth, of her technical ability. Her playing by heart and flawless work with the orchestra deserve unstinted praise.—Allgemeine Musikalische Rundschau.

ERNEST HUTCHESON AND KNEISEL QUARTET.—Ernest Hutcheson, the Australian pianist, will play in Boston December 2, with the Kneisel Quartet. Hutcheson uses the Mason & Hamlin piano.

THERE is a three year old Suzanne Bréval at the Opéra Comique. Whose child is this? Help! help!

IT is reported that the flying Dutchman Van Rooy has canceled his American engagement at the opera. Perhaps Bayreuth proved too much for him last summer. Cosima Fan tutti!

IT strikes us that F. X. Arens and his Cooper Union Institute concerts are quite sufficient for lovers of good music on the East Side. This apropos of a scheme, more utopian than practical, to give classic music down town.

THE unfortunate habit on some of the daily papers of writing up concerts before they occur is responsible for the misstatement in the Evening Telegram regarding Miss Helen Niebuhr's appearance in Brooklyn. Miss Niebuhr was to sing with the Kneisel Quartet Wednesday night, and on Thursday the Telegram stated that she had sung, when in fact the concert was postponed on account of the serious illness of Mr. Kneisel.

SAYS the Herald:

"M. Jean de Reszké is back with his wife at the palatial residence he built for himself in the Rue de la Faisanderie. The house contains a bijou theatre much larger than some Parisian auditoriums. There a favored few will be afforded the opportunity of listening to the great singer this winter.

"M. Jean de Reszké is rehearsing 'Siegfried,' which will be produced at the Opéra on December 18, with a novelty in the shape of an automobile dragon."

Is Willy Schütz at last to appear in Wagner opera?

IT is said that for the concert which Miss Feé was to have given last Monday week, and in which Paur and his orchestra were to have participated, $15 was taken in as advance sale, and that, in consequence, the violinist and Mr. Paur refused to perform. This would indicate that the people of this city do not propose to support orchestral concerts, for it is understood that débutantes here, whether from abroad or at home, fill the houses with the use of complimentary tickets. It is because the people refuse to sustain the classical orchestra in New York that the habit of giving orchestral concerts to support solo pianists will also cease, except in rare cases.

The situation locally is exceedingly perplexing, and defies analysis. Walter Damrosch once told the writer that no American city can sustain simultaneously an opera and a permanent orchestra, and that assertion appears feasible. The Philharmonic is not a permanent orchestra; it is periodical, and it cannot rehearse permanently. The opera is always the cause of musical decay, because it is on a false basis. It is the great impediment to the development of American composers; it destroys all chances of a local orchestra, and it vitiates the true taste for music. Mr. Paur is helpless before it; so are all others.

"The world will never hear the last of the proofs that Liszt had the noblest, biggest heart that ever beat in a musician's breast. Fresh evidence is supplied in the second issue of the new German magazine, Musik, by Helene Raff, who contributes some letters that passed between the composer Raff and Liszt in 1846 and 1847. They show once more ho Liszt gave his time and means to the furtheranc of not only the writings but the material welfare those who applied to him. Raff was hardly able t earn his daily crust of bread when Liszt secured f him a position in a Frankfurt music store. Unfo tunately, Raff soon made enemies. He 'told tl truth,' as he writes to Liszt, about certain mus cians, and the result was that these musicians pull the wires and secured his discharge. Then Lis got him a place with a publisher in Vienna, ar finally invited him to Weimar to be his secretar 'It is self-evident,' he writes, 'that a complete a surance of your pecuniary independence, as well as prompt and intelligent furthering of your music career, will be the conditions sine qua non of yo position. The insignificant services which I ma perhaps be so happy as to render you in this dire tion you would be expected to requite simply l giving me your frank confidence, and an occasion hour of work in the way of getting manuscripts int shape, copying, orchestrating, taking diction, & as you did in June and July, 1845.'"

IN the Times last week was a lengthy paragra announcing the discovery of a "heavenly voic The discoverer of this voice is an ex-professor Yale, and as he is a clergyman and the friend of bishop we humbly acknowledge that he may kno what a "heavenly voice" better than poor worl lings like us. We shou have fancied in our sin plicity that the first quality of a "heavenly voic was that it needed no training on earth, and in t next place we believe we may assert that it wou not be in demand for opera, concert, church choir vaudeville, where mere human voices, more or le trained, are in demand. The possessor of t "heavenly voice" is a girl still in her teens; h father is a poor painter, her mother a washerwoma she is one of nine children, and has been in the Sa vation Army. The discoverer and his friends, r ligious and philanthropic, are raising funds to sen her abroad to be trained. Now we all know th there is no possible necessity for sending even "heavenly voice" abroad for this purpose. It cou be trained here better than in Germany or Franc But have these kind, good people who are contri uting their money reflected what they really a about? Here is a girl who knows only "Englis as she is spoke" on Long Island, who has the ma ners of the tenement house, things inevitable in h case, and whose sole defense against temptation the moral training she has received in the Saivatio Army. We honor the Salvation Army for t good work it has done and is doing, and we ho that its teaching will abide with this poor girl am the temptations and troubles which await her if t philanthropists carry out their plans. Here is a gi flung into some country whose language she do not know, whose manners and customs are strang to her and whose code of morals, especially whe ignorant young girls are not those of t United States. Will they give her fun enough to take a chaperon with her and lodge in decent pension? They certainly ought in commo decency to do so. But are any of them competen to make the arrangements for launching an unpr tected girl into an unknown sea? We trow no What do Mrs. Russell Sage or Miss Helen Gould kind, good ladies, know of the matter? Our co umns have often to record the ruin of young girl ruin of body and soul, sent from home to be "traine abroad," and countless instances of like misery pa unnoticed. Why add another victim to the list the slain by philanthropy?

If it is considered necessary for a "heavenl voice" to have a finishing touch of European cultu for advertising purposes, the European trip ough to be deferred till some thorough training has bee undergone here, where friends are near her and she can find companions.

We have not said a word about the injustice to the hardworking teachers of this city in this fad for sending promising talents to foreign lands. This is really a secondary consideration to the cruelty of exporting an ignorant, unprotected girl to the dangers of Paris or Berlin.

NO one but the Recording Angel knows how many men and women have perished prematurely because the doctors made a mistake in diagnosing the cases. There is one point, however, upon which physicians called in to "consult" do agree.

WHEN DOCTORS AND CRITICS DISAGREE ——?

When they find the patient emaciated, weak and feverish, they agree quickly that he is ill, but it is seeking the real malady that tests their experience, skill and knowledge of anatomy. Music critics are in a sense like the members of the medical profession. Among the men and women engaged in the work of writing musical reviews for the metropolitan press there is altogether too much uncertainty, hence too many contradictory opinions. Most of the so-called critics come to the conclusion at once that the artist can sing, but in the analysis of method, the voice, the style, there are numerous and humorous disagreements. Musicians who do understand are amus d when they read pedantic phrases inserted to hide the critic's ignorance of the subject he is expected to discuss. There are also discerning readers who can tell whether the critic heard all, half or even less of the performance he was assigned to review. But the unfortunate layman who needs to be guided in the matter is often strangely confused by the conflicting music reports published in the daily papers, and well he may be.

We have, for instance, the criticisms in the New York daily papers of Gregory Hast's recital in Mendelssohn Hall some ten days ago, and the medley of contradictions is one to make angels weep. The critics seem to agree that Mr. Hast can sing, but for the rest, alas! alas!

The Tribune commends Mr. Hast's enunciation, his intelligence and his taste, and while admitting that the singer would be "a decidedly agreeable acquisition to the local concert rooms," tunders out this piece of information: "Neither in voice nor manner does he belong in the category of great artists, but he has qualities of a most amiable and ingratiating character."

Less than twenty-five years ago certain European critics said something similar about Jean de Reszké. We wonder where these European critics are to-day. Let us hope that some of them have by this time become familiar with these immortal lines by Pope:

"Be thou the first true merit to befriend;
His praise is lost who waits till all commend."

Here are two more opinions. One by Krehbiel in the Tribune, and the other by Henderson, printed in the Times:

KREHBIEL.

"Mr. Hast's voice is neither voluminous nor particularly pleasing in quality."

HENDERSON.

"He has a voice of pleasing quality, though of no large range, but he uses his head tones discreetly to extend his compass and to give variety to his coloring in the upper register."

The writer in the Herald wrote as follows about Mr. Hast's début:

"A vocal recital, given in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon by Gregory Hast—his first appearance here—proved to be a delightful affair. Both the quality of Mr. Hast's tenor and his style of singing are excellent and highly commended themselves to the audience.

"His program contained among other selections numbers by Brahms, Löwe, Schumann, Sullivan, Nevin, Clay, Dalcroung and S. Coleridge Taylor. Mr. Hast was encored after his singing of Löwe's 'How Deep the Slumbers of the Floods,' and had the same pleasant experience with Nevin's 'Immortal Love,' which was sung from manuscript."

Laura Danziger in the Journal agrees with Mr. Henderson and disagrees with Krehbiel regarding Mr. Hast's voice. She writes:

"Mr. Hast revealed a voice of fresh, pleasing quality, with a real tenor timbre. His middle tones are sweet and not without richness, and his upper tones when sung mezzo voce are similarly grateful to the ear."

In lines following this tribute, Mrs. Danziger finds fault with the singer's upper tones when sung in full voice, and what she writes about the "A flat" rather forces the work of criticism beyond its legitimate field.

The critic of the Staats-Zeitung referred to Mr. Hast's list of songs as "an English drawing-room program." As the program in fact contained three of Brahms' most beautiful and difficult songs, one song by Schumann, one by Cornelius, and the recitative and big aria from "Elijah," we conclude the gentleman on the Staats-Zeitung read the house program in the Oriental fashion—beginning at the farther end.

Here are the parallels regarding the program:

TRIBUNE.

"He is fond of sentiment of the lighter order and happiest in its expression, but that he also appreciates songs of lofty kind he showed yesterday by putting such works as 'Es hing der Reif' and 'Die Mainacht,' by Brahms, and 'Ein Ton,' by Cornelius, on his program."

STAATS-ZEITUNG.

"Es war eben ein richtiges englisches Drawing room programme."

The opening of the Horse Show crowded the report out of the World.

The men who write for the evening papers have more time to think things over, and perhaps are just a little bit influenced by the brethren whose opinions they read in the morning. Mr. Finck probably is the only one who does not care a straw what his colleagues on the morning editions think or say. While we cannot always coincide with the critic of the Evening Post, we do admire his independence and his exclusiveness.

Mr. Finck does not think Mr. Hast's voice is "remarkable," but he admits that its quality is "agreeable." About Mr. Hast's singing Mr. Finck is more positive, and in this asserts his independence and disregard of the opinions of several of the critics on the morning papers.

Here is what Mr. Finck writes of Mr. Hast's singing:

"He sings with beautiful art and perfect command of the vocal resources. His enunciation, too, is excellent, so that the listener can enjoy the poem as well as its musical setting—a point of much greater importance than the average singer fancies. To it was due in good part the warm applause accorded to Mr. Hast. He has acquired the difficult art, so rare among singers, of fitting the articulated text into the stream of tone without marring its beauty or legato continuity, or smudging the words. His best effort was Cornelius' 'Ein Ton,' in which he achieved the paradoxical merit of making the monotone anything but monotonous."

Mr. Chase, of the Evening Sun, illumines his music reports with humor that is spontaneous and deliciously kind. No matter how mirth provoking the story, we detect the true gentleman and finely educated mind. As we have too much of the snarling, "preachy," perfunctory kind of criticism, Mr. Chase's symposiums are a welcome relief. Commenting upon the singer's art, Mr. Chase includes in his report:

"The public knows that it must take its tenors with thanksgiving. Happily, Mr. Hast is of the line long exemplified in Sims Reeves, who used to charge mightily upon his battlehorse ballads and his oratorio dogs of war. That Mr. Hast has oratorio training he showed yesterday in the Mendelssohn air 'If With All Your Hearts.' He displayed gifts more fundamental even than his good German speech in the sobrieties of 'Ein Ton,' by Cornelius, and of 'Die Mainacht' and 'Es hing der Reif,' by Brahms."

The criticisms in the Mail and Express, by Mr. Swift, are well written, show thought and the disposition to be just. Mr. Swift, in referring to Mr. Hast's recital, writes:

"There was an exquisiteness about it all which could not go unrecognized." Before and later in his review, Mr. Swift laments because the singer was deficient in "muscularity." Heavens, what can Mr. Swift mean? It cannot be that a man of his refinement has been attending prize fights? We have had illustrations of "muscular" tenors from members of the Castle Square Opera Company, and when we recall these we devoutly pray that the advent of "muscular" tenors in song recital will be deferred until the year 1950 or 2000, when we are dead.

Even regarding the reception of the singer some of the critics disagreed.

Here is another parallel:

EVENING WORLD.

"The unresponsiveness of the audience seemed to depress the singer and in his later numbers he fell flat."

EVENING SUN.

"Mr. Hast was more kindly received than any other newcomer of the musical season thus far."

As we profoundly believe in the law of compensation, we feel convinced that the critics who are sowing the "wind" will in due time reap the "whirlwind." To the impatient, the "reaping" may seem a long time coming, but it will come. When music criticism writes itself above the composer and the performer, we know that the days of that sort of criticism are numbered.

THE cable reports of the funeral of the late opera impresario, Col. J. H. Mapleson, are to the effect that no floral tributes were sent to the funeral by any of the opera singers or stars, and that only two persons attended the obsequies. When the late Don Diego de Vivo, the opera and singing star manager, was buried fifteen persons were present, including the editor of this paper, and at the funeral of the impresario Max Maretzek seven persons, including a member of this staff, attended; De Vivo is therefore ahead for the present.

DE VIVO AHEAD.

To what is this cynical callousness on the part of operatic stars due? Here are men dying to whom their associations and environment owe a common, ordinary social respect, buried without the proprieties of decency, as if they were outcasts, as if they were criminals. The fitness of life is neglected, the proportion of the perspective is reduced to a minimum, the whole scheme of existence is discarded as so much rubbish, and the one man who has given his brains, his time and his work to the exploitation of what are known as operatic stars is treated by them in death, and in the surrounding solemnity of earthly annihilation, as if he had been, or had represented less than, in some cases, a pet dog. How does this happen?

It is not a phenomenon associated with the sense of music, for the late Anton Seidl was buried with public pomp, and so have many men identified with music as a profession been buried with gorgeous circumstance. The reason must be sought in another direction.

The operatic impresario is not identified with music in itself, with music as an art. He is distinctly, definitely and most emphatically a symbol of a form of entertainment known as opera under star auspices, which must be distinguished from opera as opera, pure and simple. He seldom knows music. He knows the mechanism of the star opera system, the details of stage craft, the traditional poses and gestures, the acoustics of opera houses, the eccentricities of opera personality, the trend of the public taste, the effect of the high C; but of music he desires to know nothing, because a serene vision of the art would affect and influence his business judgment.

The manager of stars in opera—Strakosches, De Vivo, Abbey, Maretzek, Mapleson, Grau—is a man of commerce, who deals in an article of merchandise known as the operatic stars, upon whom he is supposed to thrive by surrounding them so that the public will come and pay him a profit on his contracts with them. Just as Maretzek dealt in Wachtel, so Strakosch dealt in Brignoli and Mapleson in Campanini and Grau in De Reszké. Just as the old line of impresarii had their sopranos, so has Grau his Melbas and Calvés, and the business still continues to prosper, much to the detriment of musical art and the destruction of delicate human sentiment, for the exploitation of stars produces such prodigious egotism, such unnatural and stimulated self-aggrandizement in the star subject, that the whole objective universe is converted into a machine at the disposal of the star, who, in his or her obliqueness of vision, ceases to realize the true proportion of affairs. Most of them become so devitalized by accumulated vanity that they cease to be human, and the continual applause and adulation artificially manufactured for them by the impresario finally unfits them for a correct understanding of universal law and even custom.

Through the parrot-like system of memorizing and indefinitely repeating their star roles they lose the effective properties of the memory, and they forget ordinary moral duties, and add to this their artificial self-esteem, and it will readily be seen that they gradually come to believe that they were the exploiters of the impresario; that they "made" him, not he them; that it was not his shrewd business management that formed the very basis of their success, but that their art made him successful. Of course we all know that even Patti failed here when she had no manager, and that it was only after she had placed herself in Abbey's hands that she made $5,000 a night; just as we know that all commercial questions must be decided by business men to be properly decided.

Such then being the case with the stars why should "they" send floral tributes to the poor dead devils of opera managers, who paid them thousands and millions of dollars, and lost all the money they had risked and ventured on the stars, besides the money of friends and relatives? Why the stars gave the impresario all the opportunities to get wealthy; why did he miss them? True, he paid them hundreds of thousands, but then that was his affair. Why did he not keep some himself, which, as the world goes, would have been all right? They have no money to spend on flowers, and as to time—well, they are too busy to go to funerals of impresarii; in fact, to any funerals. "People must come to my funeral; I am a star; I go to their funerals—I?" With the star it is always "I."

And so it comes that De Vivo represents the high water mark, with his fifteen mourners, Maretzek being a poor second with seven only, and Mapleson entirely distanced with two mourners.

As long as the public continues to support such form of amusement the stupid star system will continue to flourish, as it does now under Grau. Grau is merely a machine, turning out these stars as the public requires them; he is as helpless as his predecessors were, and cannot afford to defy the bad taste of the masses by risking an artistic ensemble production, with its costly rehearsals, its mise-en-scène, and its complete orchestral and choral complements, and we shall therefore continue to live a greater part of this century with this evil influence distorting our views and interrupting the natural progress of true art, both musical and dramatic. It is only through a profound educational upheaval, such as Richard Wagner attempted (and Shakespeare before him), that we can hope for a change into the right channel of thought and action. The support of the star system indicates an absence of mental balance, due, no doubt, to the insane pursuit of wealth, for all forms of entertainment are now merely viewed as necessary aids to aberration, so that the weary mind, in order to be able to sustain itself, has its deflection from the routine. For that reason the masses want amusement and not art, and hence they call for the star system and not for music or musical art.

One good feature about this all is that neither Neuendorff nor Maretzek nor De Vito nor Mapleson was at his own funeral to experience the neglect shown. The gallant colonel's heart would have been broken had he seen from his coffin that even Patti had forgotten him, and had he observed that only two persons were following him to the grave he would have gotten up and marched along to make it three at least. We hope Mr. Grau, who has many years to look forward to, will arrange things to beat the De Vivo record; or, still better, to get out of star management altogether.

GERMAN BOYCOTT ON AMERICAN SINGERS.

PRIMA DONNAS AT BERLIN OPERA TRYING TO MAKE POSITION OF MISS GERALDINE FARRAR UNTENABLE.

BERLIN, Thursday.—At the Royal Opera House the latest German enterprise is a protest against the American peril by resenting the hit recently made by Miss Geraldine Farrar, an eighteen year old Massachusetts girl, which resulted in her securing a three years' contract. Several jealous prima donnas, foreseeing the possibility of their superannuation, proceeded to make Miss Farrar's position among them untenable.

One middle aged Margarita announced that she will not sing on the same stage with American upstarts. Miss Farrar is endeavoring to be oblivious to her detractors, but the latter are influential and may undermine her with the management.

The incident recalls the experiences encountered by another American, Mrs. Webster Powell, last year. Despite her successful début and her admitted ability, the singer was subjected to systematic persecution by her confrères, resulting in her paying the management 12,000 marks ($3,000) for the privilege of canceling her contract.

WITH such headlines as the above the New York Herald of November 22 tells of the disagreeable conditions prevailing in Berlin at the Royal Opera House in regard to the latest German specialty in music—the American opera prima donna. As a general thing we have no particular sympathy with that class of singers, and believe it more conducive to Mrs. Webster-Powell's musical career to sing in concerts, as she is now doing, but irrespective of any journalistic attitude the fact remains that two young American singers are boycotted in Germany because they are Americans, whereas we not only tolerate all nationalities in music but encourage foreigners, especially even when they are so old and vocally so decrepid that they can no longer utter musical tones.

There exists a deep seated fear in Germany that the American invasion, which has been felt so emphatically in the industrial field, will also enter the artistic and musical lines, but there can be no great danger. In the first place American singers have very great difficulty in securing even a début, much less an engagement, because the natives always have first choice, and in the next place there is no adequate pecuniary equivalent that can compensate Americans for retaining a position in the German musical economy. Even the natives leave for America as soon as an opening presents itself, and simply because, with a few exceptions, there is no opportunity for a successful career, from a pecuniary viewpoint, and that is the chief and significant idea with artists.

The cases of Powell and Farrar are limited to a boycott, on part of the singers of the Berlin Opera House, and extends, for the present, no farther. Americans have sung in Bayreuth, Dresden, Munich, Elberfeld, Cologne and Leipsic and Breslau (in Vienna also), and in the smaller cities, such as Coburg, Weimar, &c., &c. That was before the days of feverish anxiety regarding the American invasion, and we may as well generously forgive the poor singers who fear that they will be displaced. What we advise them to do, however, is to give the American singers fair play, otherwise such a sentiment of reprisals may be created here that would eliminate the German singers from our opera and concert stages, and that would amount to a serious interruption of fiduciary possibilities. The people here are sensitive on such a subject, and only aroused their action might be effective, as against those who oppose American singers in Germany because they are Americans.

Mr. Hugo Kaun, of Milwaukee, an American composer and conductor, recently had a similar unpleasant chauvinistic experience in Germany, as we can relate.

That the motive was based upon the nationality of Mrs. Powell, and not on the strength of any defect, is verified by the excellent criticisms published on her singing, which are now supplemented by notices of her concert work in Russia, the Riga Rundschau of October 20 saying:

Madame Powell is a vocal phenomenon of a most rare art, for her organ not only exhibits great volume, but at the same time undoubtedly a coloratura bravoura with an astonishing compass. Besides this she possesses, without question, an astoundingly marvelous command of technic, that in its special line stands alone and unsurpassed and could hardly be excelled. The tones in the lower part of the voice sound somewhat veiled—but the higher they go they gain with each note an ever increasing brilliancy till in the extreme height—in the tones above high C—they appear like a radiant splendor of sparkling stars. In her brilliant staccati and easy reaching of the most daring intervals the artist unfolded a technic which left the most dazzling impression. No doubt, the composer (Pira) has written many of the singer's numbers with a perfect understanding of her ability, as they give Madame Powell opportunity to show forth her greatest gifts in electrifying light and thereby to gain a well deserved success—which was thunderous in its perfect ovation.

The American singer does not sing in Europe for money, for there is no money in singing in Europe. The European singer sings in America for large salaries and for money entirely. There is a reciprocity in this, because we look upon Europe as a standard—a traditional standard of critical musical estimate. But if Americans are to be criticised as Americans and not as musicians our estimate of European criticism must be altered, and we shall cease to consider it of any value. It is all a matter for our German friends to decide; we shall act after their decision, and their decision might seriously affect the German musical invasion of America, which has now been in progress for a century.

IS "ELIJAH" COMMONPLACE?

LAST week a writer in the Sun called "Elijah" commonplace. He even went further. He denounced the oratorio as an absurd, inartistic form, a compromise between church and opera, and a hopeless failure as serious music. Mr. Henderson in the Times of the same date describes Mendelssohn's work as "the last of the really great oratorios." Somebody is at fault here. Either Mendelssohn is commonplace or great. There seems to be no middle way with these two critics, and the truth, as it does in most cases, lies midway. Great in the Bach or Handël sense "Elijah" is not; it lacks the diatonic grandeur of Handël in its choruses, and its scores can be hardly compared to Bach's, as exemplified by the "Matthew Passion" or the B minor Mass. They lack the poignant pathos, the accent of Bach's wonderful sincerity is not in them. Yet "Elijah," we need hardly tell our readers has elements of nobility in it; above all it is smoothly written, its workmanship is impeccable. It is this composer's decorative style that wins to him lovers of the melliferous. He seldom startles. His fine formal sense rejects exaggerations. The antithetical balance of his phrases sometimes causes a sense of monotony. Mendelssohn was a melodist. There are lovely melodies in "Elijah," so many that it is unnecessary to enumerate them. And the choral writing is a model of its kind. That this kind does not fulfil the demands of more modern music is not to the point. Mendelssohn had not the "color" sense; his music is not Oriental, as is Goldmark's, for in tance. Nor is he dramatic after the fashion of Liszt, whose choral music is sadly neglected. Historically, "Elijah" is the last of the so-called classical oratorios; one must consider the æsthetic perspective with all its implications.

But if the work is not commonplace the performance by the Oratorio Society Tuesday of last week was. It was something more. It was tiresome. Never has New York heard "Hear ye, Israel," sung, or rather declaimed, so badly. The engagement of Lilli Lehmann, by Frank Damrosch, was a mistake. The press next day informed him of that fact. Perhaps he realized it himself, and then again he may not have been able to help himself. Lehmann is a friend of the family. However, the argument holds good—Lehmann is not, never was suited to oratorio singing. And even with the little she had to do, the duo in the first part and the above mentioned solo, she failed, for her voice was in poor condition. The Oratorio Society has done some good work in its days, but now it is sadly in need of new blood. The same transfusion which the Philharmonic Society recently underwent may save the life of the almost moribund choral organization. Its rule seems to be to exclude members under the years of forty or over the years of eighty. White hairs predominate in the concerts, and, while there is something sentimentally touching in the sight of men and women grown old in the service of art, critical candor compels us to be cruel. New blood—else decay! It is the law of nature, and the officers of the Oratorio Society should consider the problem. If they do not the Musical Art Society will drive—are driving them out of existence. Noah's Ark needs new voices!

It is unnecessary to criticise Mr. Damrosch. He is doing the best he knows how, and it is doubtful if he thinks as highly of his own endowments as does THE MUSICAL COURIER. Some men are born to lead, and others have batons thrust upon them. Mr. Damrosch belongs to the latter unluckly class. Evan Williams sang with his accustomed finish, and Gwilym Miles distinguished himself by his artistic and fiery singing of Elijah. The ladies were Edith Chapman, who sang what Lehmann did not of the soprano part; Grace Tuttle, Isabel Bouton and Belle Newport. The evening was a social success, but, as Mr. Finck despairingly wrote, we cannot now escape our annual dose of "Elijah."

Dudley Buck Musicale.

IN honor of the elder Buck Mrs. M. H. McLewee, of Washington avenue, gave a musicale at her handsome home in Brooklyn last week, the following participating: Miss Maud Kennedy, soprano; Mrs. McLewee, contralto; Dudley Buck, Jr., tenor; Hugh Williams, baritone; Mr. Brown, basso, with F. W. Riesberg at the piano. Mrs. McLewee and Mr. Brown have been for some years members of Mr. Buck's choir in Trinity P. E. Church, Brooklyn, the latter nearly twenty-five years.

Mrs. McLewee's noble mezzo-soprano contralto was heard in the aria from "Samson," as well as in other songs, and her voice never sounded fresher. Hugh Williams, a pupil of Buck, Jr., made deep impression with his expressive voice, and Miss Kennedy's singing of the Polonaise from "Mignon" was a beautiful piece of coloratura. She has excellent control and a beautiful voice of much brilliancy. The veteran Brown sang as few men can who have behind them his years of musical activity can, and General McLewee was the life of the party.

FRANCIS ROGERS.—On December 4 Francis Rogers will give his first song recital of the season in Steinert Hall, Boston. The program will consist of four groups. The first will include classic songs of the "bel canto" school; the second will be devoted to German lieder, written by Brahms, Schubert, Schumann, Franz and Ries; the "Gypsy Songs" (op. 55) of Dvorák will constitute the third group; the fourth group will be made up of songs written by composers now living, French, English and American. Mr. Rogers will sing the same program in Mendelssohn Hall, New York, Tuesday afternoon, December 10, at 3 o'clock. His other professional engagements for the next three weeks are: Hartford, November 29 and 30; Pittsburg, December 7; Philadelphia, December 12.

THE RAVENS.

Too heavy seemed the fragrance of the fern,
And drowsed me; up the road from turn to turn
Sconces of white cohosh made altars green
And milky candled shrines of each ravine,
To drowse me; and the spirit, shrine to shrine,
Purple, or fawn, or unknown butterfly,
Fitting, they drowsed me. Weary of beauty, I,
Beauty that in the sun before the storm
From the rich mountains smiled too sweet and warm.
Harsh is the face of truth, I thought, and stern.
Release me, scented sorcery of the fern!
A little life, and masked with sleepy flowers!

And the storm rose, and changed the darkening bowers.
Cloud-shade and wind and thunder fell on me;
I took the rain like waking, I was free
Of those enchanted hands, awake, aware,
Exulting. Death was out and on the air;
And even in her flowers life abode,
Knowing her mate, his passing, he that rode
High on the dusk, a great voice with him blown.
I saw not those dark wings; I heard alone
The croak of passing ravens. Weird it fell,
And hoarse, and rusty, and like an old great bell
Tolled, and the dark grew on from height to height,
Clanged, and the dark seemed greater than the light,
Tolled, and I stood full stature, drawing breath,
Tolled, and I thought, I have heart to look on death,
Clanged, and I cried, O bold old godlike death!

—Joseph Russell Taylor, in July Atlantic.

HENRY K. HADLEY'S prize symphony, "The Four Seasons," will be played by the New York Philharmonic Society December 20 and 21.

A cable in last Sunday's Sun contained this news:

"LONDON, November 23.—Sir Thomas Lauder Brunton, the great medical authority, in an address here this week to the Medico-Psychological Association on 'Theories, Apparitions and Visions,' declared that nearly every one of these phenomena is traceable to mental causes. Visions are traceable to a peculiar class of disease, notably epilepsy.

"In his opinion the seer of biblical history was only an epileptic. Sodium salicylate used for rheumatism often had the same effect on the nerves. Certain forms of headache, especially megrim, produced peculiar zigzag apparitions, which in conjunction with excessive imagination he thought more accountable for fairies than anything. This zigzag appearance was to be found in Doré's drawings and in the spirits of Dante. The speaker believed that Doré was affected by the same disease, as he had likened the appearance of the spirit trains to these megrim apparitions.

"In Sir Thomas's opinion if Mohammed had been dosed with bromide of potassium when he had visions there would have been no Koran and no Mohammedism, for there seems to be little doubt that the visions were the result of physical disease."

This and more like it may be found in Lombroso's "Man of Genius." Epilepsy seems to be bracketed with genius by the spiders of scientific compilation. Lombroso gives the names of Jesus Christ, Mahommed, Napoleon, Pascal, Händel, Newton, Flaubert, Edgar Poe and others as epileptics, seers of visions. The most remarkable case is that of Fedor Dostïeffsky, whose books abound in references to epilepsy. In "The Idiot" his hero "throws fits" most dramatically. Like Poe, Dostïeffsky studied his own "case," and gave the world the results in his astounding novels. Still it staggers one to think of bromide of potassium as a quencher of genius. Joseph Smith and Mormonism might have never come to fruition, if the salt had been at hand. And Christian Science——!

More musicians have been epileptics or suffered from masked epilepsy than we dare admit. As music is an abnormal—say supernormal—art, as all great art is abnormal—for your so-called "sane art" is the dream of a placid bourgeois—its creators have been men who wrestled with their visions. Bromide of potassium would have saved us from the Seventh Symphony, from Angelo's "Last Judgment" and all of Rodin's desperate marbles. Here at last is the nostrum desired of parents who shudder at their artistic progeny. The moment your boy shows an inclination for color, clay, tone or letters administer small doses of the subtle drug, and in a few years you will have the satisfaction of seeing him a minister—if he is delicate—or a politician, mayhap a policeman, with a taste for rum and "primaries." But the art impulse will have vanished, and a sound citizen have been saved from destruction. Allah be praised! Great is thy name and the name of thy only prophet—Epilepsy!

"I'd rather live in Bohemia than any other land!" Isn't that a line from the late John Boyle O'Reilly? I remember this poet-athlete years ago. He was a king among men, as Walt Whitman described him to me. Good old Walt went for several summers to O'Reilly's country house on the water, near Boston somewhere. The pair were great chums. Touching on this Bohemia, I wonder where it is! I have skirted its coast for several years, yet never have I reached its interior. At times I could have sworn that I descried its tall towers in the sun—such a sun—and its forests and rivers beckoning green and silver to the tired eye of the wanderer. But, alas! it was only the faded cedar on some belated café Christmas tree, or else the tinny reflections from the soup tureens of Bowery kitchens. But the mirage was a pleasing one; it deceived me, as it had a million others, for it is born of the nostalgia of weak-nerved, imaginative persons. It needed no Berkeley to tell them that the world, the seemingly solid world, is an illusion. The poet, painter, musician and sculptor have little doubt of the reality of dreams; what is all art but dreamland, a lovely vision cunningly forged by the sixth sense, the dream organ? So Bohemia was built even before the Bible was, and I do not doubt that the man with prognathic jaw and flat skull, the man of Arvéde Barine, the cave dweller, the wielder of paleolithic weapons, and the swift runner, had, too, his Bohemia. To him it must have been a country of limitless stone hatchets, where the females crooned on tree tops and watched their men brain each other for dinner. Shakespeare's "coast of Bohemia" lies just beyond the breakers, and no boat has yet landed its passengers on its delectable strand. Perhaps the River Styx, its hither bank, may hide the true Bohemia. To reach it we are ferried across by the dread Charon, and then we have entered the promised place.

With fearful joy I first hunted for Bohemia in Paris many years ago. I found it, I always found it; but, like a dream, it would not abide. Either I hadn't a penny and the cafés seemed fairly brimming with the good things of life—wit, learning, liveliness and cheer—or else I sought with full pockets and heavy heart, and the illusory coast line had vanished. Many pretty allegories might be made about Bohemia, but disillusionment is in the end. Here we have no Bohemia unless cheap table d'hôtes, full of artists and newspaper men, may be called by that sacred joyful name. Henri Mürger and his gallant band would have been jailed in New York or else called swindlers. Perhaps they were! Chasing the elusive 5-franc animal is no more difficult than holding fast to its running mate, the dollar bill. As we worship money in America, Bohemia and the Bohemians are distasteful to us. John Jay Chapman calls Stevenson a precocious boy and Whitman a poetic tramp. He may be right; indeed, I think he is. Both men started for Bohemia early in life and both reached it: the one in Vailima, the other in Camden. Then we signalized the event by a brace of obituaries.

If I could but impress upon your memory the irremediable fact that art and business do not go hand in hand! Bohemia and Belgravia are leagues asunder. Pity, then, to hear the chorus of complaint, a chorus that forever dins in my cortical cells. It is no longer, "What must I do to be saved?" but "How much is in the profession?" Why, good heavens! have you no sense of the eternal proprieties, of the immitigable law of compensation? Art is a religion, not a speculation. The rich artist is a horrid contradiction. Either he is selling himself or his public. How can you expect all that life offers and more besides? In the old days the singer was given his lodging and broke glad bread with the servants. It was felt that his gifts were his riches, that he saw life with an enchanted eye and that some of this enchantment brooded over his speech. He was often called mad, and in sooth he was; but never mad enough to amass money as a squirrel does nuts, or a chattering ape hiding in its chops some scrap of fallen food. The artist was not yet magpie and monkey, and he sang all the better, saw fairer dreams and at night heard the stars sing in cosmical chorus, and across the firmament discerned flaming and sweetly colored shapes wing their angelic way. His Bohemia was skyward and not in the drab, dissipated province of café and stock market. Shame, shame on the covetousness of the artist whose art finds him poor and craving for the sleek content of the banker! Are you not already affluent in dreams? Do you not hear things for which those others would, if they could, throw money—like physic—to the dogs? Art is its own justification, its own reward. Beauty through a darkening veil allows the few faintly to discover her countenance. Then must we like ungrateful varlets leave her to carouse with Dives, to beg his favors, to envy him his fat and purple repose? Hitch your Bohemia to a star and be thankful on bended knee if the gods have anointed your eyelids. You can't be rich, but you can be an artist rich in imaginings and so fashion your own world. The artist is himself as the gods in his creative powers.

The woman question is one to be shunned. I say the question, not the theme itself; but I may more than recommend Laura Marholm's book, reviewed to death, yet a remarkable volume. Harry Thurston Peck admits this with reservations. Frau Marholm is a Scandinavian, and the women of the North must have been bound with iron social gyves to judge of the quality of their protestant literature. Ibsen, Bjornson, even Strindberg—whose crazy pendulum swings to the other extreme—are full of the heady polemics of the sex. Sex—why, one sickens of the subject after reading these problem plays and novels. To all American women between the ages of eighteen and eighty I say read Laura Marholm's "Studies in the Psychology of Woman." The dissatisfied ones, those who really believe all they read in the Woman's Page of the daily papers, may realize how much better off is the "Unquiet Sex"—this wonderful phrase is of Helen Watterson Moody's coining—in America. Little wonder there is a woman movement in Europe. For its psychology read Marholm. Best of all, here is a woman telling us secrets—secrets not to be captured by men never so watchful at the lips of the Sphinx that Defies. And it is a sad correction for masculine presumption, masculine vanity. We are only tolerated. I've known that for years; but here it is elevated to the dignity of a psychological system. These long-haired, soft-eyed animals, as Guy de Maupassant described them, are our true critics, weighing us ever in scales that are mortifyingly candid, excusing us if they love us, but after all only tolerating us, allowing the lord of creation to kneel in humble attitudes at the shrine, and rewarded in the end by toleration. Isn't it all lovely? And if this is the case on the Continent, where woman equality is yet a half-hatched dream, how is it in America, where she is queen, queen from kitchen to palace? I think Mrs. Marholm herself would be amazed, and mayhap after five years' residence here might write a book about the "Wrongs of Man." If I mistake not I reviewed her "Six Famous Women." That betrayed the writer's keenness of vision, the "Studies" reveal breadth of idea and judgments. Don't imagine she belongs to the "Shrieking Sisterhood." She loathes the noisy and unsexed crew. She is a woman, a defender of home and family. Tolstoy is the remote parent of both books, though Marholm has her own feminine point of attack, of view. No man may hope ever to understand women as does this woman. It was Zangwill, I think, who said that all women writers are of value, for do they not tell us the secrets of their sex? This is hardly polite, but it is true. When the "messages" of George Eliot and Charlotte Brontë have grown stale from usage—all truths breed rust after a time—their unconscious self-portraitures will preserve them from those giant moths, the critics. Certainly as literary artists, as makers of prose, they will not endure. Where is the Georges who builded her house of fame on the Sand? Where are the passionate "poetesses" of the sunken centuries?

The Marholm knows better than any envious male the limitation of woman as artist, politician and general beast of burden. In the admirable study of Mrs. Besant she writes: "She has always possessed the wholly feminine capacity of assimilating the most varied and incompatible mental food without disturbance or indigestion, and of giving it forth with a certain accuracy; her brain was like a photographic plate upon which the exposed picture is clearly and mechanically printed. These characteristics, the quick perception and exact repetition, are frequently praised by professors who examine feminine students, and many have declared that in eagerness for knowledge and ability to acquire it women excel men. It is undeniable that in these characteristics they excel most men; it would be a pity if most men excelled them, for these characteristics rest upon the lesser power and capacity for original thought, independent selection and deeper affinity to the appropriated idea; they depend upon a mechanical instead of an organic process."

This will not be a pleasing paragraph for many ambitious women; but it shows the writer's clear, inexpungable and unprejudiced argument. She girds with something approaching violence at the milk-and-water men of the day, declaring tha Woman's Emancipation is the result of some de ficiency in modern manhood. It is true that in mu sic there has never been a time when a big mascu line personality was more needed. Many of ou virtuosi are triflers with the merely pretty, our con posers given to decoration, to the embroidery tha emasculates. So far from Brahms being an impo tent dreamer, I should say that he was the last o the gruff German giants who went through thi Vale of Tears with old clothes, bad manners an great thoughts.

However, read Marholm, and draw your ow picture of what women should or should not be. charming woman told me that she once asked Jea de Reszké if he cared to sing Romeo or Trista with any particular singer. "I always sing to m ideal woman," replied the artist. And I fancy w all pursue that illuding composite. Goethe did. S did De Maupassant in "Fort comme le Mort"; an in his dryly humorous way Thomas Hardy describ a certain pursuit of "The Well Beloved." Is Sh after all, our coast of Bohemia? Then mankin from the torrid time of undifferentiated protozo has been frantically striving to acquire possessio of this fascinating territory.

"I'd rather live in Bohemia than any other land It is a gallant, a hopelessly beautiful wish, but t wish it is to confess failure. For what greater failu in life is there than the compassing of one's ow ideals?

"Admirers of the Austrian poet, Heinrich Hein will be glad to learn that a monument in Carra marble, by the Danish sculptor, Hasselriis, wa erected to-day over Heine's modest grave in Mon martre Cemetery. The erection of the monumen recently exhibited in Vienna, is due to the initiativ of the late Empress Elizabeth, and it will be forma ly unveiled at Montmartre on Sunday. The wor of the sculptor is favorably commented upon by Pa risian art critics. It is Heine as he appeared durin the latter period of his life. The head is bent forwa and the eyes are closed, as if in contemplation; th thin lips are compressed as if in pain, or about t emit some of the poet's wails of complaint or c blasphemy, but the forehead is broad and massiv Perhaps the most poignant criticism suggested b the Heine monument is that it scarcely conform with Heine's letter to Theophile Gautier, in whic the poet wrote: 'I hope when I am dead I shall no be represented emaciated and portrayed in beaut like a woman.'

"The placing of the monument on Heine's grav has aroused an outburst of indignation from Frenc Nationalists and Jewbaiters. Edouard Drumont the Libre Parole states that Victor Hugo, Balza Alfred de Vigny and Alfred de Musset still awa their statues, but Heinrich Heine, in his double c pacity of Jew and German, is more fortunate. Th Royalist reactionary Solcil in a leading editorial say 'Far better to have left Heine in utter forgetfulnes He was a man who for lucre dishonored his nativ land, and as a poet he heaped outrages on the men ory of Marie Antoinette, the martyr queen, and l used to beat his own wife with a stick every Monda morning.'"

Why not Shabbas morning? Why this sudde passion for exactitude on the part of a refined, u prejudiced chronicler! The above news was in th Paris letter of last Sunday's Tribune.

COPENHAGEN.

HOLBERGSGADE, No. 11,
OCTOBER 31, 1901.

AT the first Symphony concert by the orchestra of the Royal Opera House, last Friday night, October 25, Copenhagen's largest concert hall was filled to its utmost capacity by a highly intelligent audience, including the highest dignitaries of the state, the Government, the art societies and the musical profession. The orchestra was under its splendid leader, Johan Svendsen. It is no wonder that every seat in the house was taken long before the concert opened, when one stops to think what it meant to listen to such orchestral effects as Svendsen is capable of producing. And when Beethoven's "Eroica" was to be performed, it is readily understood that it would indeed border on a musical crime not to be there.

Beethoven's heroic masterpiece, which, by the way, in 1903 may look back on a hundred years of existence, sounded that evening as if the genius of the immortal master himself was present to inspire the orchestra and the conductor. We have now heard that symphony over and over again, and still every time one listens to it—and particularly so when it is in the hands of a man like Svendsen, with his poetical temperament—it abounds with new beauties, of which one never dreamed before, new realms of fantasie gleam through the score, new revelations of orchestral sounds tell us that we have not yet fully comprehended this monumental building of tones, this wonderful painting of sound, this never to be excelled, gigantic poem of ideal heroism. This symphony does not picture the young, reckless fool rushing to the front without any other thought in his mind than the comment in the papers the next morning; no! It is the ideal heroism, the picture of the stern, self-sacrificing man of deep thought, who knows he has to offer his life for his cause, his thoughts, and who does it in a sublime, awe inspiring, dignified manner, a manner which stands out in the broad daylight as a beacon light shines in a dark night. In his symphony Beethoven shows to the still only half awakened world of music what the orchestra of the future will be, and, I dare say, the way the master has played upon his grand instrument has never not even by himself been excelled, and in all probability never will nor can. Even if Beethoven, after the finishing of "Eroica," has produced other works of equal greatness as, for instance, the Ninth, it is a known fact that the composer himself always placed this third symphony as his greatest orchestral composition, and it will remain to the world forever as the most sublime witness of his powers of creative genius.

It was played with such spirit, such wealth of imagination as only a man with the stamp of genius upon his brow can make an orchestra sound, and it was received by the critical audience with loud acclamations and several recalls for the eminent conductor.

After the symphony, as the second orchestral number on the program came the now, I am sorry to say, almost forgotten Overture to the opera "Anacreon," or, as it also is called, "L'amour fugetif," by the French-Italian master of the Rococo style, Cherubini. The opera, which treats of the myth of the old Grecian poet, whose poems and songs were chiefly written and composed to the glorification of Venus and Bacchus, and who was celebrated about the sixth century before Christ, is, as already mentioned, now almost forgotten save the Overture, which is a virtuoso piece for the orchestra. For this last mentioned quality alone, it will undoubtedly long keep its place on good concert program, but besides that it is a most extraordinary piece of construction, and gives an orchestra more opportunity to exhibit its own individuality than most noisy, modern compositions. It was played in a transparent manner, and created a wonderful impression upon those listeners, who do not require mere noise to appreciate music.

One of Denmark's greatest violinists, Prof. F. Hilmer, has left a vacant place in this for magnificent violinists justly celebrated city.

October 29 the Cecelia Society gave a concert to celebrate its fiftieth anniversary. It was organized by H. Rung, the father of the present conductor, Frederik Rung, for the sole purpose of singing the old, pure Italian church music of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. They have done some splendid work worth copying in all cities.

AUGUST HYLLESTED.

Jessie Shay Plays in Pittsburg

SPACE will prevent us from republishing all of the Pittsburg criticisms in this issue which Miss Jessie Shay, the pianist, received on her last appearance with the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra last Friday and Saturday. The pianist played the Moszkowski Concerto in E major. We append several of the criticisms:

All the patrons of the Pittsburg Orchestra concerts do not like solo pianists, and that perhaps accounts for a number of absentees among the season subscribers at the third concert of the season last night. But they did not know the kind of an artist that was coming. Miss Jessie Shay was a name new to them, and she arrived without much heraldry. She achieved such a flawless triumph, however, that many of those who missed the concert last night will be at Carnegie Music Hall this afternoon, and when Miss Shay comes again she will have a rare audience. In addition to the soloist there is a thoroughly attractive concert with a symphony that is not hard to understand and a thoroughly delightful suite.

But Miss Shay was the feature. She is an American girl who has no eccentricities of manner. When she appears on the stage she looks rather slight and gives no promise of the great strength she shows in her playing. Her attack is that of one positive as to her ability, and her lucidity and clean technic are something to make one marvel. Every note of the most difficult passage is as clear cut as can be, and withal she shows a keen, appreciative temperament that gives her versatile expression.

She has had the benefit of the training of Moszkowski, and it was his concerto that she played. Perhaps it was oft-traveled ground for her, but at any rate all its melody and all its trying moments for solo work were brought out by Miss Shay. She showed the same thoroughness in the Liszt "Liebestraum" and in Mendelssohn's exquisite "Spring Song." Both times she was ecstatically encored, and unquestionably won the friendship of all present.—Pittsburg Dispatch, November 23, 1901.

All honor to beautiful Jessie Shay for her brilliant work at the piano last night in the third concert of the Pittsburg Orchestra season. While opinion may be divided as to the artistic standard of her solo efforts in the second part of the program, none will deny that in the Moszkowski Concerto she fully justified the tribute of enthusiastic approval bestowed upon her, and showed herself a conscientious, withal a superb artist. Technical difficulties of no mean degree met her at every turn in this work. Yet with a facility and virility absolutely astonishing she vanquished them all, sacrificing not one jot in brilliancy of execution, even to the chord closing the final movement.

To tell the truth, her playing was a revelation, and enjoyable, really enjoyable, in the extreme. Its feature was crystalline transparency, so decided and so marked as to attract instant attention. Her auditors will recall with keen delight those pearly scales, those limpid runs in double thirds, and those polished interlocking octaves and chords, knotty with terrifying chromatics. Musicianship of high order was evident in her arpeggio passages, from which steadily flowed melody, clear cut and unmistakably beautiful. How easy it would have been here to blur and blot! Of the four movements of the concerto, the scherzo and allegro deciso pleased most, the former fairly captivating its listeners. A magnificent Wissner grand, yielding a singing tone, at times almost human, no doubt aided Miss Shay in her triumph, while a splendid orchestral accompaniment by Mr. Herbert, notably in the ringing climaxes, rounded out a delightful performance. More power to Jessie Shay, the ambitious American artist! She certainly has won high favor in Pittsburg.—The Pittsburg Post, November 23, 1901.

In addition to an attractive orchestral program at the concert given last evening by the Pittsburg Orchestra in Carnegie Music Hall, there was a splendid soloist. The performance of Miss Jessie Shay, pianist, was somewhat of a surprise. Before the evening was far spent she had demonstrated that she was an artist of no mean calibre. It was a decided triumph for Miss Shay, as her encores were more numerous than are usually bestowed upon a soloist. A fine soloist, an orchestra fresh from a successful tour and in excellent form, made the concert as much of a success as any this season.

Miss Shay was really the centre of attraction. At first appearance it would seem impossible for such a dainty little creature to bring out the grand passages to be found in the works she performed. She had not touched the first key, however, until this doubt was dispelled. Deceptive in appearance, she performs with a roundness that is surprising. From the sound of pattering rain drops to a peal of thunder, a dainty trill or wonderful combination, seems but a trifle to Miss Shay. The Moszkowski Concerto was new to Pittsburg, and to Miss Shay belongs the honor of introducing it to this country. It is truly a work of art both in the opportunities given to the piano and orchestra. There are few places where both are not heard. In the dainty movements Miss Shay seemed in her element, they appearing to be best adapted to her natural temperament. Her performance showed a fine technic and coloring and at all times she was at ease. She is a typical American girl and her charming personality adds greatly to her ability to entertain an audience. Throughout the concert she showed a keen appreciation of the works she interpreted.—Pittsburg Leader, November 23, 1901.

Miss Jessie Shay, pianist, made a decidedly favorable impression last evening at the concert of the Pittsburg Orchestra in Pittsburg Carnegie Music Hall. She was applauded when she came on the stage for her first number and was encored at the close of it, the handclapping being so prolonged that she finally played a brilliant little bit from Moszkowski. She is quite a young girl, decidedly pretty and graceful in every movement, and she was beautifully gowned. She has a style and technic that have not been surpassed by any of the young pianists heard in Pittsburg. Her touch was light, clear and accurate, and, while her forte passages were executed with a strength that brought out their full meaning, her piano passages were beautifully distinct, and the trills and runs were smooth and sparkling. Last night was her first appearance with the orchestra, although she has been heard in Pittsburg before.

Miss Shay's first number, Moszkowski's Concerto for piano and orchestra, had not been heard here before, and had only been given in the United States a few times. It is an immensely difficult work, with many brilliant and showy passages for piano. Miss Shay has probably the credit for its introduction in America, she having played the solo part twice recently in New York. For her closing numbers Miss Shay played the Liszt lullaby, "Liebestraum," and Mendelssohn's "Spring Song."—Pittsburg Times, November 23, 1901

Miss Jessie Shay was the bright particular star of the third orchestra concert last evening at Carnegie Music Hall. The audience was not as large as on former occasions, but in this the patrons of the concert made a mistake, for Miss Shay demonstrated that her art is almost perfect, and the various numbers of the program allotted to her were played with a skill and lucidity of expression that give her appropriate rank with the greatest artists heard in this city. In Moszkowski's Concerto she indicated the full force of her power in the difficult solo work, while in Mendelssohn's beautiful "Spring Song" the delicacy of her phrasing was admirably brought out. The orchestra program was admirably arranged and executed, and the evening's performance was as a whole the most enjoyable of the season.—Pittsburg Chronicle Telegraph, November 23, 1901.

Golden Rule a Means of Advertisement.

THE day when trickery and meanness were helpful in developing one's business has passed away and the time has come when business men may apply the rules of Christianity and find them helpful. When a man achieved a certain amount of success by dishonorable means he found that failure followed. The success was short lived, because the public soon discovered his trickery and ceased its patronage. Then he learned that if he desired to achieve a lasting success he must deal fairly, honestly and righteously. And these alone were not enough To be successful it was necessary to train himself to be patient under trials, to be accommodating, to be generous hearted and all the things that are required in moral precepts In other words, the business man discovered that his early Sunday school training was the very sort of training which was useful in his business.

Now, while it is true that the business man made these discoveries some time ago, the musician—at least the Washington musician—has not yet reached this stage of progress. He—that is most of him—is still hobbling along in an antiquated rut, because he has not learned what a splendid idea the Golden Rule is from a business standpoint. "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you." How many composers are there in Washington who perform the compositions of another Washington composer? How many teachers admit that there is any merit whatever in any other teacher of the same branch? How many concert-givers become concert-goers when their brother musicians are in charge of the stage?

But the composer argues: "I can't play the compositions of my contemporary. They are bad. In fact, awful." Rubinstein said worse of Brahms, but Rubinstein was wrong, you see. He just had a little of that blind narrowness which so often shows itself in man—especially man in politics. The partisan who is unable to see the other side of the question is merely narrow minded.

It has been shown that a common fault in man is partiality to his own work. If he makes a few mistakes, he will overlook them, but he will not overlook those same mistakes when made by another. Now as he is always overrating himself, he should learn in a few years to make a mathematical discount on all of his own productions, which should equal the mental aberration caused by conceit. After he has marked one of his own compositions at 100 per cent., or perfect, and someone else's at 50 per cent., or poor, and has afterward noticed that others received the two compositions with equal favor, he should acknowledge that his mental wheels were not in order and should try to mend them by the aforesaid mathematical rule. If he were a sensible man he would then say to himself whenever he listened to the compositions of other living composers: "I'm 50 per cent. out of the way, eh? Then this disgusting rubbish which I am listening to must be as good as my own."

Or if he were a singing teacher he would say: "The pupils of my neighbor here sing like frogs. But then I am a little narrow minded and have not looked for any good points in his teaching. Probably he thinks my pupils sing like goats."

You see how nice and happy it would all come out if the Washington musicians would lay aside their little quarrels and disagreements and devote themselves to helping each other.

The 'cellist would begin to play the pianist's compositions, and the pianist would return the compliment. Every Washington composer of merit would have his pieces played ten times instead of one. Then the teachers would form combinations to help each other. A number of piano teachers could combine, and each agree to teach a certain branch of piano playing. One man for technic, one for interpretation, one for sight playing, &c., each one taking the part best suited to his talents. Then they would all recommend each other instead of cutting each other's throats. The concert musicians would form a combination to quash these measly clubs here that are always begging their services gratis, and each one would try to help everyone else.

Amy Law gave a pleasing recital at her studio last Tuesday. She was assisted by Florence Stevens, violin, and Florence Wieser, 'cello. Mrs. Frank Byram and Miss Moxon were at the piano. Miss Law's selections were well received, especially a group of light songs, one of which was Allitsen's "Love Is a Bubble," in which the writer of the words informs us that man is a "dead leaf." One of the best characteristics of Miss Law's voice is its flexibility, and the ease with which the high notes are taken. "Don Juan's Serenade," by Tschaikowsky, was one of the most attractive numbers on the program, and the accompaniment was beautifully played by Miss Moxon. There were trios for piano, violin and 'cello, which were well done, with the exception of the "Anitra's Dance" arrangement, in which the players did not always keep together. There were also solos by Miss Stevens and Miss Wieser, all very creditably rendered. Mrs. Byram played a Chopin Waltz, which gave an opportunity for the display of admirable delicacy of touch in the soft passages. The tone of the instrument was forced in the louder parts, however, and the performance could have been improved upon had they been played with a little less vigor.

All who missed the Lent concert at the New Willard Hotel last Wednesday will be obliged to wait some time before they will again have the opportunity of listening to a baritone singer equal to Heinrich Meyn, the assisting artist. Mr. Meyn is undoubtedly a great singer. If you do not believe it observe the perfect equality of his rounded tones; high and low alike, the fine control of breath power, which enables him to start a long sustained tone softly, and then gradually swell it to a louder and then softer sound, without apparent exertion; and notice also the rapid changes of loud to soft and fast to slow tone, giving life and vitality to his interpretations. Then last of all glance at the program and notice his selections—not many novelties to be sure, but all good numbers that are enjoyable. Some there are by Schumann, Schubert and Spicker. After all though it is more in the manner of singing than in the songs themselves.

Ernest Lent, who plays the 'cello, made his instrument sing, too. His tones have the same spellbinding effect as Mr. Meyn's baritone voice. They swell and diminish and throb with intensity. Mr. Lent's principal piece was Georges Goltermann's Concerto in B minor, with Mrs. Lent at the piano. The first theme in a minor key is succeeded by a beautiful singing melody. One attractive passage consists of successive secondary seventh chords, and the concerto ends with a bright major movement. Then too, it contains many difficult passages, with octaves and sixths. A concerto must always be "hard" to play in order to be successful, and Mr. Lent was equal to the difficulties.

Mrs. Lent's numbers were of the light florid order, which gave an opportunity for that delicacy and daintiness of touch in which she excels. She can play heavy chords with good effect, but her pieces did not give her a chance to display this side of her art. The little pieces by Grieg were charming. She also played two of Mr. Lent's compositions, "Lampyre" and "Sobieski." Of the two, the last named, which is published by John Ellis & Co., was the most pleasing. It is warlike in character and is probably named after the famous Polish family. It is distinctly orchestral in conception and needs the roll of the drum and the full orchestra for the first theme, and an oboe solo in some parts of the contrasting second theme, to bring out the full effect of the composition. Where there are two distinct voices, two instruments of different tone color would enhance its value. Henry Xander played the accompaniments in his best style.

Miss Amy Leavitt has some excellent ideas in the line of musical talks.

Henry Meyer, a zither player, from Philadelphia, will be heard at one of the De Koven musicales.

Miss Mary A. Cryder, whose concerts were so successful last year, is arranging another course for this season.

ISEF HOFMANN'S FIRST PIANO RECITAL.

THE size of the audience at Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon put to shame any lurking suspicion at the interest in piano recitals was declining. The occasion was Josef Hofmann's first appearance here this season in a recital program:

riations, F minor.....Haydn
ata Appassionata.....Beethoven promptu, G major.....Schubert rée de Vienne, D major.....Schubert lade, A flat major.....Chopin lude, op. 45.....Chopin se, op. 64, No. 3.....Chopin omenreigen.....Liszt chtstück in F.....Schumann gleur.....Moszkowski
apsodie, No. 2.....Liszt

How much this young artist has improved since his last ar's work was apparent in the Haydn Variations, where at the very outset showed a charm of manner and ace of one in hearty sympathy with that tuneful period, th not a trace of brusqueness; it was a naïve composin, naïvely played.

With the Beethoven Sonata the player's difficulties inased a hundredfold, and he did not appear at his happst until the short but furious presto was made to ring t under those fleet and firm fingers, flexible and enring wrists.

In the elegiac Impromptu there sung a strain of sentient which appealed mightily; and it was offset comtely by the following brilliant "Soirée de Vienne"; the ter Hofmann played with a verve which displayed the unted Viennese spirit in its sprightliest.

A set of Chopin selections next came under his fingers d were accorded rather pretty readings; not too much the sentiment—Hofmann does not lean that way—but ore with breadth and understanding. The C sharp nor Prelude gave him an opportunity to display the orough subjugation of his wonderful left hand, the one ich during strenuous episodes shows such remarkable eed and surety. He played the little valse with unafted good nature, fighting very shy of "conservatory efts," or even the usual feminine interpretation.

He succeeded in the Liszt "Gnomenreigen" of calling an atmosphere of the tricksy mystic by controlling eashis dynamic forces, and played the Schumann number bly—a trifle more manly than the usual way, but if this an error it at least is one in the right direction. Moszwski's "Jongleur," with its Chopin echoes, went brilntly, and the concluding Liszt Rhapsody he kept well hand until the climax, when he made telling effects at oint at which most players show fatigue.

But the most tremendous part of his recital was yet to ne. It was the list of encores. A Liszt transcription Alabieff's "The Nightingale" showed that the player l a whole sleeveful of unused trumps, and when the lience began to suspect this the demand for extra nums threatened to exceed the length of the original proum. So closely upon the heels of this difficult "Nightgale" thundered the Schubert-Tausig Marche Militaire, ich was literally marched through with not a sign of ng. And to continued applause came the best selection the entire recital, the bonne bouche of the afternoon—izt's tremendous "Mephisto Walzer." Hofmann played s huge work with understanding and a display of techthat was marvelous. His youth seemed to disappear the composition unraveled, one felt that in his place a mature man of inexhaustible strength and unfathomable feeling who was reading big meanings into this vast work.

With this performance Hofmann deepened the impression made earlier in the afternoon, and left no doubt in the minds of the listeners of his great powers of execution and interpretation, coupled with a versatility practically boundless. With these he has earned his own place in the list of pianists. And when his age is taken into consideration the possibilities seem vast.

Tew's Successes Continue.

H. WHITNEY TEW, the distinguished basso, sang twice last week. Once with the Brooklyn Institute and also with the Century Club in Buffalo. At both recitals he was enthusiastically received. The following are excerpts from the Brooklyn papers, after his recital before the Institute:

Mr. Tew has, in his voice, an instrument of very wide range of power or of sweetness at will in any register chosen, and his repertory is a wide one. That for which Mr. Tew will be long remembered by those who heard—and heard with understanding—his singing last evening was "In Memoriam." Mr. Tew rose to the occasion. He gave to the soft and meditative passages the requisite tenderness, his voice sinking to almost a whisper, yet distinctly giving the words of the poet. In the passages where Tennyson carried sustained thought and the musical composer strove to express the thought musically, Mr. Tew was delicate and conscientious, and in the conclusion, where the appeal to the Deity was made, the singer had quite the grand air. There was an outburst of applause at the conclusion.—Eagle, November 14.

Whitney Tew's renderings left no doubt that he is a singer of pronounced ability.

Mr. Tew is an American who has been trained as a concert singer abroad and who has won popularity in London. He has a bass voice of unusual range, agreeable in tone and of good carrying power. His singing of "In Memoriam" was a fine bit of interpretation. * * * Mr. Tew's enunciation is exceptionally distinct, and he has learned the art of bringing out the meaning of the text.—Brooklyn Times, November 14.

The following extracts are from reports on his New York recital:

The singer has a fine bass voice, very smooth, rich and with a lower register that has unusual resonance. He sings with taste. * * * The numbers on the program—classic, romantic and folksongs—were all sung with good diction.—New York World.

(Regular Telegraphic Correspondence of the Public Ledger, New York, November 11.)

Mr. Tew enunciates with extraordinary clearness, every word being as distinct as if spoken by a trained elocutionist. His principal selection was a song cycle, by Liza Lehmann, the words being taken from Tennyson's "In Memoriam," and gave proof of Mr. Tew's power in a composition calling for a high level of sustained emotion.—Philadelphia Ledger, November 12, 1901.

SUCCESS.—"Nothing succeeds like success." This oft quoted axiom has never been better illustrated than by the growth of the Townsend H. Fellows Church Choir Exchange. Having realized the necessity for an institution where assistance could be rendered church musicians who desired positions, Mr. Fellows started this branch of his business in 1897. Since that time its growth has been so phenomenal that to-day it stands pre-eminent among institutions of its kind. A great measure of this success is no doubt due to the fact that only a nominal sum is charged upon enrollment, and no commissions of any kind are exacted from those who secure positions through its assistance. Many of the most prominent soloists in the different churches of this city and elsewhere, and a whole host of less prominent ones are indebted to Mr. Fellows' Exchange for their advancement.

THE LAMPERTI SCHOOL IN PARIS.

WE understand that a successful opening took place of the vocal school of Madame Lamperti in Paris, which is located at 14 bis Rue Jadin, near the Parc Monceau. In this school not only vocal lessons are given, and vocal studies in the various languages, but Italian, French and German diction are also taught. The price for instruction is 500 francs monthly, which includes board, or, as they call it over there, pension.

Madame Lamperti is the widow of the late Francesco Lamperti, of Milan, the teacher of Albani, of Campanari, of Sembrich, of Galassi and others, and she, of course, has become imbued with all of the various methods of that renowned school, one of the greatest schools of singing that the world has had. Madame Lamperti is herself a highly educated lady, a woman of the world, an intelligent teacher and an experienced musician and singer. Pupils who place themselves under her care will receive the best kind of and most modern vocal education.

Philadelphia Students Play for Charity.

FRIDAY evening, November 22, some of the advanced pupils and the Students' Symphony Orchestra of the Broad Street Conservatory, Philadelphia, gave a concert at Musical Fund Hall, under the auspices of the Germantown Door of Hope. The orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Combs, the director, is always a feature of the Conservatory concerts. The precision and ensemble of their playing accounts for the services of its members being so much in demand in professional orchestras. The violin soloist, Mr. Witzemann, received quite an ovation. His playing, always artistic, is growing broader and more mature, his bowing and intonation are flawless. Miss Louise de Ginther, who has been under the personal instruction of Mr. Combs for a number of years, was the piano soloist, and played the Schumann A minor Concerto in an effective manner. She also played, without the orchestra, a nocturne by her instructor, Mr. Combs, and the F sharp Etude de Concert, by MacDowell. Miss De Ginther is a most carefully trained and conscientious player whose performance shows that she uses her brains as well as her fingers. She possesses discrimination and plenty of contrast in her playing. The vocalists, Miss Ruth Kedzie Wood and Miss Julia Davenport, both pupils of Herbert Wilbur Greene, the head of the vocal department of the Conservatory, were delightful singers to listen to.

Miss Wood, a soprano of the dramatic type, showed her rare voice to excellent advantage in the Cavatine from the "Queen of Sheba." This young woman has one of the few voices that can be classed as brilliant, with none of the disagreeable qualities that are usually associated wtih that much overworked word.

She required an orchestra as a background to fully reveal her depth.

Miss Davenport possesses a charming mezzo-soprano voice, combined with a personality so winning that her audience was in sympathy with her at once and her second number was enthusiastically encored.

ARNOLD SOMLYO'S MUSICALE.—Arnold Somlyo gave a musicale last evening (Tuesday) at the Baldwin studios in Carnegie Hall, in honor of Mme. Lisa Delhaze Wickes, pianist; Miss Gertrude von Betz, pianist; Miss Katharine Pelton, mezzo soprano; Mrs. Minnie Humphryes, soprano; Miss Henriette Weber, pianiste; Charles Russell, 'cellist, and Alfred D. Wickes, violinist.

THERE is nothing to be considered at this time but grand opera. The very air is charged with it, the society bud dreams of it in connection with the latest creation in gowns, the musician has been saving for his seat in the topmost gallery for months agone, the Wagnerian, student and past master, is laving his soul in the "atmosphere" that is so dear to him. In short, we are all enjoying this once-a-year treat to the top of our bent. To say that we miss Nordica would be putting the situation very mildly.

Of course, the "Ring" has not been attempted in its entirety, but we have had the "Walküre" and Reuss-Belce, and she did a good piece of work. Reuss-Belce's voice has a beautiful warm quality and she uses it well. As Elizabeth she was ideal all through. Her voice grew on one as the opera continued, and before her last solo was finished the audience was hers. She was certainly as lovely to look upon as one could possibly wish. Mr. Van Dyke in the title role did not create an enthusiastic impression. Fritzi Scheff made a pretty picture as Ein Hirt and played her pipe in the most convincing manner, alternating with a voice of such sweet bird-like quality it makes a welcome foil to the heavier music. Miss Scheff is a great favorite in 'Frisco. For the other parts, they were taken by Mr. Blass, Mr. Bars, Mr. Reiss, Mr. Muhlmann and Mr. Vivianni.

The Pollard Company of Juveniles at the Tivoli are making a decided hit. They are a clever lot of children and the dramatic ability displayed is astonishing in such babies, as many of them are. Indeed, the oldest girl in the troupe is not more than fourteen, and is possessed of a sweet soprano voice, fortunately unspoiled by the constant demands made upon it. The children are being wisely trained, and one takes the greater pleasure in the performance for this knowledge. "The Belle of New York," which they played last week, gave an opportunity to display the talent which seems to be pretty evenly distributed among the tiny performers, and many of the solos won much deserved applause. This week they are playing "The Gaiety Girl," and despite the grand opera are doing a good business.

The 114th recital of the Sacramento Saturday Club took place in the club's rooms on Saturday last with a fine attendance and the usual good program for which the club is noted. The director for the day was Mrs. C. G. Stever, and those who took part were Mrs. E. A. Gilbert, Chas. Stickney, Mr. and Mrs. C. G. Stever, Mrs. L. C. Farrer, Misses Charlotte Shepstone, Florine Wenzel, Eda M. Quire, Lulu Yoerk, Helen Howe, Mrs. Emil Steinmann, Miss Maud Blue, Miss Rosina Rosin, Mrs. Albert Elkus, in a Hungarian Fantaisie, in which the second piano accompaniment was taken by her son, Albert I. Elkus.

Miss Jessie Foster, the vocal teacher, now of Oakland, gave a song recital in Stockington Friday of last week, assisted by some of her pupils. There was a fine program, and Mr. Kerrick, a basso cantante of extraordinary sweetness; and Miss Cora Turner had a big success. The program was as follows:

Ballatella (Pagliacci).....Leoncavallo
Miss Jessie Foster.
Gipsy Love Song.....Herbert
Encore, Stein Song.....——
Walter Kerrick.
Irish Folk Song.....Foote
Serenade.....Nevin
The Lass with the Delicate Air.....Arne

The second of the Hopkins Institute concerts for the fall exhibition of water colors was given on Thursday evening under the direction of Sir Henry Heyman. The participants were Miss Lillian Slinkey, soprano; Robert Bonner, baritone; George Goette, cornet, and Emil Cruels, organist and accompanist.

Gounod's "Faust" was given in San José last Friday as an oratorio, and met with great success. The program was under the direction of James Hamilton Howe, and the different characters were taken by Homer Barnhart, Mary Weaver McCauley, Algernon Aspland, Mrs. McMillin, Mrs. Cummings, Mr. Stark, and Mr. McColl, pianist. The success of the performance has led to a consideration of its repetition.

Little Enid Brandt is still meeting with success in h piano recitals at Sherman-Clay Hall. HAROLD BAUER has just finished giving a series recitals in Holland, playing in Amsterdam, T Haguc, Rotterdam and Utrecht. He played to full hou everywhere, and at the last recital at The Hague there w an outburst of cheering and unique demonstration on t part of the public. From Holland he goes to London, th to Manchester, England, where he plays the Brahms Co certo with Richter, after which he plays in Bordeau Lyons, Marseilles and Paris. Dates for his American tour beginning January are bei booked fast and most favorably, and it is altogether fi to see that this great pianist is so thoroughly appreciat here, in Europe, and in fact in every country in which plays. The artistic complement of Bauer's wonderf nature is the Mason & Hamlin piano. During Bau recent tour in Spain the excitement was so great at t concerts at Barcelona and Madrid that after the conce in Madrid the students unhitched the horses of Bauer's c riage and drew him to the hotel themselves.

Feilding Roselle.

MISS FEILDING ROSELLE, the mezzo-contralto, has filled important engagements during the past year. oth in town and out of town this intelligent artist has ceived favorable notices from the leading critics. Many call her success last spring with the Boston Festival Orhestra in the music festivals given at Syracuse, Harrisrg, Springfield, Richmond, Spartanburg, Columbia, Charte, Champaign, Newburyport, Salem, Clinton, North dams, Ann Arbor, Saginaw and Oberlin. During this ur she sang in "Elijah," "St. Paul," "Golden Legend," Samson and Delilah," Händel's "Samson," "Odysseus," Crusaders," Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and Dvorák's Stabat Mater," in addition to her regular concert work. e append some of her recent criticisms:

Feilding Roselle, one of the best known of the local mezzo-contos, was heard in concert yesterday afternoon at Sherry's. Miss selle sang arias by Gluck and Meyerbeer to reveal her possession the dramatic style, and was heard in more intimate numbers by humann, Schubert, Goring Thomas, Massenet, Nevin, Löwe and orák. In all of these Miss Roselle revealed the sympathy and preciation which, combined with a voice of natural beauty, make singer capable of giving much enjoyment. Her natural gifts have en well trained, and she is always certain to be listened to with easure. Her dramatic interpretation of the various phases of the gs was one feature in which she was conspicuously successful. New York Sun.

A feature of the afternoon's program was Miss Roselle's renderg of a charming number. This young artist possesses a voice of liciously fresh quality, which she handles with rare skill. Her unciation is remarkable for its clarity, and her intonation sure d full of the klang that marks the well placed voice. The work Miss Roselle has been a conspicuous ornament to the New York ncert platform for several seasons.—Harper's Bazar.

Miss Roselle is a Southern woman, being a native of Mississippi. ost of her life has been spent in Washington, in which city her cle of friends is very large. She has a voice of rare quality and eat range. Whether in oratorio or in simple ballads, she always lds her hearers.—New York Evening Telegram.

Miss Roselle's beautiful voice and dramatic style were revealed arias by Gluck and Meyerbeer, and the singer was also heard in gs by Schumann, Schubert, Goring Thomas, Massenet, Nevin, we and Dvorák, certainly a variety of composers and schools. e versatility of the singer proved a little short of marvelous.—w York Musical Courier.

Miss Roselle's fine contralto voice was heard to great advantage, owing much dramatic strength. Indeed, one of her most agreee qualities is the dramatic force with which all of her songs are ndered. She likewise possesses an agreeable personality, which eals to her audience. Miss Roselle sang Gluck's aria, "Divinités Styx," with a wealth of vocal coloring. A group of modern gs, seven in number, were all splendidly given by Miss Roselle. e magnificent depths of her voice were revealed in the rendition "How Deep the Slumber of the Floods."—Washington, D. C., st.

Miss Roselle has a contralto voice, sweet toned and highly culed. She sings with much dramatic force.—Washington, D. C., r.

Her vocal compass is extensive. Her tone is full, round, resonant l ample in power, and her skill in the emission and control of it such as to make her singing very agreeable.—Syracuse Postndard.

There is a depth of tenderness in the full, rich tones of her voice, l the audience displayed its appreciation.—Syracuse Evening rald.

A powerful, nay, tremendous voice, as is hers, always appeals to audience, which demonstrated the truth of this assertion by vocifus plaudits.—Springfield Union.

Miss Roselle has a firm contralto voice of unusual power. Her on the psalm "Return, O God of Hosts," showed her to be a fine artist with a magnificent real contralto voice.—Spartanburg Daily Herald.

Miss Roselle is one of the best contralto singers who have been heard in several years. Her voice, while powerful, is of a velvety sweetness that is rarely heard.—Richmond Times.

She sang with the feeling suggested by her theme, but sang so sweetly that there was no touch of the mechanical to mar the genuine pleasure she gave to all who heard her. Of the qualities of her voice, its richness may be accounted its best. But it is the richness of nature which has only been increased by art—by the assiduous culture which her singing shows.—Columbia State.

Miss Roselle proved her timbre in the next number, "Fac ut Portem." The selection requires volume, range and dramatic qualities. She was equal to the demands and scored a distinct success. —Charlotte (N. C.) Daily Observer.

She has a rich, vibrant voice of unusual range. She sings with warmth, and is especially happy in her rendering of dramatic compositions. She was assured of appreciation of her work by enthusiastic applause.—Charlotte (N. C.) News.

Miss Roselle has a sweet contralto voice, which seemed made to sing the difficult composition she yesterday rendered. She combines a pleasing stage presence with remarkable vocal talent, and won herself an enviable place in the hearts of her hearers yesterday.—Harrisburg (Pa.) Patriot.

Her tones were clear and pure, and back of them was a power that in the more dramatic passages was in evidence.—Newburyport (Mass.) Herald.

The remarks lsat Friday evening were upon the subjects, "Why Class Instruction Is Superior" and the steps taken in the first lesson were spoken of and illustrated. He will continue Friday evening, December 6, step by step, as the work should be given. Illustrations of advanced technic were also given by a class.

It is interesting as well as enjoyable to listen to these pupils' recitals, to watch the progress made by the introduction of true educational principles into the study of music; the purity of tone and the intelligent conception of the different compositions consequent.

The pupils at this recital had the assistance of Victor Baillard, baritone, and his magnificent voice was heard to good advantage, particularly in the Toreador Song from "Carmen," which compelled an encore. In the first songs was an original composition sung from manuscript, "'Tis All That I Can Say," written by Wm. G. Hammond, organist of the Washington Avenue Baptist Church, Brooklyn, who accompanied Mr. Baillard in all his selections. This was one of the gems of the evening and was enthusiastically received.

Clara A. Korn's Compositions.—Clara A. Korn's compositions are becoming more and more popular. Her "Waltz Caprice" (the Waldorf-Astoria), for orchestra, which the composer dedicated to Sorosis, is one of the regular numbers at the Astoria concerts conducted by Arthur Clappe. Mrs. A. Marie Merrick, the pianist, played Mrs. Korn's Barcarolle at Buffalo and Salamanca a few weeks ago, and the same pianist will play it again next week at Washington. Mrs. Korn's new Suite for violin and piano were played at the Manuscript musicale last Wednesday night by Miss Braun and Miss Cuyler. Mrs. Korn played last evening (Tuesday) at a musicale given by the Tuesday Musicale Club, of East Orange, N. J. A number of her compositions were included on the program.

MUSICAL COURIER OFFICES—FINE ARTS BUILDING.

CHICAGO, November 21, 1901.

CHARLES W. CLARK TO SOJOURN IN PARIS

CHARLES W. CLARK, the eminent baritone, whom the West claims with pride, and whom the East does not fail to admire, to-day announced to a representative of THE MUSICAL COURIER his intention of spending the next two seasons in Paris. This decision is due to no lack of love for America, but rather to a desire to visit Europe and enjoy its artistic atmosphere; to become more familiar with its characteristics and traditions.

What Chicago will do without Mr. Clark in the meantime is a question which his many enthusiastic pupils, sincere friends and concert going admirers will shun, while the congregation which receives inspiration through his singing each Sunday at Studebaker Hall, Fine Arts Building, will find it well-nigh impossible to replace him at the end of the present season. However, consolation will be found in the fact that his absence is to be limited to two years.

That Mr. Clark has reached this determination in the midst of artistic triumphs the ensuing estimates conclusively illustrate:

No greater baritone sings in America to-day than Charles W. Clark. His tone is round and full, his enunciation clear and his attention to details is marvelous. He is the true musician, the true, cultivated interpreter; one who studies, absorbs and imparts the meaning of the composer.—St. Joseph Gazette-Herald, St. Joseph, Mo., November 17, 1901.

Charles W. Clark, the noted baritone, was the soloist. Mr. Clark is possessed of a truly remarkable baritone voice, ample in quantity, and with wonderfully clear-cut enunciation and power. His numbers were given with a spirit and sympathy that was delightful, and he established himself as a prime favorite. His voice is sympathetic, vibrant, and of wide range, and his equal as a baritone soloist has not been heard here for several seasons. Especially delightful was his group of songs in English.—Daily Capital, Des Moines, Ia., November 16, 1901.

The singing of Mr. Clark justified all the good things that have been told of him. Especially did he impress with his intelligent phrasing his unusually careful enunciation and an irresistible charm of expression.—The Leader, Des Moines, Ia., November 15, 1901.

The soloist of the evening was Charles W. Clark, a vocalist that will ever in the future receive a warm welcome by a Des Moines audience. Mr. Clark sang in superb voice, with exceptionally clear enunciation and ease that stamped him at once as an artist of rare ability.—The Mail and Times, Des Moines, Ia., November 16, 1901.

Throughout the present winter and the spring of 1902 Mr. Clark will fill important engagements in the United States.

By way of "editorial comment" it is not inappropriate to suggest that should he decide to give a farewell recital, a hall as large as the Auditorium would be a suitable place to secure, as it possibly might accommodate the persons who would be glad and anxious to attend.

GEORGE HAMLIN TO SING IN NEW YORK.

Assisted by the accomplished musician, Victor Harris, George Hamlin will give his Strauss recital at Mendelssohn Hall, New York, on December 12, while on December 16 the eminent tenor will present a miscellaneous program at Mendelssohn Hall.

JEANNETTE DURNO'S SUCCESS.

The gifted musician, Jeannette Durno, is filling important engagements under Dunstan Collins' capable direction. Concerning her recent appearance at Beloit, Wis., the local press waxed eloquent, as follows:

A performance thoroughly satisfactory to the severest of musical critics was that given by the talented Miss Durno, pupil of the famous Leschetizky, at the Opera House, last evening, the recital being one of the numbers of the college lecture course.

The young woman seems to have entered with understanding fullness into the spirit of her master, and exhibited a wealth of expression, an abudance of power and a grateful finish of techn which was ample, without lapsing into the mechanical. Her voi while not of the prima donna order, was sweet and clear, and h intonation perfect.

Happily, the program was such as to bring forth the you artist's unusual power of interpretation. The first number was wild Italian dance, Tarantelle, by Leschetizky, in which th is a contrast of motifs, the piece opening with a flourish, a growing more furious, until suddenly interrupted by a chime church bells, a procession of monks appear and disappear, and t Tarantelle is resumed again with its impetuous abandon.

Varying phases of the wide range of musical expression were corded by the "Butterfly" of Lavalee and the "Valse Badinage" Liadow, imitating a music box, the latter calling for a repetition.

The Funeral March of Chopin, the most popular and widely kno of this great master's compositions, called forth the supreme powers of the performer, the "mournful harmonies and crashi chords" of the main theme giving scope for the powerful effect the Leschetizky movement, in which the player seems to go the very bottom of the keys in a frantic effort to wring from t instrument all of which it is capable of expressing when coupl with human skill. In contrast with the main theme is the melo of the middle part, which has been likened in its beautiful simplici to the singing of a voice from another world, and which was well interpreted as the heavier theme.

The Schubert-Liszt arrangement of Goethe's "Erlking" was w depicted. The last number, the Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody Liszt, is characterized by joyous abandon, a hearty disregard f the weightier phases of human existence. Here, again, the art arose to the possibilities of the composition, and left her audito more than delighted. The management of the course are to congratulated in furnishing such high-class talent to music love of the city.—Beloit Daily News, Beloit, Wis., November 12.

Jeannette Durno, the pianist, delighted lovers of music with h recital at the Opera House last night. Miss Durno is unquestio ably one of the finest pianists of the day, and she also sings we The recital was one of the events of the Students' Lecture Course. Beloit Free Press, November 12.

MR. NEWTON A FAVORITE.

The favorite of the evening seemed to be the tenor, Hen Willis Newton. New to the audience, he at once captured h hearers, and held them until his work for the evening was don His was the most difficult as well as the most beautiful music the cantata, and with a true tenor quality, a dignity of renditi and a simplicity of manner, he won for himself a well deserv title of the favorite. We have at these concerts heard no ten whom we like so well, and hope for his re-engagement by t society.—St. Joseph (Mo.) Gazette-Herald, November 17.

Holmes Cowper, the well-known tenor, has been e gaged by the Apollo Club, of Chicago, for its part-so concert on February 17.

The Hamlin Company announces that Holmes Cowp tenor; Sue Harrington Furbeck, contralto, and Alexand Krauss, violinist, will give a concert at the Second Co gregational Church, Oak Park, on December 10; al that Mrs. Furbeck will fill engagements at Oberlin, Ohi on December 12 and 13.

Alexander Krauss, violinist, and Arthur Dunham, a companist, contributed the program at a reception r cently given by Dr. W. R. Harper, president of the U versity of Chicago. Mr. Krauss was enthusiastically r ceived, and Mr. Dunham was obliged to respond to e cores.

At the Inter Ocean Building, Chicago, Dunstan C lins has established an agency for artists and their co cert tours.

On December 5 Gaul's "Holy City" will be presente by a chorus of sixty voices, under Louis Evans' capab direction, at the Normal Park Baptist Church. The sol ists will be Charles W. Clark, baritone; Mary B. Steve Holmes Cowper's Engagements.

Holmes Cowper, the young tenor who made his first appearance Alton last evening, made a very favorable impression in two num- rs, singing three selections to each number and responding to an core for each. His voice was very pleasing to all the music lovers esent, and Mr. Cowper's position in the stronghold of the highest teem of the Alton people is secure. Mr. Cowper's solo, "Onaway, wake, Beloved," was superb, and he was compelled to repeat part the pretty song to satisfy his hearers.—Telegraph, Alton, Ill., ovember 14, 1901. (Dominant Ninth Choral Society.)

Mr. Cowper, who never fails to gain his full measure of applause and justly—sang with ease and authority, and fine musicianly un- rstanding.—American, Chicago, November 15, 1901.

Lectures at Studebaker Hall.

This week Burton Holmes' illustrated lectures on travel are attracting large audiences to the Studebaker Hall, Fine Arts Building.

Fannie Church Parsons' Musical Kindergarten.

At the Fine Arts Building, in her spacious studio, which commands an expansive view of Lake Michigan, Mrs. Parsons is engaged in developing the interests of her valuable system of Musical Kindergarten. For the benefit of many persons who will be pleased to learn of Mrs. Parsons' work, these explanatory paragraphs, entitled "Advantages to Pupil and Parent," are reproduced from her paper which was read at Cincinnati:

"The advantages gained by parent and child by this system are many. No longer is the practice hour a trial. Music being the natural companion of childhood, if taught in a manner to awaken in the child all its natural powers and longings, without the discouragements usually accompanying the study, the charm of knowing and being able to accomplish a task is incentive enough for the child to do good work when practice begins. The financial advantage is also no small item to many parents. An opportunity is given many to undertake the work of instruction before an instrument is purchased.

"The child is saved many hours of drudgery, and all future work is so anticipated that it becomes comparatively easy.

"This system offers teachers an opportunity to study the individuality of each child, to teach a number at a time that which they have endeavored to teach each one—to teach many points which for lack of time and means for making plain they have postponed teaching until a later lesson—to make the study of the piano, harmony, theory and composition so simple that they may be companions from the first, thus illustrating each other.

"A prominent Chicago teacher exclaimed: 'It is worth the whole amount to learn how to teach both staffs at the same time in a manner easier than the old method of teaching one staff at a time.'

"This lady also said: 'These games are like throwing the X-rays on the keyboard.' Another well-known teacher in Detroit said: 'This surely is an all round method, leaving nothing out,' while a Boston teacher stated it to be the most practical yet examined.

"The teachers' manual and note book contains the forty lessons systematically arranged, giving each song and verse its proper place in the lesson.

"These printed directions make the work for the teacher comparatively easy. Although so arranged they are adjustable to the needs of every class. Even adult classes take the work with increasing interest and attention, and teachers declare themselves personally benefited by this course of instruction."

Allen Spencer will be heard in a piano recital at Longwood, Ill., on December 18, while on the 14th of the same

GLENN HALL'S LATEST ENGAGEMENT.

The New York Oratorio Society is to be congratulated upon having secured Glenn Hall, the Chicago tenor, for its concert on December 27.

ONE VIEW OF CHICAGO.

And now it is stated that Mrs. Patrick Campbell, the English actress, will make her American début in New York instead of Chicago. "A disinterested view taken by one person who heard the available details of the matter," says the Chicago Tribune, "was that Mrs. Campbell might have been told harrowing tales of the West. She never has visited America, and perhaps in her opinion Chicago lies in a wilderness through which Indians still roam and scalp."

MISS FRANCES A. CROWLEY.

Miss Frances A. Crowley, formerly of Des Moines, is now one of Chicago's competent piano instructors. Miss Crowly has studied in Europe. In Berlin she was a pupil of Oscar Raif, who recommended her highly.

A NEW SEXTET.

A philharmonic sextet has been organized at the Chicago Musical College as follows: Helen Prince, contralto; Carl Cochens, basso; Walter Field, second tenor; Francis Lieb, baritone; George Dameral, tenor, and Alma Cole Youlin, soprano.

FREDERIC JOHN MAGUIRE.

An accomplished young musician who recently has come to Chicago is Frederic John Maguire. Mr. Maguire is making a specialty of Wagnerian arrangements for the piano. He possesses a brilliant technic and much musical temperament.

At his Kimball Hall studio George Hamlin gave an informal musicale on the afternoon of November 21, when he interpreted the following songs:

Pur dicesti, O bocca bella.....Lotti
Deh piu a me non v'ascondete.....Bonocini
Vittoria mio core.....Carissimi
Als die alte Mutter.....Dvorák
Liebeslied.....Dvorák
Am ufer des Flusses des Manzanares.....Sjogren
Hab ein Roslein dir Gebrochen.....Sjogren
Und schlafst du mein Mädchen.....Sjogren
Vor meinem Auge.....Sjogren
Minnelied.....Brahms
Liebestreu.....Brahms
Die Mainacht.....Brahms
Meine Liebe ist Grun.....Brahms

Die Taubenpost.....Schubert
Geheimes.....Schubert
Frühlingssehnsucht.....Schubert
Nocturne.....Hermann
Orpheus and His Lute.....Manney
Were I a Prince Egyptian.....Chadwick
The Years at the Spring.....Beach

An artist like George Hamlin is not heard to the best advantage in a studio. His voice seems to defy limitations. It demands a concert hall. On Thursday his singing was sympathetic or convincing, as occasion demanded, and it was always scholarly. Hermann's Nocturne he sang magnificently, and "The Years at the Spring" he was compelled to repeat. Each number was an object lesson to the serious or ambitious student of vocal music. The pianist of the occasion was Miss Eleanor Scheib, a capable performer, who has studied with Mrs. Regina Watson.

At the fourth orchestral concert in the Auditorium yesterday afternoon the opening number was Brahms' overture, "Academic Festival." Beethoven's Symphony in F major followed. It was played with much finish and precision, but so much thematic development sometimes becomes wearisome, even at the hands of the great Beethoven. The other orchestral numbers introduced by Mr. Thomas were Vorspiel, "Guntram," Richard Strauss, and Josef Suk's suite, "Ein Märchen." Of special interest was the Strauss contribution, which received a stately interpretation. The audience seemed to be well pleased with the program and also with the singing of Gertrude May Stein. Miss Stein sang recitative and aria from "Les Troyens," Berlioz, and Tschaikowsky's recitative and aria from "Jeanne d'Arc."

WILLIAM A. WILLETT.

WILLIAM A. WILLETT, a prominent member of the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory's faculty, is filling many concert engagements this season. Among his dates may be mentioned the Germania Singing Society concert, Chicago, November 21; recital at the Library Hall, Ravenwood, Ill., November 26; the Schumann Club, Chicago, illustrated lecture on oratorio, December 5; recital at the Auditorium Conservatory, December 7, and recitals at the Hayden and Kenwood hotels, Chicago, October 31 and December 14.

WILLIAM A. WILLETT.

Before going to Illinois this well-known baritone spent two seasons in Cleveland, Ohio, having previously lived six years in Toledo, Ohio. He sings with much expression and dramatic intensity, and possesses a commanding stage presence and magnetic personality.

Mr. Willett is an enthusiastic teacher of singing, and many promising pupils study with him at the Auditorium Conservatory.

His well deserved popularity is increasing steadily in Chicago. In that great Western city he is making his permanent headquarters.

The following press notices are of interest:

Mr. Willett has a voice of exceptional sweetness, wonderful range and power, and his rendition of "It Is Enough" was magnificent.—New Castle (Pa.) News.

His singing recalls the days of Santley, the English baritone, who created such a furore here some years ago.—Lakeside News.

Mr. Willett has a musical voice, and his singing is marked with intelligence and emotional warmth.—Detroit (Mich.) Tribune.

Mr. Willett sang the bass parts in "The Creation" and presents a beautiful baritone organ, which is under perfect control. His interpretation is masterful and shows he is thoroughly acquainted with the traditions of oratorio.—Troy Democrat.

It is to be hoped that before long Mr. Willett will be heard at a number of Eastern musical events.

Glenn Hall.

GLENN HALL, the Chicago tenor, adds another important engagement to the long list his manag have already booked for him. He has been secured sing "The Messiah" with the New York Oratorio Soci on December 27. Mr. Hall will give a recital at Philac phia on December 30, and his other dates are as follo November 28, recital, Kansas City, Mo.; December 3. cital, Music Hall, Chicago; December 5, Mozart Cl Madison, Wis.; December 6, Duluth, Minn.; December Ashland, Wis.; December 8, Duluth, Minn.; December "Messiah," Philharmonic Club, Minneapolis; Decem 10, "Messiah," Choral Union, St. Paul, Minn.; Decemb 17, recital, Springfield, Ill.; December 25. "Messia Handel and Haydn Society, Boston, Mass.

Among the younger artists of the West none is m prominent than Glenn Hall, and before him there see to be unlimited success. It is a rare honor for a Weste singer to be called upon to fill so many Eastern as well Western engagements.

The Denver Republican recently gave the following e mate of this artist's singing:

Glenn Hall, the Chicago tenor, was the main feature of the gram. Mr. Hall came to Denver with a high reputation, and lea it with a higher one. His popularity was equaled only by artistic worth of his singing. To say that Mr. Hall is an a with excellent control, correct intonation, clever enunciation, whatever language he used, and plenty of temperament is not praise him too much. He sang the great Tschaikowsky recita and aria from "Eugen Onegin" with all the abandon that this t cally and despairing beautiful song demands. But he was perh at his best in the smaller group that formed his second solo, s so deftly chiseled that each chord seemed the facet of a jewel. Brahms Serenade was the best of these, full of those subtle sy pated rhythms that no other composer quite caught the trick He also sang the Schubert Serenade with rare feeling and delic He was enthusiastically encored after all his solos.

Mr. Hall possesses not only musical gifts and artis temperament; his unmistakable culture and sincerity purpose make friends for him wherever he chances to

WHITNEY TEW

In America November, December And January.

The London Press says of Mr. Tew's singing:

The Stage—"Mr. Whitney Tew proved himself a singer of excellent capabilities. His voice, which is a bass of great compass, is delightfully sympathetic—now full of tenderness, now instinct with passion and joy. He could not have been surpassed in his rendering of Schumann's 'Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn' and Liza Lehmann's curiously weird 'Myself when Young.'"—July 4, 1901.

London Musical Courier—"Mr. Whitney Tew's singing was marked by a high order of intelligence. He is one of the few singers now before the public who possesses the many qualifications that mean success. Besides a voice powerful and sympathetic he has a remarkable memory, and he never fails to display an intuitive knowledge of the poetic and dramatic significance of the text. In four songs by Bach, Brahms, Schubert and Schumann he exhibited great powers of vocalization and expression, and a style in singing German so thoroughly Teutonic that it was hard at times to realize his American origin . . . Three songs in English were equally impressive."—July 5, 1901.

Ladies' Field—"That fine bass singer, Mr. Whitney Tew, gave the first of his recitals in Steinway Hall. Madame Lehmann's 'In Memoriam' was a great test of Mr. Tew's manner and inflection, and he sustained the interest of his audience well throughout it; and it is a supremely hard work for a single voice—fragmentary, passionate, moody, with its pedal-note of acute sorrow. . . . Mr. Tew is fortunate in possessing a powerful voice of fine quality, and he has both the voice and brains for success."—May 25, 1901.

Daily Telegraph—"Mr. Tew is an artist who commands attention and deserves praise. Especially has he the gift of feeling and the power of conveying it to others, while in point of intelligence he leaves but little to desire. Mr. Tew essayed last evening songs of widely contrasting kinds and of various countres, but the manner and spirit proper to each were easily revealed, and the result was a conspicuous success."—May 23 1901

ANNA JEWELL'S DEBUT.

MRS. ANNA JEWELL, a young American pianist of exceptional promise, gave her first recital in Mendelssohn Hall last Wednesday night. Mrs. Jewell, who is a native of New Orleans, is a highly talented young woman with a marvelous musical memory and great imaginative powers. Although she has lived in a musical atmosphere all her life she began serious study only four years ago, when she became a pupil of Ludovic Breitner's, with whom she is still studying.

After finishing her course of studies with Mr. Breitner Mrs. Jewell will go to Europe and study under the greatest masters. Her playing justifies her ambition, which is ruthless, and as she has great capacity for hard work there is no reason why she should not succeed. Her program, which she played from memory, was as follows.

Toccata and Fuga.....Bach
Ballade Mignonne.....Schütt Convent.....Borodine
Serenata.....Borodine
Concerto, E flat.....Liszt
Prelude.....Rachmaninoff
Etude, op. 10, No. 7.....Chopin
Barcarolle.....Rubinstein
Hungover Steppen.....Schytte

MRS. ANNA JEWELL.

The style and variety of the compositions upon her program show that she is a player of no mean ability.

Her technic, while not absolutely perfect, is far and away beyond that of most players of her age and experience. She has endurance, the result in her case of healthy living, to spare. Her tone is full, rich and limpid and she uses her pedals with discretion. She played the E flat Concerto of Liszt especially well. The Quasi Adagio had the tender pathos which stirred the heart, while the Allegro Marziale thundered and crashed to its last resounding octave.

The Etude by Chopin was also played with rare insight and understanding. There is no doubt that when she has finished her studies in Europe and returns to this country her success will be tremendous. Mrs. Jewell, whose address is care of Steinway & Sons, New York, has already been booked for a number of important engagements.

ELECTA GIFFORD.—Miss Electa Gifford is a very busy artist. Tuesday of this week she sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Fall River, Wednesday night she sings for the Brooklyn Institute and Saturday night with the Paur Symphony Orchestra in New York.

Baernstein's Recital.

"JOSEPH BAERNSTEIN, the New York basso, strengthened the warm regard in which he has been held by the music lovers of this city at his recital last evening. For an hour and a half, with scarcely an interruption, the High School rang with the sweet full voice of America's leading concert basso. It was a feast of music from which it is difficult to pick the best.

"Whether the voice was rollicking through Mendelssohn's 'I Am a Roamer Bold,' sunk to infinite tenderness in the love songs which made up a part of the program, or singing with a feeling that held the appreciative audience spell bound one of those little German ballads that voice the innermost thoughts of masters like Schubert and Schumann, it was all of the best.

"A better program could not have been arranged to display Mr. Baernstein's voice in its most favorable light. He was given an opportunity during the evening to interpret after his own fashion songs, grave and gay, blithesome and pathetic, and never for an instant did the interpretation fail to reach the highest standards. His voice is full and resonant throughout the register, a rare gift with bassos. At the conclusion of the regular program Mr. Baernstein sang, in response to the continued bursts of applause, a typical Irish 'Come-all-ye,' one so familiar that its name has been forgotten, and only the music and the words remain. The first verse, with its swinging and bravoism and its arrant boastfulness, brought a smile to the lips of everyone. Then the pathos of the piece appeared and was tenderly depicted by the artist. Most of the seven ballads and folksongs in the last part of the program have something of this pathetic nature in them, and if any choice were to be made it might be said that Mr. Baernstein was at his best in these snatches of melody."—Springfield Union, November 21, 1901.

Pupils' Recital.

A SUCCESSFUL pupils' recital was given at the American Institute of Applied Music last Friday evening. The program was as follows:

Adagio, op. 2, No. 3.....Beethoven

Nocturne.....Field
Miss Amy Tomlinson.

FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER'S SECOND RECITAL.

FOR her second appearance here this season Madame Zeisler chose this scheme:

Papillons, op. 2.....Schumann
Variations Sericuses, op. 54.....Mendelssohn
Wedding March and Dance of the Elves.....Mendelssohn
Rhapsodie, op. 79, No. 2.....Brahms
Ballade, op. 23.....Chopin
Berceuse, op. 57.....Chopin
Scherzo, op. 20.....Chopin
Hexentanz, op. 17.....MacDowell
Etude (Prelude), op. 52, No. 3.....Saint-Saëns
On the Mountains.....Grieg
Norwegischer Brautzug im Vorüberzichen.....Grieg
Caprice Espagnole, op. 37.....Moszkowski

And again did she attract to Mendelssohn Hall on Tuesday afternoon of last week an earnest audience. Different from most audiences, the one that flocks to hear Bloomfield-Zeisler takes her playing and itself very seriously; they know that this artist spells her Art with a capital. As a consequence there is a happy absence of that sickening Schwärmerei which turns so many recitals into exhibitions, feminine and effeminate, at which art flies out of the ventilators. This does not deny that Madame Zeisler is an idol—to the contrary, she is very much of one, but of the sane person, not of the thrill-hunter.

The pianist was in physically better trim than she had been on the occasion of her previous recital; and with the result that her playing was even better than it then was. Throughout the program—and it was a varied one—there was constant evidence of the firm grasp of the material and the means which stamps her playing unique. Individuality is written boldly all over her work; convention suffers as convention might and we hear read into every composition the personality of the player merged into the composers' deeper meaning. Between the two she draws an acute balance, leaning forever to the side of the artistic.

The Schumann number, done with much gracility, sounded a gallery of pretty miniatures, none of them mawkish in color or sentiment. Then the set of Mendelssohn Variations—among the most interesting of all this type and among the best of this composer's piano music—brought out the player's sense of fine shadings. Monotony had no recognition in this reading nor in the following garish Liszt arrangement of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" and "Elves' Dance." Not an alluring tune, the former, and banal enough to have been composed for the penny whistle of Stevenson fame; but it was a request number and may really have pleased someone.

All uncertainty of mood ceased with the G minor Brahms Rhapsody. The Serious Man from Hamburg does not dally; he is terribly in earnest and tells it in his music. Even in this—a work given preference by performers to introduce him now and again to the public—he is so rarely careful that the title is almost a misnomer; his musical values are well contrasted—they sing by contrast. Madame Zeisler strove to make clear all the meanings, which despite the smallness of form here are weighty, and succeeded.

For the succeeding Chopin group she seemed in fine fettle. The G minor Ballade—another request number—was very well done, its Coda ringing with brilliancy; in the Berceuse there was a dreamy and remarkably sustained level of tone and originality of conception. The Scherzo was given a dramatic and dashing interpretation. Throughout the intricate measures of the Presto the phrasing stood clear and clean. Madame Zeisler is not one of those pianists who believe that the pedal is nearest when the need is greatest.

MacDowell, Saint-Saëns and Grieg all found the player in sympathetic frame of mind and fingers; and with Moszkowski's highly colored "Caprice Espagnole" the program concluded—at least the printed part of it. Then came continuous clamor for encores, abundantly rewarded by Schuett's tuneful and therefore beloved Valse, op. 59, No. 2; the Chopin Butterfly Study—taken at such a rattling tempo that one knew Madame Zeisler would never allow grass to grow under her fingers—and the dainty G minor posthumous Waltz. All done with no flagging of spirit or enthusiasm.

Whatever else might be said of Madame Zeisler's playing—and all of it praise—would be sheer repetition. She is a rare player and her attractions, apart from her mechanical proficiency, arise from the ability to disentangle the artistic from the commonplace. She makes everything of merit seem worth while, and above all she succeeds in convincing the listener.

Josef Hofmann at the White House.

FOR the second time within eight months Josef Hofmann has been honored with an invitation to dine at the Presidential Mansion at Washington. On March 10 the young artist was with the late President McKinley, who jokingly remarked to him at that time: "It has after all some advantage to be at the White House, for it gave me an opportunity to hear you play."

Last evening young Hofmann was the guest of President Roosevelt, and later the artist played a few selections to the delight of a number of invited friends.

ORGAN AND HARP CONCERT.—William C. Carl will give an organ and harp concert, assisted by Miss Maud Morgan, harpist, in the First Presbyterian Church, Fifth avenue and Twelfth street, New York, next Tuesday evening, December 3, at 8:15 o'clock. This concert will terminate the autumnal series of free concerts given in the "Old First" Church. A brilliant program has been arranged. No tickets required. On the following evening Mr. Carl will inaugurate a new organ in Centenary Collegiate Institute at Hackettstown, N. J.

Gerardy in Pittsburg.

FOLLOWING are additional press notices about Jean Gérardy, the 'cellist:

The soloist, Jean Gérardy, felt quite at home in view of several former appearances in this city. A marvelous "Strad" 'cello, reputed to have cost $10,000, responded obediently, yea, even lovingly, with tones of crystalline purity and magic beauty to the bowing of this master's right hand, and to the fingering of his eloquent nimble left hand, its vibrant strings ever flinging out

"Sweet peals anew
Of music, delicate, soft, intense."

Gérardy impresses you on the spot as a genuine artist. Time and again he escaped the temptation to exaggerate passages of sentimental content, while his facile, beautiful fingering, up string and down, and even at whirlwind pace, never once detracted attention from his music, which meant everything to him. Gérardy has temperament, that's clear; amazing technic is his, and trills he shakes into lover's sighs. I swear that twice with ravishing pianissimo he held his audience dangling in midair, and that on two occasions an icicle shot down your back, best represented the feelings inspired by his luscious C and G string sounds and harmonics near the bridge.

In the Lalo concerto his musical conception was most convincing, notably in the lovely intermezzo. Of the orchestral accompaniment he said in all sincerity to the writer: "Fine, very fine." As encore he gave charmingly a selection of Saint-Saëns. To piano accompaniments in the second part he offered a Bach aria; also Pergolesi "Aria di Tre Giorni," concluding with Davidoff's "Am Springbrunnen," in which he attained supreme heights of technical skill.—Pittsburg Post, November 16, 1901.

Jean Gérardy, the soloist of the evening, proved himself all the anticipatory notices had painted him, and a little more.

His first number was a concerto by Lalo, with fire and enthusiasm, and later a Bach aria with inimitable grace. "Am Springbrunnen" illustrated his command of the technic of his instrument admirably, and to an insistent encore he rendered a dainty little composition of Herbert's, to which the genial conductor played the piano accompaniment.—Pittsburg Gazette.

Jean Gérardy, the 'cellist, was soloist. He was warmly received by the audience, even before he played a note. When he struck the strings and there came a full, ripe tone, the listeners were amazed at the virility of the young virtuoso, and gave him an ovation.—Pittsburg Times, November 16.

Jean Gérardy won a triumph at Carnegie Hall last night. His masterly handling of the 'cello in the Concerto in D minor, by Lalo, evolved unbounded enthusiasm. Many recalls compelled the youthful performer at last to yield to the demand for an encore. In the second half of the program his work was still more thoroughly enjoyed.—Pittsburg Chronicle, November 16, 1901.

Here is a criticism from the Providence Journal of November 14:

The concerto by Lalo which M. Gérardy chose for his solo number is a fine work, and its beauties were fully brought out by the superb playing of the young virtuoso. M. Gérardy is no longer a boy prodigy in curls and knee breeches. He has, however, unlike some "prodigies," quite fulfilled the promise of his earlier years and is now an artist of the first rank. Technic he had to a remarkable degree some years ago, and to this are now added the repose of the form, the grace, and the intelligence of the mature player. His performance was masterly in every way, and that it delighted the audience was convincingly shown by the number and warmth of the recalls which greeted him at the close of the concerto.

FROM THE BENNETT STUDIO.—Another of S. C. Bennett's pupils, Miss Ella Devine, has lately achieved great success in her singing with the "Mamselle 'Awkins" Company. The Philadelphia Record has the following: "Miss Ella Devine has an exceptionally sweet and well cultivated voice and scored a success of very considerable proportions."

The song "Mary Green," written for and sung by Miss Devine, had to be repeated five or six times at each performance.

ADELE LEWING.—Mme. Adele Lewing, pianist; Miss Kathryn Hilke, soprano, and Hans Kronold, 'cellist, appeared at a concert last week in Madison Assembly Rooms, Morristown, N. J., with great success. It was a subscription affair. Referring to Madame Lewing, the Morristown News stated:

Madame Lewing had the entire sympathy of her audience from the first. * * *

Very charming was Miss Hilke's song with obligato, played by Mr. Kronold, and in the group of songs composed by Madame Lewing both singer and composer were recalled several times.

PHILADELPHIA, November 23, 1901.

AT last the much heralded Philadelphia Orchestra has made its bow to the public. The first concert was given in the Academy of Music on Saturday ening. The following was the program:

erture, Leonore, No. 3.....Beethoven
ite, B minor.....Bach
For string orchestra, with flute obligato.
Flute, Ary van Leeuwen.
ncerto for violin.....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy mphony No. 1, B flat major.....Schumann
Soloist, Charles Gregorowitsch.

All those who were there cannot but congratulate themlves that after years of waiting Philadelphia has now an chestra of true symphonic proportions. It is not too uch, I think, to say that the orchestra met in every way, id surpassed in some, the expectations held by the people Philadelphia. When one considers the fact that three eeks ago most of these men had never played a note toether, a large measure of praise is due Mr. Scheel for havg welded together an organization that can give a perrmance like that of Saturday evening. It shows hard, nscientious work on the face of it by both leader and en, and we may look for some grand work when everydy gets better acquainted. The playing of the brass choir Saturday evening was blurred in spots, a fault which no ubt Mr. Scheel will correct after a few rehearsals. The oodwind, too, seemed to be shaky at times, but it can be uthfully said that Mr. Scheel has gathered together a uly wonderful body of strings. In the final rush of the Leonore" overture and in the Bach Suite their work was autiful, filling the hall with a rush of full, round tone.

The best work by the orchestra as a whole was done in chumann's Symphony. Those who formerly belonged to ie Symphony Society had studied the work before, and oreover it is so well known that everyone must have en thoroughly acquainted with it. The first movement as especially well played, with the exception of the brass entioned before.

Mendelssohn's Concerto, served to introduce Charles regorowitsch, the Russian violinist. He played magnifintly. Not only has he good technic, but also a lovely ne and a nice power of shading. One will not readily rget his playing of the ravishing andante, nor his wonerful arpeggios in the first movement. He received an vation. The house was well filled though not crowded.

Elkan Kosman, concertmeister of the orchestra, intends rming a string quartet from the violin choir in the near ture. Mr. Kosman, who is not yet thirty, was a pupil f Lambert Massart in Europe. He secured entrance to ie Paris Conservatoire at the age of fourteen, and won ie first prize for violin playing upon his graduation. He has for a number of years been concertmeister of the Lamoureux Orchestra in Paris. Mr. Kosman's native city is Rotterdam, Holland. He is an accomplished linguist, speaking German, English, Dutch, Russian, Spanish and Italian fluently.

The management of the orchestra wishes to state that, due to an error, the following names were omitted in the published list of members of the orchestra: Paul Strablendorf, violin and bass clarinet, from Bilze Orchestra and Berlin Philharmonie; John Fassbauer, double bass, Philadelphia Orchestra; C. S. Mackay, tuba, Philadelphia.

The Manuscript Music Society of Philadelphia gave its first concert of the season on Wednesday evening, November 20, in Griffith Hall. William Berwald's Quintet for piano and strings, which was awarded the prize given by the society this year, was played. The work showed musicianly building, but little originality. The most notable manuscripts played were Mauritz Leefson's "Minuetto" and "Valse Sentimentale," for the piano, played by Mr. Leefson himself, and Mrs. Marie Kunkel-Zimmerman's song, "Adoration," sung by Nicholas Douty.

Mr. Douty's two part songs, "Come Away, Death," and "Winter," were also sung by a selected chorus. These two beautiful compositions were heard here at one of the Mendelssohn Club concerts last year.

The series of popular concerts under the management of Victor Dealy was inaugurated on Wednesday evening in Witherspoon Hall. Gregory Hast, the English tenor, gave a song recital, assisted by Miss Louisa May Hopkins, pianist.

Mr. Hast sang a wide variety of songs, ranging from examples of the early Italian and French schools, through German lieder down to modern English songs, such as Arthur Sullivan's "Where Is Another As Sweet As My Sweet" and the same composer's "Gone." He has a voice of rich and sympathetic quality, and he sang each succeeding number with increasing beauty. Moreover, he showed good command over all the languages in which he sang, his enunciation being clear and distinct. His voice was best perhaps in Löwe's "How Deep the Slumbers of the Floods." Mr. Hast will always be listened to with delight.

Miss Hopkins played in a finished manner MacDowell's Concert Etude, Sinding's "Spring Murmurs" and Brassin's arrangement of the fire music from "Die Walküre."

The second series is announced for Wednesday, January 8, when Miss Sara Anderson, soprano, and Nicholas Douty will appear.

HENRY I. MAGEE.

Estelle Harris for Paterson Orpheus.

MISS HARRIS has been engaged as soloist for the well-known Orpheus Club, of Paterson, December 10. December 26 she sings "The Messiah" with the Goshen Vocal Society, with orchestra. Next Sunday evening "Stabat Mater" will be given at her church, Church of the Divine Paternity, Seventy-sixth street and Eighth avenue, the other soloists being Miss Cornelia Marvin, alto; Albert Quesnel, tenor, and Gwilym Miles, baritone.

MARY LOUISE CLARY.—Mary Louise Clary, the contralto, will make a short tour through the South with her own concert company during the first half of January, under the direction of Remington Squire. Among engagements already arranged are such places as Lynchburg, Va.; Wilmington, N. C.; Columbia, S. C.; Atlanta, Ga.; Mobile, Ala., &c. Miss Clary returned last week from a short trip to the West, filling dates in Wheeling and Parkersburg, W. Va., and Steubenville, Ohio. She will return to at least two, and probably all three of these places on her return to this city from the above mentioned trip to the South.

Zeldenrust.

AFTER it became known that Zeldenrust had reached America, the demands for his appearances became not only widespread but importunate. Applications for recital dates were received by every mail at Manager Charlton's offices in Carnegie Hall, each with the request that it be the American début of the celebrated Dutch pianist. That important distinction, however, was promised to Cincinnati early in the summer, and Zeldenrust has accordingly been occupying his time since his arrival in New York in becoming accustomed to the climate, utilizing the hour or so a day which he allows himself for rest and recreation in sight seeing, and devoting the remainder of his time (from eight to ten hours) to practicing.

His Cincinnati appearance will be with the Symphony Orchestra of that city, Frank Van der Stucken conductor. The dates will be November 29 and 30, and Zeldenrust will play the great Grieg Concerto, with which he scored a tremendous triumph with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

Immediately following his Cincinnati dates he will give a series of recitals in Richmond, Va.; Norfolk, Va., and Spartanburg, S. C., during the first week in December; and on the 9th he is booked with the Philharmonic Society of Nashville, Tenn., after which he will return to New York, where he will give recitals later in the same month.

Hermann Klein.

HERMANN KLEIN has for so many years been a familiar figure in the opera lobbies and in the concert room that the announcement now made of the resignation of all his appointments in this country, and his departure on December 7 for the United States, will surprise all except those in his immediate confidence. It is a fact, published in the city accounts, that his fees at the Guildhall School alone approach £500 a year, altogether apart from his private connection and his journalistic work, and for a musician to relinquish so lucrative a position is unusual. The truth, however, is that he has offered to him a far more profitable position in the United States, where also the whole of his surviving relatives have long been settled. He will practically give up journalistic work altogether, and will devote himself entirely to his profession of a teacher of singing, where in New York the field is just now open to a man of his eminence in this special branch. He will establish himself in New York with the best credentials from vocalists of the highest rank, from M. Jean de Reszké downward. Mr. Klein, by the way, doubtless owing to his name, has been referred to as a German. But he is an Englishman, for his father was a professor in London, and his grandfather was at one time proprietor of the Norwich Argus.—London Daily News.

Frederick Maxson at Drexel Institute.

THE prominent Philadelphia organist and teacher played a recital in the course of free public concerts (the 151st) on Thursday evening, November 21, Miss Maude Sproule, contralto, assisting. His program was:

Andante, Maestoso and Allegro.....Händel
Barcarolle.....Lemare
Contralto, Flower Song, from Faust.....Gounod
March in E.....Guilmant
Second Symphony.....Widor
Scherzo.....Hoyte
Contralto—
Still as the Night.....Böhm
O Let Night Speak of Me.....Chadwick
Offertoire in E flat.....Morandi

This program was played throughout in fine style, in keeping with the high reputation of Philadelphia's leading concert organist. Mr. Maxson is also to be thanked for playing the noveltics, such as the Hoyte Scherzo and the Morandi Offertoire.

NEW YORK, November 25, 1901.

VIVIEN ETHEL McCONNELL, pianist, and Marie Wilson, reader, arranged a nice concert last Tuesday night, at Trinity M. E. Church, Harlem, the fair pianist (a Brounoff pupil), playing in brilliant style the Chopin Valse in E minor, Brounoff's Nocturne in D, the Weber Rondo Brillante and a concert waltz by Godard. Miss Estelle Harris, dramatic soprano, sang among other things Schumann's "Spring Night" and Howland's "Ave Maria" and received a warm welcome and enthusiastic applause. Violinist Quintano played a caprice of his own sans accompaniment and kindly played an obligato for Miss Harris. Later he united with the composer, Brounoff, in the "Romanze de Concert," an effective thing, of unusual harmony, which they had to repeat. Miss Wilson showed talent of pronounced order, both dramatic and dialect

Clara Kalischer's Musical Tea last Friday was a pronounced success. It was in honor of Esther Feé, the violinist, who was, however, unable to be present, owing to illness; a charming note conveyed her regrets and good wishes.

Many people prominent in musical and social circles came. Mme. Renee Japhet sang some French chansonettes, and Tor Van Pyck, tenor, gave one of Tschaikowsky's songs. Miss Marie Potvin played a piano solo and William Mahony sang Schumann's "Wanderer's Song" and some ballads. Mr. Forde has a fine basso profundo. Three of the stirring Hoffmann "Minnen und Sinnen" quartets were sung by Misses Friedley and Kalischer, Messrs. Van Pyck and Mahony and Mrs. William E. Woodend pleased all by her recitations. The hostess herself added several numbers from Von Fielitz's "Toscan Lieder," Chaminade and German.

Wade R. Brown has been mentioned in these columns. A man of his experience and ability is impossible to remain undiscovered long, and, it was stated at the time, that one of his ability should have no difficulty in landing in some nice church position—he is now organist of the Waverly Congregational Church, Jersey City, where he has a mixed chorus, an auxiliary choir of boys, a weekly class of 200 children (who are preparing for the large choir); so it will be seen that Wade R. is busy.

Song interpretation, piano and organ lessons are a specialty with him, and he is pronounced a master in all these, Miss Estelle Harris, among others, warmly praising him in song interpretation.

The Women's Philharmonic Society gave a "Concert en Costume" last week in the large room of the society, Carnegie Hall, the following being the costumes, musical numbers and by whom done:

In Spanish costume—Duet, by Miss Leonore Ruiz and Miss Ellen Ringquist, with accompaniment on the bandurria.
In Swedish costume—Songs, by Mrs. Frederick Dean.
In German costume—Song, by Mrs. Olga Burgtorf.
In Welsh costume—Trio.
In costume of a shepherdess—Song, by Miss Sallie F. Akers.
In Scotch costume—Songs, by Miss Amy Murray.
In Hungarian costume—Song, by Mrs. Katharine Noack Fiqué.
In English peasant costume—Trio, Miss Harriet Tidd, violin; Madame Severini, 'cello; Miss Annie Mead, piano.

Carl M. Roeder is "all blocked up with pupils," as he expresses it; surely a happy state of affairs! His time is entirely filled with numerous applicants he is unable to take. At the Alexander Avenue Baptist Church, of which he is organist, and which edifice is almost completed, there will be an opening service December 15, with a quartet choir, and the music will be a special feature of the service. The members of the quartet already engaged are Miss Eva M. Eason, soprano; L. W. Roberts, tenor; J. Dean Thomas, bass, and an alto yet to be selected.

Dr. Franklin D. Lawson is solo tenor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, Fifth avenue and Thirty-eighth street, singing there at the morning and afternoon services. He is also tenor soloist and director of the choir at the Washington Square M. E. Church, where he sings at the evening service, putting in a tenor pupil for the morning service. He will appear as soloist at the first concert of the Apollo Club, singing "Lohengrin's Narrative," and other engagements are pending. Dr. Lawson's delightful singing at the Stender concert at Mendelssohn Hall last spring, also at Knabe Hall about the same time, is fresh in the minds of New Yorkers, who attended these concerts in large numbers. He recently sang at a private hearing at the Metropolitan Opera House, and an experienced manager present said his voice filled it well.

J. Warren Andrews gave some recitals in Ohio recently and was acclaimed as a splendid organist. Said the Columbus, Ohio, Journal:

Mr. A. is master of the instrument, and his playing is a revelation of new beauties in this most difficult instrument. His pedal playing has been likened to that of John Zundel, who in his day was considered the finest pedalist on this continent.

The Columbus Sunday Press speaks of his playing with high commendation, devoting considerable space to the recital, the Citizen also making special laudatory mention of the recital, the State Journal also, in part as follows:

The recital was an artistic success. * * * Mr. Andrews is without doubt an organist who is also an educator in high-class music. * * * He plays with heart and soul, his readings are profound and scholarly, his playing smooth and delicate, and dainty phrases are done in most artistic style.

The Delaware, Ohio, Daily Gazette says in part:

* * * The program throughout was composed of very interesting organ works, and Mr. Andrews' playing showed a splendid knowledge of the instrument and of the compositions played. In his light and delicate playing he proved himself to be an organist of exceptional ability. * * * Perhaps the most enjoyable number of the program was the Suite Gothique, by Boellman, which was pla in most artistic manner.

Here is another:

Mr. Andrews is a player of ability and good training and sh excellent judgment in his management of stops and combinati Mendelssohn's fine Sonata for organ was delightfully given, an characteristic Toccata and Fugue showed that Mr. Andrews studied his Bach to good effect. The more delicate, modern m of which Guilmant's Funeral March and Caprice are such good resentatives, suffered somewhat in performance from the n pedals.—Columbus Sunday Dispatch.

Last Sabbath evening Mendelssohn's "Hear My Pray ("O, for the Wings of a Dove") was given, the solo Estelle Harris, and next Sunday night Rossini's "Stab Mater" is the work scheduled at the Church of the Div Paternity, Seventy-sixth street and Eighth avenue. P ceding the service there will be a fifteen-minute organ cital.

Harold Osborn Smith, the talented organist of French Episcopal Church here, was represented on the p gram just mentioned by a song, "The Break o' the Yea and the comment on this song by the Ohio State Jour of Columbus, is as follows:

"Mr. Smith has made a worthy setting of this exqui poem. He has very correctly caught the spirit of words, his melody and counter melody beautifully ill trating the text. I was particularly pleased with the companiment part, which plainly shows a natural ability harmonic variety, changing the theme from the vo part to the inner or outer parts of the chord support. Smith will be heard from in the future, for he is full music, original ideas and intuitive knowledge to catch write them down."

E. Arthur Janke has now a studio at Carnegie Hall, specialty being piano and harmony instruction. He ta pupils of any grade and gives beginners a correct foun tion, with strict attention to the development of musi expression. Those who expect to make of music a p fession will receive thorough instruction in the technic piano playing, as well as in the correct execution and ar tic interpretation of the principal works of the masters. will give private musicales and students' recitals throu out the season. Mr. Janke has several indorsements fr leading teachers, among them Richard Burmeister, w says:

MY DEAR MR. JANKE—It gives me much pleasure to recomm you very warmly to all who wish to secure your services as a m cian and artist. I am sure that you will impart the persevera and conscientiousness with which you worked with me also to y pupils, and that your talent and ability will not fail to be recogn anywhere.

Wishing you further great success as a pianist and teacher, I &c.

HE LIEDERKRANZ CONCERT AND FANNY RICHTER.

HERE exists a German proverb which maintains that "he who sayeth A must also utter B." A practical emonstration of it Mr. Blom used to give in a little mily game of poker in which I had the pleasure of parcipating many years ago. He was in the habit of strollg into an opened jackpot with a little pair of deuces and id not object to stand a couple of raises on them, mutring to himself: "Wa ye dam, wa ye dam, wa ye rutter am," as he made good what was put up after he went in. What these enigmatical words mean, or to what language ey belong, I never was able to fathom, but I noticed at Mr. Blom chipped in and that not infrequently he as rewarded for his persistency and courage by drawing his lonely pair of deuces maybe a triplet of aces or me other fortunate conglomeration of cards that would in e end suffice to gain him the pot inclusive of all emoluents put up by the raisers and owners of pat straights, ushes or smaller full hands, not to speak of the bluffers ho had nothing to do with the showing up at the end. ist such a nice and comfortable family game I missed st Sunday night, when through rain and storm I wended y way to the well-known and formerly much beved hall of the New York Liederkranz, in order to atnd the society's first concert of the present season, simy because I had been present at that of the Arion on the evious Sunday.

That I did not regret the change of entertainments, and, ract, greatly enjoyed the concert, with its many sided d variegated musical offerings, shows you that they must ve been of superior merit, and such was indeed the case. he singing of the male chorus especially elicited my adiration, and in the handling of his forces the conductor, r. Paul Klengel, who was new to me, showed himself ot only an efficient leader but also a musician of taste d a drillmaster of superior command or commanding periority, just as you like to put it. All three of the à pella four part songs were redemanded by the enthuastic audience, whose attention did not seem to flag om beginning to the end of a program which consumed o hours and a half in its performance, and which was ffering from an embarras de richesse. Of the three oruses Franz Leu's "Ständchen" is of the cloyingly veet Liedertafel denomination, while Klengel's own setng of Baumgartner's humorous text, "Froehliche Aruth," is clever and effective.

Then there were two male chorus quartets, with orchesa, of which Rheinberger's "Johannisnacht" sounded acamical, despite Klengel's fine instrumentation of the acompaniment, while a new German Reiterlied, by Fritz eff, is very stirring and modern in spirit and harmonizan, being influenced strongly by Wagner's "Kaiserarsch."

As was the case formerly it still seems to be to the pres-nt day, viz., that the mixed chorus is the weak side of the iederkranz. The entrance of the Ewig-Weibliche did not rengthen, it made a tame appendix to the male chorus, d their joint effort at mastering the Brahms "Schicksalsd" was a lamentable failure. I do not blame Dr. Klenl for this, for he cannot be expected to perform miracles ith a poor woman's chorus, but he ought to have known at the Brahms work, one of his most transcendental ies, was too ambitious a selection in every respect.

There were three soloists—one or two less would also ve been a sufficient supply—at this concert. Of them mil Fischer, the veteran bass, needs no further mention, cept to state that he sang his Händel aria and his two Loewe ballads in the artistically still remarkable, but vocally rather remnant style, to which he is reduced now. His audience was delighted, and after the "Archibald Douglas"—Fischer calls him Dooglas—an encore was insisted upon.

Miss Helen Niehbur much more deservedly shared the same fate. She is a pupil of Bouhy, and sang her well-known "Samson and Delilah" aria as well as a plaintive song by Alessandro Scarlatti, with a sympathetic and well trained alto voice and with commendable clearness of delivery.

Of considerable interest to me proved the piano playing of Mrs. Fanny Richter, a former pupil of Liszt, Barth, D'Albert and Stavenhagen, of whom I had heard a good deal of praise before I had the pleasure of hearing her. That so many masters did not spoil her playing shows that the lady has talent of her own, and in fact a certain amount of strength, originality of conception and a clean, neat style of phrasing were the distinguishing features of Mrs. Richter's interpretation of the Beethoven C minor Concerto. The old and nowadays but rarely performed work did not sound a bit antiquated under her supple fingers, and I greatly enjoyed the cadenza by Clara Schumann as well as the sprightly, humorous and genial way in which the lady rippled off the rollicking final rondo.

Of course she was applauded to the echo, and of course she was encored. O. F.

Mrs. Fanny Richter.

Richter is a distinguished name in the art world of Germany, and, William Shakespeare notwithstanding, there is a great deal in a name sometimes. Here in New York we have a pianist who belongs to the honored family of Richters, Fanny Richter, who in private life is Mrs. Albert Fuchs. As one having studied with Liszt, Barth, d'Albert and Stavenhagen, no one would ever think of charging Madame Richter with playing the works of one composer better than another. She is a serious artist always, and with it all she is poetic and emotional to a high degree.

As a child Fanny Richter played in public in Germany. When she first came to this country, she played here with orchestras and in recitals, and then devoted some of her time to teaching among wealthy families. But loving her art as she does, it was unreasonable to suppose a woman of her comparative youth would retire to private life.

The pianist returned only last Saturday night from filling an engagement in Milwaukee with the A Capella Club of that city. This is always the way with genius. No sooner does a gifted woman or man make it known that she or he will enter or re-enter (as happens to be the case here) public life, but engagements come pouring in. Always when the merits equal the claims engagements will follow.

Madame Richter is a most sympathetic artist, with a technical equipment that astonishes even musicians. A beautiful Schumann player, a finished Beethoven, an astonishing Liszt player. Need more be said of her skill. In Europe Madame Richter is known to many people of rank and influence. Members of the royal families are among her friends and patrons. She has been decorated by Queen Marguerita of Italy and the Grand Dukes of Saxe-Weimar and Schaumburg-Lippe. New York society received Madame Richter cordially when she came to this country. As she brought letters from the elect of Europe it could not be otherwise. Many of Madame Richter's friends and admirers are hoping that she will give a recital in New York this winter. It would be interesting to hear her in one of her programs.

Edward Strong.

AMONG the younger singers who have recently scored marked success is Edward Strong, tenor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York.

He commenced the study of music when a mere lad. Starting with the piano, he gradually extended his work, taking up successively both the violin and the organ. Obtaining in this way a thorough musical education, when later his voice developed, he had already acquired a musical culture which well equipped him for the position he wished to fill two years ago on coming to New York.

His voice is a clear lyric tenor, of unusually fine quality and extended range. One of the features of his singing is his clear enunciation, which is always an added pleasure.

The repertory of this young artist is both large and varied, and has won him unqualified praise in concert and oratorio work.

Here follow a few press notices from different parts of the country:

In his first song, "Alas! that Spring Should Vanish," Mr. Strong revealed a resource of musical feeling that gave the full pathos of the lines, and won him a clamorous encore, but in his final song he reached a plane of vocal interpretation rarely heard at Chautauqua.—Chautauqua Daily Herald, July 13, 1901.

BUFFALO, N. Y., PAN-AMERICAN EXPOSITION CONCERT.

One of the favorite soloists is Edward Strong, who comes from Dr. Hall's Presbyterian Church, Fifth avenue, New York. He has a tenor voice of rich quality and takes his high notes easily. His pure, sympathetic voice showed to special advantage in the duet "Oh! that We Two Were Maying." All his numbers were delightful.—Buffalo Express, July 17, 1901.

He is the fortunate possessor of a high tenor voice of great sweetness and power, which he uses in a thoroughly artistic manner. His solos, "Behold and See" and "Thou Shalt Dash Them," are perhaps particularly worthy of mention. The first was sung with exquisite tenderness and finish, the latter with a force and fire that electrified his audience. Faultless rendition and sympathetic interpretation were characteristic of all his work. An unusual repose of manner and an attractive personality gave added pleasure.—Northfield News, December 15, 1900.

Mr. Strong deepened the favorable impression which he made on the music lovers of the Oranges at the Randall concert some time ago. He sang his numbers with fine musicianly feeling, excellent method and a wide range of expression. For response to an encore after his first group of songs he sang "If I Were a Star," by Chapman, and after his third program number was again recalled and sang the dainty little ballad, "A Thousand Thoughts."—Orange Chronicle, June 4, 1901.

Edward Strong, of New York, who has lately attracted attention by his fine tenor voice, gave great pleasure by his rendering of songs by Chaminade, Chadwick, MacDowell and others.—Jersey City Evening Journal, May, 1900.

Mr Strong, who is the tenor of a Fifth avenue church, has a voice of fine volume and rich tone.—Narragansett Daily Times, August 16, 1901.

Edward Strong, a young New York tenor, made a splendid success at Miss Chamberlayne's school last week, where he sang.—Boston Exchange.

Edward Strong is a rare tenor; a magnificent voice, sympathetic and powerful. His enunciation is well-nigh perfect and his singing excellent.—Scranton Republican.

Mr. Strong has this season sung at Port Chester, in Scranton, Pa.; at the R. R. Y. M. C. A., and gives a recital at Wooster, Ohio, December 12, following it with singing in "The Creation" in Northfield, Minn., the next week. This is a short Western tour, extending to Minnesota. He sang at Roseville Avenue Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J., last Sunday evening.

Application for admission should be made before December 15, 1901, at latest, to the "Direction des Conservatoriums," Vienna.

Applicants must produce a certificate of their musical training up to date, a baptismal (birth) certificate, and, on demand, a certificate of health.

The charge for entrance fee is 10 Austrian crowns, annual tuition fee 600 crowns, the latter to be paid in advance in three equal parts.

The committee's examinations for admission will take place from January 2 to January 5, 1902.

Candidates will be required to play from memory a prelude and fugue from J. S. Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavichord"; a self-selected classical piece of some length and a modern composition for the piano. The pupils accepted must bind themselves to at least one school year.

VIENNA.

NOVEMBER 11, 1901.

THE Viennese sigh over Helmesberger as director of the symphony concerts; they sigh and pursue the even tenor of their ways; they sigh and attend the concerts, but not without the cutting insinuation that the Philharmoniker, even without a leader, is worthy of being listened to. Sarcasm is some comfort; the Wiener seek further consolation in the melancholy sight of their adored Mahler taking his daily constitutional on the Ring They elaborate on the genius, the labors and the interesting ill health of the great man. Comparisons are invidious, but the Viennese are usually more lenient, and it is doubtful which of two things has most surprised Mr. Helmesberger, his elevation to the post of Dirigent der Philharmoniker, or the harsh criticism his nomination has excited. Richard Strauss was offered the place; nay, he was urged, entreated to accept it. But alas! and why not? The first concert of the Philharmoniker occurred Tuesday, October 29.

On Monday, November 4, Colonne and his Paris orchestra were here. They are indeed a thing of joy. They played Beethoven's "Leonore," and the Musik Verein audience was spellbound. They played the "Tannhäuser" Bacchanale (Paris edition), and enjoyed it hugely themselves, so did their auditors. They played—and how they colored it!—Charpentier's "Impressions d'Italie" and the famous oft-repeated three numbers from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." Surely the "Rakoczy March" could not have been better played; indubitably not one pulse in the vast audience but responded to that commanding rhythm. And Colonne himself, how he makes his presence felt, though often he seems to give his men the reins, at times laying down his stick and his right hand altogether, and speaking with his expressive left alone! The new Saint-Saëns Symphony is worthy of study; the first movement is in the master's most scholarly style; the adagio at first menacingly suggestive of a theme and variation, but soon changing its mind and becoming a lovely bit of music; the wild, darkly colored scherzo, which cannot fail to excite sympathy; the brilliant and contrasting last movement. The audience did their best to express appreciation. "Bis, bis!" "Bravo Colonne!" came from all sides and after every number.

On Thursday, November 7, Jan Kubelik played to a crowded house in the Grosser Musik Verein Saal. On the evening of the concert people were turned away from the doors. Kubelik played the "Gesangscene" of Spohr, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," which Ysaye introduced to Americans some two or three years ago, and a "Faust" Fantaisie. He excited immense enthusiasm, and was assisted by Friml, pianist from Prague.

But there are many kinds and grades of concerts in Vienna. The Imperial City encourages, harbors, protects many greater and many lesser travelers on the thorny paths to Parnassus. Bösendorfer Saal often fills its comfortable seats for the benefit of strugglers who in America would have to give up the unequal combat. Here they do their little best and receive their little meed of applause, and no doubt enjoy it. The Italian recital on November 7 exemplified all this.

The initial evening of the Tonkünstler Verein series was held on Saturday, October 26, in the Kaufmännschen Verein Fest Saal. The playing of Sophie Auspitz, a recognized and so to speak graduated artist from the Conservatorium, failed to arouse our enthusiasm. She played the piano part of a new and interesting Sonata, for piano and violin, by Robert Fuchs. The author was present and was heartily applauded. Some beautiful songs of Hugo Wolf were monotonously sung; but for us the feature of the evening was a Trio for piano, violin and 'cello, by Fr. Smetana. The work, though scored for three instruments only, seems to have been conceived in an orchestral spirit. A deep, tragic feeling pervades the work. The performers of this number were F. Yerat, 'cellist; Robert Zeiler, violinist, and L. Friedberger, pianist. The Tonkunstler Verein is a very old society. It owes its rejuvenation to Brahms.

And the opera. On Thursday, November 5, was given a brilliant presentation of Smetana's "Dalibor," with Mildenburg as Milada, Michalek as Yutta and poor old Winkelmann as Dalibor. Mildenburg, of course, sang marvelously well. She always does; and her acting was, as usual, intelligent and passionate. Winkelmann managed to look younger than he has looked in other parts. The music of "Dalibor" is a wonderful interpretation of the text. The varieties in rhythm, sentiment and tone coloring present each situation with dramatic force. Particularly worthy of mention seem to us the march preceding the entrance of Wladislaw, King of Bohemia, Dalibor's defense, and the love duet of the prison scene in the second act. The recitatives in "Dalibor" might be criticised as antiquated and stiff. Mahler himself directed. Nevertheless, deficiencies in precision of attack were noticeable and some accompanying passages lacked steadiness.

Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" is at present being given on an average of once a week. The revolving stage is used and every detail of the presentation is remarkably well managed. It must be said that in this case Gutheil-Shoder earns well deserved laurels. The sinuosities of her gestures, attitudes and peculiar style are better adapted to the role of Frau Fluth than to any other we have so far had the advantage of hearing her in. Strange to say, Demuth, the great Wotan, makes an excellent Herr Fluth. The absurd part of Yünker Spärlich is humorously brought out by Breuer. Nadal, perhaps the purest tenor at the Hof Oper, sings the part of Fenton. The ballet in the third act is really fine. Whatever some persons may have to say regarding degeneracy in the ballet corps, Hofmann's "Eryahlungen" bids fair to rival the "Merry Wives of Windsor" in the number of times that it is announced for the present and near future.

The revival of this fantastic opera of Jacques Offenbach was given its first performance at the Hof Oper on Monday, November 11, before a brilliant and enthusiastic audience, the inevitable Gutheil-Shoder assuming the three roles of Olympia, Giulietta and Antonia and Herr Schrödter playing Hoffmann. Mahler directed, received more than his usual ovation and was obliged to repeat the prelude of the second act, in which Offenbach works out a Mozart theme in commemoration of the real Hoffmann's veneration for the great composer. The staging of the Venetian scene was specially admirable, but, alas! the love declaration was sung with such sublime disregard for pure intonation as to completely spoil the ensemble. The last act was distinctly tiresome, the constant reappearance of the demoniac Mirabel absolutely failing to produce the intended weird effect. For such of our readers as are not acquainted with the work, a skeleton sketch may not be out of place. In the prologue Hoffmann offers to tell his friends, assembled in a tavern, the tale of his loves. Each of the three acts is the story of one of these ladies. The first, Olympia, is a doll, so constructed that she can walk, dance and sing. She is broken by the optician who made her eyes and received bad money in payment of his work. The second, Giulietta, a false Venetian, by magic indelibly imprints her face on a looking glass and by the same spell seeks to wreck Hoffmann's hopes of eternal salvation. The third, Antonia, dies. The cause of her death is her own song and is brought about by the hypnotism of Mirabel. In the short epilogue Hoffmann again meets his friends in the tavern and the drinking chorus of the prologue closes the opera.

We will assume that our readers are still interested in Leschetizky and his disciples and proceed to say that "the class" are as usual in a turmoil. They have a grievance and should be satisfied. A great cry of distress has gone up and it is thusly: The middle of November is upon them and yet they have had no lessons. Währing has indeed felt the shock of approaching greatness. The villa on Karl Ludwig strasse has been thoroughly aired and cleaned. Leopold, major-domo and valet to the master (and a great man himself), has been seen and spoken to; but Leschetizky has come and gone—perhaps come again! He had visited Berlin in the interest, it is said, of his compositions. An irreverent spirit suggests that they will require his close attention, as they run considerable risk of being sadly neglected by posterity. And now we are told that Paderewski is in Vienna; and will not rehearsals in the Innere Stadt, and little suppers and billiards at Währing, preclude for another two weeks the possibility of regular lessons with Herr Professor? But Paderewski plays on the 14th and again on the 22d.

On the first evening he will give the "Emperor" Concerto, the Chopin F minor and his own Fantaisie, assisted by the Concert Gesellschaft Orchestra. Some feeble minds hope to enjoy the great artist's music; but loftier intellects, they of the inner circle, will bear down on the Grosser Musik Verein Saal, armed with opera glasses, field glasses, possibly some may resort to telescopes, and resolutely closing their ears, open their eyes and gloat over mechanism and muscles, learnedly discussing the point of the—athlete(?). To such heights have some risen!

MME. FANNY RICHTER IN MILWAUKEE.

THE appearance of Mme. Fanny Richter in Milwaukee on November 18 proved the pianistic event of the opening season in that music-loving city. The pianist appeared as the soloist in connecton wth the A Capell Club concert, and her success was almost unique in the unanimity of opinion among critics and local pianists Madame Richter-Fuchs may fairly claim a conquest of musical Milwaukee. Her program was well calculated to display her skill and technic, and she so deeply impressed the local musicians that, with but one hearing, she is, in her scholarly readings and sincerity, compared with Bloomfield-Zeisler, and in her reserve strength and temperament with Carreño. Milwaukee has a habit of comparing all newcomers of prodigious technic with the two artists just named, and, if the result is to a fair degree satisfactory, the pianist thus put to a severe test is surely enthusiastic admiration. It is certain that another appearance in Milwaukee would compel a repetition, greatly augmented, of Madame Richter's recent triumph. Following are extracts from some of the Milwaukee newspaper notices:

The Capella Choir's first concert of the current season took place at the Pabst Theatre last evening, on which occasion a new pianist appeared as soloist in the person of Mrs. Fanny Richter-Fuchs, a German virtuoso, who came highly recommended as having studied with Liszt and half a dozen lesser lights, together with the Berlin Royal School.

Madame Richter-Fuchs claims first attention by reason of her eminent talent. She is well equipped in all details of piano technic in addition to which she possesses sentiment and warmth of feeling all of which was demonstrated in her playing of the Beethoven Sonata, the three strongly contrasting movements being reproduced with delightful finish as far as mechanical means are concerned, while the beautiful andante was played with great depth of feeling and tenderness. In the Chopin selection she fully entered into the spirit of the Polish poet's sentiment, and Schumann's "Butterflies" received a brilliant interpretation. Her other selections served to increase the good impression made by the pianist and the somewhat noisy piece of Liszt resulted in an emphatic recall. She is a pianist who deserves her success.—The Sentinel.

Mrs. Fanny Richter-Fuchs was the soloist of the evening. He in Milwaukee we unconsciously measure all our lady pianists by the standard of Carreño. A very high standard undoubtedly—probably the highest—and we must be forgiven if we do not at first take kindly to any newcomer, for we like Carreño very much. Mrs. Fanny Richter-Fuchs did not touch us much until the last number—"The Magic Fire" and "St. Francis on the Waves" selection. In these she showed of what stuff she was made, and the audience knew it at once to be the genuine ring of the artist and asked for an encore, which it got—Paderewski's Polonaise. The Chopin Nocturne, Schumann's "Papillons" and "Grieg's "Carnival" appeared to be scholarly, technically correct and of sufficient temperamental conception.—Journal

The A Capella Choir opened its seventh season at the Pabst Theatre last evening to a large and representative German-American audience. Prof. William Boeppler, the musical director, had a feature in Mrs. Fanny Richter-Fuchs, of New York, and to say that she scored a success and won favor with the audience is putting it mildly. Her ability as an artist on the piano has never been questioned, and those who had seen her before immediately became impressed that she is a finished artist. She played some of Schumann, Chopin and Liszt concert pieces and Beethoven's "Appassionata."—News.

As soloist of the evening appeared the pianist Mrs. Fanny Richter-Fuchs. Having been taught in a most excellent school, this lady proved herself to be a proficient pianist, and who had been trained through a sound technic suitable for classic works, as the Sonata Appassionata of Beethoven; and she also proved that she knew how to interpret the modern works of Chopin, Schumann, Wagner-Brassin and Liszt. Mrs. Richter-Fuchs delighted the large and enthusiastic audience also with the "Feuerzauber" of Wagner-Brassin and with Liszt's composition, "Franciscus on the Waves." With these Mrs. Richter-Fuchs reached the height of her ability, and was called out before the audience several times and covered with applaus and with flowers.—German Herold (translation).

Eddy Organ Recital.

THE organ recital by Clarence Eddy at St. Bartholomew's Church last Monday evening attracted a large congregation of musicians and music lovers. The recital was under the auspices of the American Guild of Organists. St. Bartholomew's organ is one of the great church organs of the country, and only a master organist can manage its three divisions. Readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER know Mr. Eddy to be one of the skilled organists of the world, and therefore extended criticism of the performance seems unnecessary. The program, which contains three novelties and two compositions dedicated to Mr. Eddy, follows:

Fantaisie in F major (new)....West
Ave Maria....Bossi
Sonata Pathetique (new)....Baldwin
(Dedicated to Clarence Eddy.)
Intermezzo (new)....Hollins
Grand Chœur Dialogue....Gigout
Angelus....Starmer
Prelude and Fugue in A minor....J. S. Bach
Pastoral Interlude....Parker
(Dedicated to Clarence Eddy.)
Toccata in F major....Widor
From the Fifth Organ Symphony.

For a first hearing, the "Intermezzo" by Alfred Hollins proved the most agreeable of the new works. Mr. Baldwin's "Sonata Pathetique" was somewhat of a disappointment. Musical workmanship was there, but anything suggestive of the title seemed lacking. The principal motif of Luther's "Ein Feste Burg" was easily distinguished in the last movement. Hearing so much music, we can understand why modern composers are so frequently reminiscent in writing their scores. One of the most beautiful performances of the evening was the "Ave Maria," by Bossi, played on the solo organ. This showed to perfection Mr. Eddy's finished technic and rarely sympathetic tone.

Gregory Hast in Philadelphia.

FOLLOWING close upon his brilliant Milwaukee triumph, and the enthusiastic indorsement accorded his voice and art at his New York recital, Gregory Hast, the distinguished English tenor, sang in Philadelphia on the evening of November 20 and scored again in the Quaker city, as the appended press notices testify:

Gregory Hast, an English tenor, well known and well liked among London concert-goers, made his first appearance in Philadelphia at Witherspoon Hall last night. Mr. Hast's share in the program consisted of eighteen songs of widely varying character, including examples of early French, early Italian and early English ballads, besides German lieder and modern English songs. Such a selection affords a thorough test of a singer's abilities, and when it can be said, as it can with truth in this case, that with each succeeding number Mr. Hast added to the favorable impression that he made from the outset, it follows that he is an exceptionally talented and accomplished singer. His voice is a true tenor of very beautiful and sympathetic quality. Besides the natural charm of his voice, Mr. Hast's enunciation is so clear and distinct that every syllable he sings can be heard with ease, and his accent, whether he is singing in German, French or English, is of the purest. He is absolutely devoid of any affectations or mannerisms, yet he manages to convey to the most interesting manner the full meaning of the words he is singing. In fine, he is exceptionally accomplished, wholly delightful, and in the range of his voice, artistic skill, finished interpretation, smoothness and grace of style, Mr. Hast's singing could hardly be surpassed.—Philadelphia Ledger, November 21, 1901.

Mr. Hast's voice is a tenor of pure quality, sympathetic, and of admirable range, while his enunciation is of notable distinctness. The selections were of a varied nature, sufficient to test the powers and versatility of any singer, but Mr. Hast was successful in them all, and sang with most artistic effect in examples of French, Italian, German and English songs.—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, November 21, 1901.

In his selections of German lieder and old and modern English ballads, Mr. Hast displayed a good tenor voice, artistic feeling and a nice sense of interpretative proportion. His rendering of all the eighteen numbers revealed knowledge and experience.—Philadelphia Press, November 21, 1901.

Mr. Hast has an excellent voice of even register, and his diction in all languages is distinct and admirable in enunciation and phrasing. He made a pronounced impression, and another recital by him will be most acceptable.—Philadelphia Record, November 21, 1901.

Mr. Hast has an agreeable voice, clear enunciation, a graceful manner, and his delivery was admirable. He has precisely the right qualities for his choice of songs, including dramatic color, and there is a very important range of music in which it would be a pleasure to hear Mr. Hast again.—Philadelphia Times, November 21, 1901.

IONE BUSH RIDDELL.

NOTICE of two important concerts at the Pan-American Exposition were overlooked, and we take pleasure at this late day to give them a special notice. Miss Ione Bush Riddell, of Cincinnati, gave two fine organ concerts at the Temple of Music, October 7 and 8. Following is her program. She was assisted by Miss Eleanor A. Bain, contralto soloist, of Cincinnati, who sang very pleasingly:

It was apparent at once that Miss Riddell is an organist of unusual qualities and that the big organ under her touch was developing all of its power, and the music was interpreted with much fullness and fine poetic instinct. Connoisseurs were impressed by the variety of Miss Riddell's shading, phrasing and remarkable pianissimo effects, which were particularly fine in the Andantino in D flat, Lemare, while the "Fanfare," Lemmens, won much favor with the audience. Miss Riddell's technic is faultless and expression full of poetry and soulfulness.

Since her return from Buffalo, she has been very busy with a large class of pupils in piano and organ, and she will shortly give an organ recital at Rushville, Ind. She has at various times given organ recitals on the great organ in the Music Hall, Cincinnati, and she is closely identified with the musical culture of that city. Miss Riddell's musical education has been carefully nurtured in every detail, which is clearly demonstrated in her work as accompanist to soloists and choruses, her sympathetic nature lending itself particularly to this kind of work. She is organist of the Central Christian Church, of Cincinnati.

MRS. K. R.

Franz Listemann at Aeolian Recital.

THE favorite 'cellist played at the recital at Aeolian Hall last Saturday Godard's Berceuse, which he does with dainty grace and beautiful tone and the Cinquantaine Gavot by Gabriel-Marie. He played most artistically and was warmly applauded. Later he finished the program with a brilliant performance of Servais' "Daughter of the Regiment" fantaisie and had to bow many times. Charles Parkyn accompanied all these numbers on either the Piano or Aeolian in wonderfully sympathetic style, showing what may be done with the instruments in this direction.

Dahm-Petersen Lecture Recital.

THE Daily Gazette of Schenectady, N. Y., speaks highly of Mr. Dahm-Petersen's lecture-recital on "Practical Voice Culture," with vocal illustrations by himself and Miss Grace Sutter, a pupil. Members of his two choirs, of which he is director, were also present. There will follow a lecture on "Pronunciation" and one on "Style."

Otto Maehl.

Otto Maehl, the veteran German actor, who died in San Francisco on November 19, was the father of Mme. Norma Knupfel, the musical manager. The deceased was seventy-six years old. He came to this country in the 40's, and managed the first German theatre in New York. Another daughter, Miss Lillian Maehl, is a singer, who made her reputation in the West.

EUROPEAN NOTES.

In accordance with a new German law the Chancellor of the Empire has ordered the formation of commissions of experts in each state of the Empire. One commission is for literary works, and another specially for musical works. The registry where the names of authors must be inscribed is fixed at Leipsic.

The late performance of Offenbach's "Contes d'Hoffmann" at the Theatre am der Wien is the first time that it has been produced in Vienna since the terrible fire at the Ring Theatre, where 800 lives were lost.

A first representation of an opera, "Amor Fatale," was lately given at Constantinople by an Italian troupe. The music is by the conductor of the orchestra, Ernesto Sassone. The success is said to have been complete.

To mark the celebration of the centenary of Bellini, five unpublished pieces will be given to the world by the maestro, F. P. Frontini, who has also arranged them for voice and piano.

The San Carlos Theatre of Lisbon has engaged for the coming winter season the following troupe: Sopranos, Mmes. Gemma Bellincioni, Regina Pacini, Febea Strakosch, Adelina Stehle, Emma Caselli, Adalgisa Minotti and Adami-Corradetti; mezzo-soprano, Marchesini; tenors, MM. Bonci, Borgatti, Garbin, Clément, Anselmi, Zanatello; baritones, Menotti, Kaschmann, Pini-Corsi, Vincenzo Ardito and Ferruccio Corradetti; bassos, Oreste Luppi and Ciccolini. Conductors, MM. Luigi Mancinelli and Ettore Peroni.

"Come let us dance and sing" is all very well in its way, but it leads sometimes to trouble. The new arrangements of "The Merry Wives of Windsor" at Hof Oper, Vienna, comprise a ballet in the third act, with the forest at midnight filled with dancing and singing elves. Usually the corps de ballet dance and the ladies of the chorus sing. Mahler, however, has issued a decree: "The ladies of the chorus will take part in the dancing." As most of these ladies are of considerable antiquity, they replied: "We cannot dance. We never learned how." "Then you must learn," was Mahler's reply. So now a troupe of respectable, meritorious chorus ladies is marching about in the dancing room under the care of the ballet master, and in their old age beginning with the five positions. The chorus is now demanding justice and insisting that the ballet must be taught singing.

An opera by Orefice, entitled "Chopin," was lately announced. Now it seems that it is not a composition by Orefice, but an arrangement of passages taken from the works of the great piano artist.

At the first concert of the Museum Society of Frankfort the orchestra under Kogel performed Beethoven's C minor Symphony; "The Swan of Monela," legend for orchestra by J. Sibelius; Overture to "King Lear," by Berlioz, and Weber's "Freischütz" overture. Frau Lilian Blauvelt sang the Zerlina air from "Don Juan" and the mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet" with great success.

Teresa Carreño at the first concert of the Music Society of Eisenach played with success Chopin's B flat minor Sonata and Symphonic Studies by R. Schumann.

The Leipsic Signale, which has been provisionally edited by Max Steuer, will henceforth be definitely edited by Dr. Rudolf Schwarz. This gentleman enjoyed from 1882 to 1887 the instruction of Philipp Spitta, and is distinguished for his work in the Department of Musical History.

At Strassburg an old, unknown opera by Lortzing has been produced in honor of his 100th birthday. It is called "Hans Sachs," and surprises by its humor and wealth of melody, as well as its treatment of Wagner's master singer. Hans Sachs in this Lortzing work is represented as young, in love and is a baritone role.

More wunderkinder. The Cologne journals praise the impeccable technic, the beauty of tone and the energetic, expressive style of her play. She is at present studying under Joachim. At a late concert she was supported by her ten year old sister, who is also a wunderkind. The former, a violinist, is named Frida Quehl; the latter, a pianist, Valerie.

Paul Henrion, the founder of the "Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers of Music," in Paris, died lately in his eighty-fifth year.

Carl Ansorge has great success at Leipsic. His interpretation of the works of Bach, Chopin, Schumann and Liszt has gained for him a wide circle of friends, and his performances are always greeted with admiration and sympathy.

A society in Dresden is agitating for a discontinuance of the so-called "critic visits" paid by débutants to the newspaper critics. Nobody will be more delighted with the success of this innovation than the newspaper editors.

The New Lyric Theatre, of Madrid, was to be opened on November 15. It is to be a Spanish theatre in the strictest sense of the word. Spanish operas only will be given, and Spanish artists only are to appear.

Since the death of E. Bartay, director of the Conservatory of Budapest, there has been much intriguing as to a successor. By last reports Eugen Hubay, the violinist at the Royal Academy, has the best chance.

FLAVIE VAN DEN HENDE.—Miss Flavie Van den Hende, the distinguished young 'cellist, after a long and delightful summer in the mountains of Virginia, has returned to her New York residence rested and refreshed for a season that promises to be both long and active. Aside from a number of important orchestral and concert bookings, Miss Van den Hende will give recitals here and elsewhere. Her first date in Brooklyn is December 6, followed by some very exclusive drawing-room engagements, with which she is always so successful. She is making them a specialty this season.

Von Klenner Pupils' Musicale.

TUESDAY, November 19, Madame Von Klenner gav the first of her musical talks to her pupils. Madam Von Klenner believes that her pupils can do better wor if they have an intelligent understanding of the subject the are trying to attain, and it is therefore her principle t explain everything in connection with the art of singin with such simplicity that her pupils cannot help but sin intelligently and correctly.

MACONDA ON THE COAST.

A LUCKY star pursues Mme. Charlotte Maconda through her tour on the Pacific Coast. In God's own climate the weather does not hamper the singer as it does in sections where the rigors of winter too often tell upon the voice. Everywhere in the Far West Maconda has captured her audiences, and from the critics received discriminating tributes. Madame Maconda was the soloist at the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra concert on November 15, and in their reports the local papers accorded the singer high praise. The criticisms follow:

The soloist on this occasion was Mme. Charlotte Maconda. Madame Maconda sang "Ah! fors e Lui" ("Traviata") and the Mad Scene from "Lucia." The latter was substituted for the "Bell Song" from "Lakmé" (Delibes), advertised, as on arrival the orchestral score of the "Lakmé" selection was found unsuitable. Madame Maconda won a deserved triumph. Her voice is a coloratura soprano of extreme flexibility and great sweetness and purity. Her bird-like trills and her cantilene are beautiful. The liquid quality of her middle register is a delight—rather a rare delight in a strictly coloratura soprano. Madame Maconda's voice has a breadth and warmth, too, which add greatly to the charm of her singing. Her greatest triumph yesterday was undoubtedly the glorious Mad Scene. Its execution was as nearly faultless as the human voice can be, but besides execution, there was that appealing, melting sweetness of tone which delighted the ears and stirred the emotions of all who were fortunate enough to be present.—Los Angeles Times, November 16, 1901.

The greatest success was made by Mme. Charlotte Maconda, an importation from the far East. She has been singing in New England and came here from a successful music festival. She captivated her audience yesterday before she had sung a dozen bars, and she received an ovation. Her little encore was especially happy, and the substitution of the Mad Scene from "Lucia di Lammermoor" for the "Bell Song" met favor. Madame Maconda has won more than a success d'estime, and her pretty manner of responding to encores won her a firm place in the hearts of Los Angeles music lovers.—Los Angeles Record, November 16, 1901.

Mme. Charlotte Maconda, the coloratura soprano, sang "Ah! fors lui" ("La Traviata") and fairly took the house by storm. Her voice, of great clearness and flexibility, has all the airy graces that go with Verdi and the Italian school. * * * Madame Maconda responded with an encore no less lovely than her first number, and later in the program gave the mad music from "Lucia" in a bewitching way.—Los Angeles Express, November 16, 1901.

The first concert of the Los Angeles Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1901-2 was given at the Los Angeles Theatre yesterday afternoon. The soloist was Mme. Charlotte Maconda, one of the best of the light coloratura sopranos now on the concert stage. Her selections admirably displayed her warm, rich voice; its flexibility, her exquisite taste in phrasing and a facility of execution that made of the rather trivial "Sempre Libera" a thing of joy and beauty. The "Lucia" mad Scene, which was substituted for the "Bell Song," and the encores, arias from "The Sicilian Vespers" and "Mignon," were rendered finely, and these brilliant and embellished airs were given with charming effect. Madame Maconda has a sympathy and warmth that bring her closer to her audience.—Herald, Los Angeles, November 16, 1901.

William A. Wegener.—William A. Wegener, the tenor, filled three important engagements in Baltimore, Philadelphia and Chicago last week.

Minne Humphryes.—The music at the dedication of the new Greenwood Baptist Church, Brooklyn, was a feature. At the morning service Mrs. Minne Humphryes, the soprano soloist of the choir, sang Whitney Coombs' "Gallilee" with violin obligato. In the evening Mrs. Humphryes sang "O Divine Redeemer," by Gounod. Fourteen hundred people attended the service, and many members of the church congratulated Mrs. Humphryes upon her beautiful singing.

TO WELCOME KUBELIK.

Societies and Musicians will Meet the Steamer To-day—His First Program.

GREAT preparations are under way for the reception of Jan Kubelik, the young Bohemian violinist, who will reach here on the Majestic to-day. Several Bohemian, Hungarian and Austrian societies, as well as a large number of musicians, will be at the pier to welcome the talented boy. If the predictions of his managers are verified, and there seems every possibility of it, Kubelik will be one of the sensations of the season.

"How often do you find Carnegie Hall almost sold out in advance for a first appearance in America?" they asked yesterday. "Up to Saturday evening two-thirds of the seating capacity of the hall and twenty-nine of the boxes had been sold, and we expect to sell every seat in the house before Monday night, when Kubelik makes his début."

Here is Kubelik's program for next Monday night in Carnegie Hall, with Emil Paur and orchestra and Miss Jessie Shay pianist:

Overture, Tannhäuser.....Wagner
Concerto, D major (with cadenza by Sauret).....Paganini
Herr Kubelik.
Piano selection, Larghetto, Allegro Agitato, from Concerto, op. 16.....Henselt
Miss Shay.
Concerto No. 8 (in form einer gesang scene).....Spohr
Herr Kubelik.
Preludes from Lohengrin, Acts I. and III.....Wagner
Carneval Russe.....Wieniawski
Herr Kubelik.
Rudolf Friml, accompanist.

Kubelik will give his first recital the following Saturday, December 7, in Carnegie Hall.

THE TONKUNSTLER SOCIETY.

LAST Tuesday evening this society gave an interesting musical entertainment at the Aschenbrodel.

The following program was presented acceptably:

Sonata I. for piano and violin, F major, op. 8.....Grieg
Miss Pauline Semnacher and Ernst H. Bauer.
Scene for contralto, Die Wallfahrt nach Kevlaar, op. 17.....Klein
Mrs. M. J. Scherhey, accompanied by the composer.
Piano soli—
Prelude from G minor Suite, op. 31.....Bargiel
Scherzo, E flat minor, op. 4.....Brahms
Johannes Ziegler.
Contralto soli—
Poème d'Amour, op. 46, No. 1.....Klein
Hush Thee, Baby, op. 65, No. 2.....Klein
The Bridegroom, Ballade, op. 46, No. 4.....Klein
Mrs. M. J. Scherhey, accompanied by the composer.

The audience was appreciative and even enthusiastic.

Miss Semnacher and Ernst Bauer gave a capital performance of the Grieg Sonata.

The singing of Mrs. Scherhey was a delight, and she was forced to give a repetition of several of the songs. Mr. Klein shared in the honors. His songs sung on this occasion are among the best he has written. The accompaniments he played irreproachably.

Mr. Ziegler revealed a polished technic and much musical intelligence, playing his solos so effectively as to win an encore.

The audience was made up principally of musicians.

ZUDIE HARRIS.

[By Cable.]

Berlin, November 26, 1901.

Musical Courier, New York:

"ZUDIE HARRIS, the pianist, had great success with orchestra here last night. Harmonica."

RICHMOND NEWS.

Rose Cecelia Shay Successful.

Richmond, Va., November 22, 1901.

THE Rose Cecelia Shay Opera Company gave three performances in Richmond last week, "Carmen," "Il Trovatore" and "Martha" being the operas presented. The chorus did excellent work, singing and acting with spirit and great enthusiasm. Each opera was well mounted and much care was given to details.

Miss Shay's singing was always a feature of the performance, and there seems nothing in the way of the company making a completely successful tour.

Monday evening the "Peabody Faculty" gave a concert at the Academy, this being the second of the course of musical attractions promised by Mr. MacLachlan The members of the faculty who took part in this recital are young musicians, but artists of thorough technic and exquisite musical culture. Miss Clara Ascherfeld, the pianist, pleased everyone, her artistic interpretation and skillful execution being unusual. Mr. Rabold, the baritone, made an impression which will not soon be forgotten. Miss Margaret Cummings has a lovely soprano voice and sings well. Abram Moses is already a good violinist and is a growing musician.

The program was admirably arranged and the audience became so enthusiastic that they tried to induce the musicians to give numerous encores. The program was as follows:

Three piano solos—
Scherzo in E minor.....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
On Wings of Love.....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Caprice Espagnol.....Moszkowski
Baritone solo, Recitative and Aria from Tannhäuser.....Wagner
Soprano solo, Aria from the opera Lucia di Lammermoor..Donizetti
Three violin solos—
Romance in F major.....Beethoven
L'Abeille.....Schubert
Czardas.....Hubay
Duet for soprano and baritone, Recitative and Aria from Oratorio Elijah.....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Two piano solos—
Waltz in C sharp minor.....Chopin
Polonaise in E flat major.....Chopin
Two baritone solos—
Who Is Sylvia?.....Schubert
Gypsy John.....Clay
Three soprano solos—
Nymphs and Shepherds.....Purcell

GERMAN HEADQUARTERS OF THE MUSICAL COURIER,
BERLIN, W., LINKSTRASSE 17.

November 25, 1901.

NIKISCH'S program at the third Philharmonic concert was neither too frivolous nor yet too severely classical. One or two of the fire eaters among the critics grumbled in print at being deprived of their customary Beethoven and Brahms. They are a curious set. When Nikisch plays no classics they complain; when he does, they rend them into shreds. How, then, is poor Nikisch to act? He is to do precisely what he does; that is, prepare his own programs, play them in his own way, and say to the critics what Commodore Vanderbilt once said to the American public. Nikisch is many things, and brave.

Berlioz's sumptuously orchestrated overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," opened the program. What a painter, what a superb mixer of musical colors, was that strange genius, Hector Berlioz! Assuredly, it seems early to talk of him as one of the dead composers. Our young orchestral writers are learning from him every day. Nikisch and his orchestra gave the work a splendid reading, full of force and fire.

Fritz Volbach's new symphonic poem, "Es waren zwei Königskinder" ("There were two children of kings") is a composition that requires neither much explanation nor comment. The tale that underlies the music is based on the ancient legend of the bold youth who nightly swam a swift running river, in order to reach the arms of his lady love. The legend is probably best known as that of "Hero and Leander."

Volbach dwells more on the lyrical, the romantic side of the saga, than on the tragical. In his music are yearning, impatience, joy, bliss. The episode that describes the tragedy—to my mind the strongest moment of the story—is surprisingly short. Several unresolved chords and a few commonplace chromatic passages denote the treacherous extinguishing of the guiding torch, and the agony of the frenzied lad, battling in inky darkness with the torrent. Possibly Volbach means this musical terseness to express the quick end of the youth, but that would be a bit of cleverness which is not displayed elsewhere in the score. In an orchestral composition, as in every work of art, there must be light and shade, contrast, balance. The purely lyrical portions of the piece were melodious and rich in romantic coloring. "Es waren zwei Königskinder" was readily understood and liberally applauded by the audience.

The symphony was Schubert's in C. Of this posthumous work, discovered by Schumann in Vienna, that generous critic wrote: "The symphony is of a heavenly length." Nikisch's performance did much to make this length interesting. Unusual tempi, unfamiliar phrasing? That may have been naughty, but it was nice. That is why he is Nikisch, and the other—Rebicek.

Godowsky, rapidly becoming one of Berlin's few favorites, played the Tschaikowsky Piano Concerto in B flat minor. This work has been heard here often. Godowsky gave us an interpretation new and radical. He played it as he plays everything, with rare musical mastery and amazing technical grasp. A few false notes mattered nothing. In fact, coming from a man with such impudent technic they were rather a relief. Godowsky's conception was new, inasmuch as he made of the work a logical, cohesive whole, and not a formless fantaisie, like most other pianists. Personally, I do not care for logic in Tschaikowsky; but I must admit that Godowsky's always sounds convincing. At times I could have wished for a bit of that theatrical temperament which Godowsky, serious artist that he is, despises so heartily. His success was spontaneous and decided.

Our Royal Opera devoted most of last week to an extensive Mozart Festival. On Wednesday the beautiful C minor Mass was performed. The opera chorus sang with precision, volume and taste. This was the first Berlin production of the Mass. It made a deep impression. On Thursday there was a splendid performance of "The Magic Flute"; on Friday "Figaro" was married to vocal music very much marred in execution and intonation. On Friday evening the Joachim Quartet played some familiar Mozart numbers in familiar style. On Saturday Weingartner led the Symphonies in G minor, in E flat and C ("Jupiter"). On Sunday there was a production of "Don Juan," and on the same day, in the morning, a repetition of the C minor Mass. There was only a lukewarm interest in the festival, and public patronage fell very much below managerial expectations.

Richard Strauss is holding the even tenor of his way with the Tonkünstler symphony concerts. The second took place last Monday, and differed from the first, in that it attracted a larger audience, presented a more interesting program, better played, and aroused the audience to what seemed a superlative degree of enthusiasm.

The work of the players deserves greatest praise; Richard Strauss is above it. Several minor slips in the brasses sounded as if they were caused by the desire to do too well.

The long program opened with D'Indy's "La forêt enchantée," a symphonic legend, based on a ballad of Uhland.

Harald and his host ride through a wild forest by night. Ghostly voices hum about them. Sirens appear and tempt the warriors from their horses. Immediately the weaklings lose their souls. Only Harald resists the caresses of the sirens. Deserted, alone, he wanders about, and finally drinks from a limpid brook. The draught puts him to sleep, and there, deep in the woods, he slumbers to-day, his head sunk on his breast, his beard grown long and white, his idle sword rusting at his side.

To transcribe this poem into music requires a sure orchestral technic and an intimate knowledge of the forest music in Wagner's "Siegfried." Vincent d'Indy seems to possess both.

Tschaikowsky's Symphonic Ballad, a posthumous work, his op. 78, tells an infinitely more human tale, and is correspondingly dramatic and vital. A Russian squire and his man are galloping over the steppes toward home. The squire is tortured by mad jealousy of his young wife. Arrived home, he finds her gone. Master and man, the latter armed with a gun, steal into the garden. Here, in an arbor, sits the young wife, at her feet a pleading youth. The two men crawl nearer. At the moment that the woman throws herself into the youth's arms the squire commands his man to shoot. A report is heard and the bullet buries itself in the heart of—the squire!

I tell the story of the poem, for a description of Tschaikowsky's music could contain nothing new. Tschaikowsky is always himself—a fact more remarkable than it sounds. The galloping of the horses, the savage fury of this feudal lord, the love passages, the shot, the death struggles, all are characterized with startling faithfulness. It is said that Tschaikowsky did not wish a public performance of "The Woywode," for it is one of his earliest compositions. We are not always competent critics of our own work.

Hausegger's "Dionysian Fantaisie" is a puzzling piece. Puzzling because it portrays a puzzling poem. The program presented us with 144 lines of close print by way of explanation and illustration for one of the most complicated orchestral scores ever penned. We were given only a few moments for the reading of the 144 lines. I, for one, neither finished the poem nor understood what little I had time to read. It was necessary, therefore, to judge the composition as absolute music and to let it tell its own tale.

It told me that Hausegger is a painter of huge musical canvases, that he has an eye and an ear for mass effects, and that he is an artist in the presentment and arrangement of these effects. It told me that in this "Dionysian Fantaisie" Hausegger tries to do more than merely tell a story of bacchanalian revel. There were martial strains, lyric episodes, climaxes that suggested the struggles of great armies, harmonies that spoke of gloom, despair, death, and a glorious apotheosis, triumphant, religious, celestial. The whole seemed like an optimistic portraiture of the life and fate of man.

Hausegger's orchestration is of the most modern. He blends Berlioz, Wagner and Strauss into colors that are radiant and sometimes blinding. We are reminded of Kipling's seven league picture and the brush of comet's hair. The harmonies are frequently cacophonous, and the noises almost deafening. There is no halting in thematic or orchestral invention. The work sweeps on with tremendous force and vitality, and to me, at least, in spite of its elemental ugliness and its looseness of form, is eminently convincing.

Some day I shall read those 144 lines, in order to see whether I carried away the correct idea of the music.

By way of contrast to all this symphonic fare, Professor Halir played Charles Löffler's "Divertimento," for violin and orchestra. The first two movements of the work are dainty beyond comparison. The orchestration is woven about the solo part like a gossamer of finest texture. Rarely has there been accomplished such extreme delicacy in the treatment of a large orchestra. Professor Halir played the first two movements with extreme taste and technic. Then he practiced some passages in thirds. That was the last movement of the "Divertimento," variations on a theme from the "Dies Irae."

Liszt's "Tasso," sounding very bombastic and blatant after the frenzied dynamics of Tschaikowsky and Hausegger, ended an exceptional program, exceptionally played.

At the second concert of the Joachim Quartet these delightful novelties were given: Quartets, E major, by Cherubini; B flat, op. 67, by Brahms, and E minor, op. 59, by Beethoven. These composers proved to be not without talent.

During the past few years there has been almost a deluge of very young men who play the piano extremely well. Josef Hofmann, Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Ernst von Dohnanyi, Mark Hambourg, Akos von Buttykay, Richard Buhlig and Gottfried Galston are some of the names familiar to persons who watch the trend of pianistic events. To this list, and yet apart from it, belongs the name of Arthur Schnabel. He must be mentioned separately, because, first and foremost, he is a composer of individuality, and secondly, because he is a pianist of individuality—two artistic qualities that are rarely united in a young man just out of his teens.

I heard Schnabel play his own concerto in D minor, with orchestra. It is a work of strong originality, an opus that justifies me in predicting for the youthful artist a more than ordinarily brilliant future as a composer. Schnabel is not a seeker after the pretty phrase, nor a friend of perfunctory harmonies. He is brusque and bold, and often sacrifices beauty for truth. He is astoundingly clever in avoiding what we expect. Whether this trait is the result of extreme skill, or an integral part of the melodic conception, it is most difficult to determine. I am inclined to give Schnabel the benefit of the doubt. In either event, the result is very refreshing. The broad opening theme, the darkly-colored slow movement, and the naïve rondo were the best moments of the piece.

In his playing young Schnabel revealed himself as a pianist of the objective type, absolutely serious and legitimate. He has a clear, logical idea of everything he plays. It is his endeavor to set in the plainest possible light the entire harmonic and melodic structure of a piece. Variety of touch and clean-cut technic constitute his other artistic virtues. Altogether an extraordinary youth, amazingly sane and well balanced, this Arthur Schnabel.

Professor Halir did nothing new at his concert, except his own Concerto, D major, for violin. The piece is extremely interesting and of splendid workmanship. The themes in the first movement are broad and melodious. The andante is exquisite in conception and treatment. The last part reminds one too much of Ries' "Perpetuum." Halir and Richard Strauss lived together in Weimar. I think this concerto must have lain on a pile of Strauss' manuscripts for several days. In the Mozart Concerto Professor Halir gave a very uneven performance. He was evidently nervous. The cadenza was hurried almost beyond recognition.

In the Brahms Concerto an accident happened. Professor Halir stopped. Opinions are divided as to whether there was a slip of memory or a slip of the E string. In the first two numbers Professor Halir played from the printed page; there were no slips. This playing from music seems to be a habit with the professors at the Hochschule. It is a bad example for the students. A large audience applauded anything and everything.

In her piano recital, Alma Stencel displayed many qualities which had been effectually cloaked at the first concert by the sonorous accompaniment of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Free to follow her own inclinations, she proved herself possessed of rhythm and temperament.

The short frocked, golden curled little virtuosa adapts herself to various styles and schools, a musical accomplishment that many of her older colleagues cannot boast. Beethoven's Rondo e Capriccio, op. 129, a group of Bach numbers, most cleverly adapted by Hugo Mansfeldt, and Brahms' "Nine Waltzes," op. 39, were differentiated with keen musical acumen. "On Pinions of Song," Mendelssohn-Liszt, and Chopin's C minor Etude, op. 10, No. 12, were the least satisfactory numbers. The former lacked lyricism, the latter suffered from too much pedal. Schubert's F minor Impromptu was a masterful achievement, technically and musically. Chopin's "Butterfly" study was delightfully done, and had to be repeated. Liszt's "Héroide-Elégiaque" (Fifth Rhapsody), and "Hungarian" Rhapsody, No. 13, ended with éclat a program most surprisingly played. The audience was insatiable, and would not lessen its enthusiasm until Miss Stencel had added Liszt's arrangement of Alabieff's "Nightingale."

Maurice Kaufmann, a young American violinist, gave a concert with orchestra at Beethoven Hall, and revealed himself as a player of unusual powers and even greater promise. He has individuality, even if not yet entirely ripened, and that is the rarest of musical virtues. Mr. Kaufmann's technic is exceedingly well developed, and with a little more refining, especially in rapid passage work, should become all-comprehensive. His playing of the Brahms Concerto was a performance worthy of unstinted praise. He displayed a sure musical and mechanical grasp of this most difficult and most ungrateful violin work. In Wieniawski's "Faust" adaptation there were brilliancy and verve.

An eminently notable achievement of the young artist was the fact that he actually made the Philharmonic players bestir themselves a bit. They did it sulkily enough, to be sure, but they were plainly dominated by this determined young man. Bravo, Mr. Kaufmann! That is what the audience said, long and loudly, and they were rewarded with a fantastic Hubay czardas, dashed off with vim and virtuosity.

I shall try to crowd into a sententious résumé reports of other recent concerts, more or less important, and more or less good:

Dr. Felix Kraus is a profoundly earnest basso, with a fine voice and excellent delivery. Madame Krause-Osborne is very sympathetic and musical. The Grünfeld-Zajic concert was a happy-go-lucky affair. The subscribers go there to enjoy a program of music not all too tragical, and they get it. Conrad Ansorge's piano playing was equivocal. In the Smetana Trio he was too much in evidence, in his solos, too little. Richard Strauss' symphony concerts are already bearing fruit. Weingartner actually produced a novelty at his third concert, "Variations on an Original Theme," by Elgar, an Englishman. The work is strikingly original, and most effective. Elgar has disdained the conventional method of making variations, and his changes lie in curious harmonic and rhythmic turns, rather than in the usual elaborate ornamentation that hides the theme without varying it. Arrigo Serrato is a violinist of considerable technic, great temperament and tonal charm. Ida Reiter-Reich must be able to boast of a blacksmith among her ancestors. Irma Saenger-Sethe and Alfred Reisenauer played sonatas for violin and piano. The lady by far outshone her partner. She should procure a musical divorce. F. della Sudda, a Turkish pianist, seemed to have nougat on his fingers. Aldo Antonietti is Italian only in name. In his playing there is no trace of the South. Technic, plenty. Warmth and charm, none. Wilhelmine Niehr-Bingenheimer, remarkable only for her name. E. Howard-Jones, pianist, scholarly, staid and sure. Tilly Braun-Wachholz, singer, funny without knowing it. Paul Heilbrun, pianist, funnier. Minna Weidele, singer, with an aspen-leaf voice. It shook. Advice to a trio headed by Maria Bruno, piano: Please don't any more. Elfrieda Rodha, an electrical soprano. She shocked her audience. Therese Behr, an accomplished artist, with a full, rich voice, and most interesting interpretation. Joan Manén, a grandly gifted young violinist, with much of Sarasate's grace and charm. Engelbert Haas and Eugene Brieger should do their vocal practicing at home. Maria Spies, singer, gave her concert one year too soon. Alexandrine Zanolli, violin, a dashing player, with brilliant technic and sensuous tone. Etelka Freund pounded too much at her second piano recital; Victor Staub pounded too little at his orchestral concert. The Hollaender Quartet deserves more general recognition. In some respects it is superior to the Joachim aggregation. Two quintets by Friedrich Gernsheim were done beautifully. They are fine works, of elevated temper and refined workmanship. Lamond's four Beethoven recitals have come to an end. I attended one of them; that is, I stayed half an hour at each. He drew only fair sized audiences, but won warm praise in the press. At her second concert, Frida Quehl, violinist, confirmed my impression of last week, that she is a talent of exceptional promise. Alphonse Mustel and Joseph Bizet, from Paris, gave a concert for the purpose of displaying the Mustel make of harmoniums. These instruments are supplied with various new devices for producing volume, variety and beauty of tone. The most original of these patents is a stop which produces the effect of a duet for piano and organ. Joseph Bizet played some of his own works, written to emphasize the virtues of the Mustel harmonium. Grace Forbes, a coloratura soprano, made an excellent impression in the "Traviata" aria, "Ah fors é lui." Further study should make of her a very useful artist. Anna Weisshahn, a soprano, is too lachrymose. She takes herself too seriously. Gertrude Rombell, soprano, has a fine figure. Vita Gerhardt, pianist, hasn't. Julia Culp, of Amsterdam, is one of the best contraltos Berlin has heard for many months. Her voice is very much like Schumann-Heink's, and in vocal art, too, Miss Culp is not far behind her famous colleague. Karl Mayer, a robustious vocalist, sang enthusiastically to a large and admiring audience. That style of vocalism is much admired here. Richard Buhlig, a pianist, affects a prodigious mop of hair. That is the only respect in which he resembles Paderewski.

of music here, under Hubert Ries and Ferdinand Laub (violin). From 1881 to 1890 Urban was an instructor at Kullak's Academy of Music. Later he became critic of the Vossische Zeitung, and formed a large class of pupils in theory, counterpoint and composition. Of his own works, a symphony, "Spring"; a concert overture for orchestra, "Fiesco and Scheherezade," and a concerto for violin, were the most important. None of his compositions attained to popularity. As a critic he was mild, discerning and didactic.

Last week's musical bill of fare at our Royal Opera contained these courses: "Tristan and Isolde," "Hänsel and Gretel," "Die Puppenfee" (ballet), "Fra Diavolo," "Walküre," "Cavelleria Rusticana," Pagliacci" and "Lohengrin." At the Theater des Westens these works were performed: "Waffenschmied" (Lortzing), "Marriage of Figaro," "Gypsy Baron," "Don Juan" and "Freischütz."

Otto Hegner, the erstwhile piano prodigy, is to be the soloist of the next Wüllner Symphony Concert in Cologne. Hegner will play Brahms' B flat Concerto.

Recent additions to Berlin's large colony of American music students are: Miss Lake (vocal), Washington, D. C.; J. H. Logan (piano), Halifax, N. S.; Miss Haskell (vocal), St. Louis, Mo.; Miss Powers (piano), Chicago, Ill.; Miss Adler (vocal), San Francisco, Cal.; Miss Listemann (vocal), Chicago, Ill.; Misses Holinger (vocal), Chicago, Ill.; Louis Hirsch (piano), New York city; Miss Newkirk (vocal), Philadelphia, Pa.; Miss Edwards (vocal), Helena, Mont.; Geo. Reed (vocal), Chicago, Ill.; Kelley Cole (vocal), New York city; Miss Sylvana (vocal), New York city; Miss Sada Wertheim (violin), San Francisco, Cal.; Mr. Lowne (vocal), New York city; Mr. Blackmore (piano), Tacoma, Wash.; Miss Mame Coton (violin), Danville, Ill.; Miss Ollie Siner (piano), Denver, Col., and Miss Winifred Preston (violin), Brooklyn, N. Reports continue to pour in of Moriz Rosenthal's extraordinary successes in Russia. The dailies devote columns to his playing and to his personality. They call him the most interesting figure, as pianist and man, in the modern artist world. The leading Moscow paper refers to him as "the Liszt of our generation in mind and music." Rosenthal's latest triumph was in Warsaw, where he gave a sensational performance of the Schumann Concerto.

Adele Aus der Ohe, the pianist, played two recitals at her home for an invited audience. She will spend the winter in Italy. Her brother, the well-known painter, Gustav Aus der Ohe, has just completed a large canvas for the New Church, in Magdeburg.

Teresita Carreño, the gifted daughter of a famous mother, has just been engaged for a winter tour through Russia.

Prominent artists who have recently achieved success at orchestral concerts in various parts of Germany are: Raoul Pugno, in Barmen; Jacques Thibaud, at a Zumpe concert in Munich, and Ysaye, at a Kaim concert in Munich.

Leopold Auer has written a new and interesting cadenza for the first movement of the Beethoven Violin Concerto. Holy horror on the part of the Joachim clique is now in order.

Hans Sitt resigned from the leadership of the Leipsic Singakademie. His successor will be Gustave Borchers.

At four concerts to take place in Saal Bechstein, Waldemar Meyer has set himself the herculean task of playing twelve concertos for the violin. The works to be presented are by J. S. Bach (E major), Mozart (D major), Beethoven, Paganini (D major), Ernst (F sharp minor), Vieuxtemps (D moll), Spohr ("Gesangsscene"), Mendelssohn, Brahms, Joachim (Hungarian Concerto), Bruch (No. 3) and Sinding (No. 1).

Ottilie Metzger, first contralto in Cologne, has just been engaged for three years at the Hamburg Opera. This young woman, with her volcanic temperament and her enormous voice, will soon have a world wide reputation.

There have been two recent operatic productions of note. Hans Pfitzner's new opera, "The Rose of Love," achieved a triumph in Elberfeld. The composer conducted. Richard Strauss' "Feuersnoth" was given in Dresden, with every outward sign of immense success. Strauss led, and appeared repeatedly before the curtain. Our Dresden correspondent will dissect for you the plot and music of "Feuersnoth." I will whisper now that the book is based on a salacious tale from the "Decameron."

Wilhelm Mauke, the critic of the Munich Post, is in a pretty pickle. He has long been known as a bitter antagonist of Felix Weingartner, and when that gentleman recently conducted a Kaim subscription concert in Munich, Mr. Mauke let loose the following diatribe: "He failed to jump into the breach with 'Till Eulenspiegel.' Without temperament, without a left arm, almost automatically, he beat to death the droll, whimsical composition of his colleague. (Richard Strauss). Why did he do this? Do Strauss' laurels embarrass Weingartner, or did he wish to show us that even a prosaic interpretation cannot rob this poetical piece of its overwhelming effect?" So far Mr. Mauke. But now comes Weingartner, with a letter to the Munich press, saying that not "Till Eulenspiegel," but Strauss' "Death and Apotheosis," was played at the concert in question! The feelings of Mr. Mauke, who probably had not attended the concert, would be interesting in print. It must have been a pleasant moment when he faced his editor.

A few news items from the theatres: Gerhard Hauptmann's "The Red Rooster" is to receive its first production to-night. The piece plays in a Berlin tenement. "Miss Hobbs," by Jerome K. Jerome, translated into German, made a hit at the Dresden Royal Theatre last week. It is to be given here soon. Mme. Josefine Reinl, the excellent artist, will remain at the Berlin Royal Opera. Her contract has just been prolonged for five years. A baritone, Wilhelm Kruse, from Lübeck, will soon make some trial appearances here.

The late Arnold Böcklin seems to have been more than a great painter. A song from his pen was published last week in the Berlin Welt-Spiegel. The modest lyric, set to a poem by Goethe, is extremely musical and most expressive.

Paul Prill, the successor of Hermann Zumpe at the Schwerin Opera, has rapidly made himself popular with his new public. For his leading of "Tannhäuser" and Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte" he received warmest praise from critics and audience. Prill's brother, Paul, is solo flutist of the Berlin Royal Opera. Another brother, Carl, is concertmaster at the Vienna Royal Opera.

The American composer has actually figured on a European concert program. At a recent violin recital in London Sigmund Beel and Henry Bird played Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's Sonata for Violin and Piano, in A minor, op. 34.

Mr. Eckhardt, of Cleveland, Ohio, who has been studying here for several years, recently published a very interesting book of bowing exercises for violin and violoncello. The work has won the indorsement of such artists as Joachim, Hekking, Wirth, Hilf, Marteau and Witek.

Rubin Goldmark, of New York, an extremely talented composer, has arrived in Berlin, and expects to spend the winter here. Several of his compositions are to be heard in concert soon.

The Tageblatt speaks feelingly of the penury of minor Berlin musicians. New York, Boston, Chicago and many smaller American cities have a similar tale to tell.

M. Lhèvin, winner of the latest Rubinstein competition in piano playing, will soon give a recital. Godowsky referred to the young Pole as the "king of octave playing."

I don't know whether you have heard that Dvorák has been appointed director of the Prague Conservatory, succeeding Anton Bennewitz, who resigned on account of advanced age.

A German statistician says that in a musicians' directory of the Borough of Manhattan there are listed more than 1,200 piano teachers, 700 vocal teachers, and 650 violin teachers. Some of our American students here, who are aiming for New York, would like to see a reliable directory of the pupils.

The proposed production of "Der Ring des Nibelungen," at the Prince Regent Opera House, Munich, has been postponed till 1903, in order to give Bayreuth the monopoly next year. The Wagner operas chosen for Munich, therefore, are "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "Tristan" and "Die Meistersinger," and there will be twenty-one model representations of those works between August 7 and September 11.

Have you ever heard of Teplitz, in Bohemia? It is a town about the size of Troy, N. Y. It has a symphony orchestra, which gives six concerts each season. Among the works to be produced there this winter are: Bruckner's Symphony in E flat (!), Borodine's Symphony in B minor (!!), and Hausegger's "Barbarossa." (!!!) The soloists at the six concerts will be Teresa Carreño, Fritz Kreisler, Edouard Risler, Vittoro Arimondi, Hugo Becker and Eugene Ysaye. How do they do it? American papers in cities of about 30,000 inhabitants and over, please copy carefully.

The prospectus of the Mannheim Conservatory (Mannheim is a city in South Germany) talks of the "encouraging progress" of the institution for the past year. I looked up the prospectus of 1900. Then there were 138 pupils. This year there are 139. Oh, the dear old patient, plodding Fatherland!

I am authoritatively informed that the report current in German papers of Fräulein Ida Heidler's (Berlin Opera) engagement for next season's Wagner performances in London is entirely without foundation. Fräulein Heidler appears to have a press agent and a steady eye on America.

There are more good things in Nuremberg than dolls, beer and Christmas cake. A philharmonic orchestra has just been started there with a large financial guarantee.

Rimsky-Korsakoff's new opera, with the simple title of "Zarskaja Newjesta" ("Bride of the Czar"), is about to be produced in St. Petersburg.

Geraldine Farrar, the New York girl who recently achieved success at the Royal Opera in "Faust," will sing Violetta, in "Traviata," end of this week.

HARMONICA.

Broad Street Conservatory.

THERE are few recitals by students more entertaining than those given at the Broad Street Conservatory, 1331 South Broad street, Philadelphia, under the direction of Mr. Combs, and the program presented on Wednesday evening, December 4, was in every way up to the standard of the institution. The vocalists, Miss Louise De Ginther and Miss Luna Dickson, both pupils of Herbert W. Greene, were delightfully entertaining, while the pianists represented the work done with Mr. Combs, the director. A number deserving special mention is the harp solo "Aubade," by Hasselman, which was played in a graceful manner by Miss Helen Ullom, a pupil of Mr. Cortesi. The program from the beginning to the concluding duet evidenced the quality of the work done at the conservatory. Every number was creditably prepared, and showed throughout earnest, sincere application to study.

GASTON M. DETHIER.—Gaston M. Dethier, organist of St. Francis Xavier Church, New York, whose remarkable command of his instrument is the wonder and admiration of all who have heard him play, recently gave two recitals, one at Bridgeport, Conn., and the other at Buffalo, N. Y. The criticisms which follow will serve to indicate his success:

A most remarkable exhibition of organ playing was given last evening at the opening recital at St. Mary's Church by Gaston M. Dethier, organist of St. Francis Xavier's Church, New York city.

It is difficult to attempt a description of the work of this modest appearing young man without using language that many people would regard as highly extravagant, if not rhapsodical. Yet superlatives are all that seem fitting as memory recalls the never-before-heard rapidity of finger movement, combined with so pure and perfect a legato, the kaleidoscopic changes in registration producing a marvelous variety of colored tone-pictures without pause or apparent effort; the smooth, expressive pedal work; the ease with which this master toyed and played with the greatest of all instruments, even as an artistic violinist would toy and play with his violin, and, equally like him, playing with a pathos and expression touching and sweeping every emotion of the human heart.

Those who were present may congratulate themselves on having had the privilege of listening to one of the greatest masters of the organ the modern world has produced.—Bridgeport Standard.

Three of the finest recitals heard in the Temple of Music during the entire series thus far were given last week by Gaston M. Dethier, organist of St. Francis Xavier's Church in New York. Mr. Dethier ranks among the very best organists in this country, and his reputation is by no means overrated. His technic is all sufficient, but the listener scarcely thinks of it, for it is but the means to the end. His beautiful coloring, his satisfying repose, his poetic interpretations, these are what especially characterize his playing and raise him to the high level of the master of the organ. Perhaps in nothing was his musical feeling more apparent than in the very beautiful accompaniments which he played for Miss Grace Carbone, who sang very sweetly the solo, "And God Shall Wipe Away All Tears from Their Eyes."—Buffalo Herald.

HAMLIN'S STRAUSS RECITAL.—The recital which George Hamlin will give at Mendelssohn Hall promises to be one of the most interesting of the winter. As we have heretofore announced the program will consist entirely of lieder by Richard Strauss. The program was published in a previous number of THE MUSICAL COURIER.

FROM PARIS.

PARIS, NOVEMBER 21, 1901.

"GRISELIDIS," libretto by Armand Silvestre and E. Morand, music composed by Massenet, was produced for the first time last night at the Opéra Comique. It is styled a conte lyrique. This is an age in which to characterize the diversity of forms and the craving for the new. Other nomenclature must be sought for, the old names no longer sufficing to characterize these tentative efforts. Instead of the old terms of grand opera, or opera buffa, we have drame lyrique, conte lyrique, &c. Sullivan and Gilbert invented the term comedy opera for their productions, and in France we have no longer opérette or opéra bouffe, but opérette à grand spectacle.

The poem of this new work is taken from the "Decameron," and has already formed the subject of a play produced some time ago at the Comédie Française. The present version differs but little, so far as the form is concerned, from that produced some twelve years ago, a prologue being the only important addition.

The music, of which I will speak more fully another time, is in the melodious, particular style of Massenet, and with all his well-known effects of flute and harp in the orchestration. The prologue made the greatest impression of any part of the work, although a passage sung by Dufranne in the first act is perhaps the most beautiful in the whole opera. It is an exquisite melody, with charming ideas given to the horns and cor anglais. The work scored another success for the prolific composer of "Manon," "Werther," "Eve," &c.

Mlle. Bréval, as singer and actress, was at her best, being ably supported by Fugére, who as the Evil One, gave in appearance and bearing an entirely different presentation of the devil we are accustomed to in the works of Gounod, Boïto or Berlioz. The stage setting, as is usual at this house, is singularly poetic and beautiful.

That no one is a prophet in his own country is an aphorism so trite that I will not inflict it on the readers of THE COURIER. In looking over the entire world of music, one is struck by the fact that it was never so true as at the present day. In Germany, French composers and performers seem at present entirely in vogue. Colonne with his orchestra triumphs in Berlin. Nikisch, with his Philharmonic Orchestra from Berlin, achieves unheard of success in Paris. Bernhardt plays in a tongue unknown to the majority of her listeners in America, creates a furore, and reaps an abundant golden harvest. Duse plays in Paris to audiences equally unfamiliar with the language, and is acclaimed the greatest of all living actresses. At the Opéra we get "Tannhäuser" and "The Valkyrie" oftener than anything else, while Wagner excerpts form the largest portion of the symphonic concert programs. How much of this is snobbery in art, and the constant vaunting of what is foreign and exotic—or as an old English proverb has it, "dear bought and far fetched"—is not a question into which one cares to enter at present. It certainly seems at present as if the most certain passport to public favor is a foreign one. So, for instance, one is not now astonished to hear from Leipsic, that most conservative of musical cities, with a theatre, as one had thought, almost exclusively Wagnerian, that the "Samson and Delila" of Saint-Saëns has met with great success on its first presentation there, and the name of the composer was cheered heartily at the end of the performance.

Reyer, the composer, of whom I spoke at some length last week, deplores the influence of Wagner. Not that he does not reeognize the genius of the master, but that he believes his influence to have been unhealthy and inimical to the individuality of French musical art, as instanced by the eccentric productions of the innumerable imitators of the German composer in France. In a recent interview Reyer says: "As for the repertory [at the Opéra] look for yourself. The public do not seem at present to care for the works of Gluck, Weber, Halévy, Meyerbeer, &c., and Berlioz even, who was thought during his lifetime to be a terrible revolutionary, now seems tame and tepid to your real Wagnerian. Only recently at a concert where a number from the 'Freischütz' was attempted to be given it was hissed. Worse still. Listen to this. Madame Gounod related it to me herself: Gounod was dying. A young musician presented himself, and insisted in the most earnest manner on speaking to the composer. It was explained that this was under the conditions utterly impossible. 'I regret exceedingly the inability of M. Gounod to see me,' said the young musician, 'because I wanted to say to him, before his death, that nothing he has written has any musical value whatever, and that when he is gone not one of his compositions will outlive him.'

HOMER MOORE, BARITONE.
The Odeon, St. Louis, Mo.

Such is the state of things," continued Reyer, "and for my part I am so disheartened that I have ceased to write. They are about to mount my opera of 'The Statue,' a work composed thirty years ago, but that is quite outside the immediate discussion, but I assure you that if I composed a new work, and they were to ask me for it at the Opéra, I would not give it to them. The only remedy for this state of things is, in my opinion, to revive the taste for the best classics of the French school by mounting these works at our subsidized theatres, thus forming the taste of our young composers, while permitting the development of their own personality, in case they possess one."

I give the opinions of Reyer without commenting on them. The incident of a number from "Freischütz" being hissed at a concert performance I know nothing of, but I can bear testimony to the enthusiastic reception that greeted the close of the overture to this opera at its splendid performance by the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin last season, under Nikisch, at the Cirque d'Eté of Paris.

First Symphony.....C. M. von Weber
Fantaisie for piano (first time).....Louis Aubert
Louis Diemer.
Fantastic Symphony.....Berlioz
Overture to Phèdre.....Massenet

The study of the symphony continues at these concerts. Weber's place as a symphonic composer is analogous to that held by Méhul, Hérold. The work is only interesting from the point of view of musical history. The enthusiasm that greeted the close of a fine performance of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony was so great that the "March to the Torture" had to be repeated. The only novelty was a fantaisie for piano and orchestra by Louis Aubert, a pupil of the Conservatoire, where he studied harmony under Gabriel Fauré. This work is scarcely so much in the form of a concerto properly so called, as a symphonic movement, with a part for piano solo. It seemed to me uninteresting, although very well played by Louis Diemer, to whom it is dedicated, and who was the composer's piano teacher.

In England certainly, and possibly elsewhere, the dramatic stage has been inundated by what are termed "society" actors. To such an extent has this evil grown that competent and experienced actor folk find it, in the former country at all events, very difficult to earn a livelihood. I did not know that this influx of titled personages threatened the operatic stage until I read in a recent paragraph that Baron M. Battistini, who came to Paris to study the role of Werther with Massenet, has returned to Warsaw. "Werther" (of which the title role has been transposed from tenor to baritone for Baron Battistini) will be performed to-night. It is bad enough to have titled singing teachers, as the Marquis de T—— or Madame M———, Marquise de C——, glittering and delusive baits wherewith to entrap those who seek the tinsel for the gold, the unreal for the real, but if the aristocracy invades the musical field, why, heaven help us!

I see by a London paper that Princesse de W—— is announced to give a vocal recital in London.

It is not generally known that although Mario sometimes styled himself Marquis di Candia the title was not a genuine one, nor does it, I believe, exist.

"Siegfried" is being actively rehearsed at the Opéra, and it is expected that it will be ready between December 18 and 20. The following is the cast of the principal roles: Siegfried, Jean de Reszké (Vaguet and Dubois); Pilgrim, Delmas; Alberich, Noté; Mime, Lafitte; Fafner, Paty; Forest Bird, Madame de Nocé, and Brünnhilde, Madame Acté. I have already spoken of the lack of really distinguished female singers at the Grand Opéra of Paris. This is particularly apparent in assigning the role of Brünnhilde to Acté. This artist is capable and conscientious, an excellent Marguerite and Juliette. I appreciate her talent very much, but it certainly does not lie in the direction of the Wagnerian heroines. There was some rumor of engaging Bréval for the part, but she is at present singing in Massenet's new work at the Opéra Comique, and after that joins Grau's company in America.

DE VALMOUR.

NEW YORK MUSICAL LEAGUE.

THE vocal department of the New York Musical League (formerly Women's Philharmonic Society) held an interesting meeting in the rooms of the League, in Carnegie Hall, last Thursday evening. Vocal numbers were contributed by Mrs. Priscilla Wallace, Miss Mary Louise Gehle, Miss Martha M. Henry and Miss Freda Buesing. Miss Buesing, who is a pupil of Mme. Anna Lankow, sang "Frühlingsnacht," by Boehm, and "Since We Parted," by Allitsen, in a way to reflect creditably upon her teacher, who played most musical piano accompaniments for the songs.

Miss Gehle, a pupil of Mme. Doria Devine, revealed excellent vocal technic in an aria from "Semiramide." Mrs. Wallace sang sympathetically, "Du bist wie eine Blume," by Cantor. Miss Henry, who is a young singer with taste and good enunciation, sang the aria, "Oh! Love, Thy Help," from "Samson and Delilah," and songs by Liszt and Schumann. The question discussed for the evening was:

Resolved, "That Italian musicians have done more for the advancement of singing than those of any other country." The paper on the affirmative side was read by Miss Lillie d'Angelo Bergh, and Madame Lankow read the essay taking the negative side. William G. Stewart, director of the American School of Opera, took part in the discussion, which followed the reading of the papers. The subject for the evening is hardly new, but the Musical League is a private society, and therefore has a right to discuss any subject. What transpires at these private meetings really concerns no one but the members, and that is the reason why THE MUSICAL COURIER refrains from criticism or from giving advice.

PRIME-STEVENSON IN NEW YORK.—Irenæus Prime-Stevenson has returned to his home in New Jersey, and will be there and in New York during the next few months, returning to Vienna—his European residence—in February or March. Mr. Prime-Stevenson's health is not as yet perfectly satisfactory, the climatic conditions of New York being unfavorable to his permanent improvement. He will return to Austria-Hungary by way of Sicily, Naples and Rome.

MINNIE TRACEY.—The American soprano, Miss Minnie Tracey, is having extraordinary success in Europe. Her present concert tour embraces thirty-two concerts in Sweden, which will end the latter part of this month. After that she sings in Switzerland. On February 4 Miss Tracey is to sing in Mannheim, Germany, and probably will remain in Germany for some time.

THE TWIN CITIES.

Twin City Office THE MUSICAL COURIER,
825 HAGUE AVENUE,
ST. PAUL, Minn., November 30, 1901.

THE musical season in the Twin Cities has opened auspiciously and is well under way. The several musical clubs have issued programs for the year, showing that this will be one of the most brilliant winters, musically, ever known.

The first prospectus to reach me was that of the Ladies' Thursday Musicale of Minneapolis, and a fine course of study is outlined.

The Philharmonic Club, Minneapolis, has planned a series of concerts for the winter season that will be most interesting. On December 9 the club will present "The Messiah," with the assistance of several well-known artists whose specialty is oratorio work. They are Mrs. Genevieve Clark Wilson, soprano; Miss Mabelle Crawford, contralto; Glenn Hall, tenor, and Joseph S. Baernstein, basso. The second concert, February 12, will be made up of English part songs, and the soloist will be Miss Sara Anderson, soprano. "The Creation" will be given on the evening of April 2 and the club has secured the services of Theodore Van Yorx, tenor; John W. Lince, basso, and Miss Electa Gifford, soprano, all of whom will give the oratorio in the best manner.

The St. Paul Choral Club will give "The Messiah" at People's Church December 10, with the assistance of the same singers that the Philharmonic has engaged for their presentation. St. Paul's entertainment course will offer a number of superior musical attractions under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. The first of these will be Nordica's recital at People's Church, December 3. The Twin Cities are to have a rare treat in that Nordica will present the entire program on December 2 in Minneapolis and the following evening in St. Paul, alone, with only an accompanist.

The active members of the Apollo Club of Minneapolis are straining every effort to make this season an unprecedented one and great care has been taken to engage only the best soloists that can be secured. At the opening concert, December 11, Lyceum Theatre, Signor Campanari, baritone, and Miss Mae Louise Campbell, soprano, will be heard in a number of good selections. Harold Bauer, the well-known pianist, will contribute to one of the later concerts.

Music in Minneapolis.

Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler will give a recital in this city December 4 at the Lyceum.

Canada's famous band, "The Kilties," is to give two performances, afternoon and evening, at the Lyceum November 30.

The second concert of the Danz Symphony Orchestra was given at the Metropolitan Theatre Sunday afternoon, November 24. A large audience was present to enjoy a program that was well selected and gave evidence of careful rehearsals. Miss Clara Williams, soprano, was the soloist, and rendered Gounod's "Father, Hear Us," with rare interpretation. If Mr. Danz continues to maintain the high standard of programs he has given so far, there is no doubt that the Symphony Orchestra will become a permanent institution. It is to be hoped that music lovers of Minneapolis will embrace this opportunity and give such an organization the encouragement it deserves.

A brilliant young violinist, Miss Florence Austin, made her début at the Lyceum Theatre Wednesday evening, November 20. This was her initial appearance after several years of hard study abroad and she has fully justified the predictions of music critics who said that she would probably become a really great woman violinist. She showed good musical taste in the selection of her program and played some difficult numbers with perfect poise. Miss Austin's technic is exceptionally good and her tone color very beautiful. She was ably assisted by Miss Mathilda Dressler, who contributed several selections on the violoncello. William H. Dale, tenor, also assisted, but unfortunately was suffering from a severe cold and therefore was not heard to advantage.

Whitney Tew gave a song recital Friday evening, November 22, under the auspices of the Teachers' Club Course. It is undoubtedly true that had Mr. Tew presented different selections he would have carried his audience. As it was, his program was too long and lacked interest. The song cycle "In Memoriam" especially failed to appeal to his hearers. However, the latter part of the program was the most appreciated, and showed his splendid voice to the best advantage. His rendition of several German songs was excellent.

Miss Verna Golden and Carlyle Scott gave a piano and violin sonata recital on the evening of November 25 at the Unitarian Church. The program was on a high order, and well given.

John Parsons Beach, pianist, gave an unusually good program at his recital on November 20. Each number was well given, and his interpretation of the group of selections from Chopin was admirable. Mr. Beach has improved very much during his year of study in Boston.

St. Paul's Musical Affairs.

One of the world's greatest pianists, Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, will give a recital December 5 at the People's Church.

The Kilties will also give two performances November 29 at the People's Church.

The Schubert Club presented an interesting program November 27 at Summit Hall. Selections from German composers were given, and it was an enjoyable program throughout.

AN UPHEAVAL IN THE CITY CHOIRS.—That New York is the Mecca for singers is certainly evidenced by the large daily enrollment of fine voices at the Townsend H. Fellows Choir Exchange. These singers come from all parts of the United States, and are naturally desirous of securing church positions in the metropolis. Some of the best voices heard in the city for years are members of this exchange this season, and it goes without saying that a number of them will secure leading churches. All appearances go to indicate a great upheaval in the city choirs. Mr. Fellows says he knows of nine of the principal churches that intend making an entire change in the personnel of their choirs, so that there will be a busy time next spring selecting voices to fill these and the many others which will occur. A large number of the leading organists of America are also members of this exchange this season, waiting for the time of the year when the changes are made.

THE APOLLO CLUB.—The Apollo Club, of New York, gave its first concert of the season in the grand ball room of the Waldorf-Astoria, Thursday evening, December 5. The club had the assistance of Mme. Isabelle Bouton, contralto; Miss Anna E. Otten, violinist, and Emil Levy, accompanist. The work of the club showed much improvement over last year. The voices are well balanced, and the quality of tone was superb. Incidental solos were sung by Willis E. Bacheller and W. Glasgow Greene. Dr. Franklin D. Lawson sang "Lohengrin's Declaration" in a masterly fashion. He was in fine voice and merited the applause he received. The next concert will be given Thursday, February 20, 1902.

MILWAUKEE.

MILWAUKEE, December 6, 1901.

THE musical season opened in Milwaukee last month will prove to be an unusually busy one; in fact it is no exaggeration to state that this city will witness a veritable inundation of concerts and recitals, there being up to the present time at least 100 musical events accounted for.

Hugo Kaun, who has been introducing his compositions in Berlin and Leipsic, meeting with the warmest enthusiasm and great artistic success, returned home November 3. His friends and admirers tendered him a hearty welcome, the Milwaukee Maennerchor, of which organization Mr. Kaun is director, arranging a banquet in his honor.

The Chicago Orchestra, under the auspices of the Milwaukee Maennerchor, gave its first concert of the season November 12. Bruno Steindel, the 'cellist, was the soloist. The program, which was an intellectual treat, opened with Weingartner's new Symphony in E flat, op. 29, No. 2, which was followed by D'Albert's Concerto for 'cello. The symphony proved of exceeding interest, the thematic material and development, as well as the remarkably clever instrumentation being distinct features. The D'Albert Concerto, though somewhat lengthy, proved a grateful task for Mr. Steindel, who mastered its great technical difficulties with refreshing ease, his artistic temperament adding to the perfect reading of the work.

The orchestral contributions further included the symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," by César Franck, and fragments from "Das Rheingold," arranged by Theodore Thomas.

The orchestra gave a masterly interpretation of all these works and it is with the keenest delight that the next appearance of Mr. Thomas and his orchestra is looked forward to.

The A Capella Choir concert, November 18, proved a success. The singing of the choir, under Mr. Boeppler's leadership, exhibited a marked improvement in tone quality and ensemble.

Mme. Fanny Richter, a pianist of note, was the soloist on this occasion, being heard for the first time in Milwaukee. She proved herself possessed of an unfailing and glittering technic and an intelligent musical understanding her reading of "St. Francis on the Waves," by Liszt, and "Magic Fire," by Wagner-Brassin, being especially praiseworthy. Miss Garrita Nash, under whose direction "The Ballad Concerts of America" are given, added greatly to the success of the undertaking by securing Madame Nordica for the second concert of the series, November 30. The famous singer took her audience by storm and awakened such enthusiasm as has not been witnessed here in a long time. Madame Nordica was in superb voice, but it was in the last half of the program that her magnificent organ displayed its full glory of power, sweetness and purity, until at the close enthusiasm reached such a height that it was with reluctance her audience saw her leave. Mr. Romanye-Simmons played the accompaniments most acceptably. His performance, however, of the C sharp minor Polonaise, by Chopin, failed to prove as satisfactory, there being a too exaggerated use of the tempo rubato, besides deviating rather freely from the true character of the composition. The last of the above concerts will be held at the Exposition Building December 14, the Pittsburg Orchestra, under the leadership of Victor Herbert, having been engaged.

Thursday, December 5, the Milwaukee Symphony Orchestra, an organization containing fifty local musicians, will make its initial public appearance. Mr. Boeppler, the conductor, has exhibited considerable energy in inciting interest in the new undertaking. That this city is capable of supporting a first-class orchestra is without doubt the case, and it is to be hoped that Mr. Boeppler's efforts toward paving the way for still better things may meet with the encouragement of all those who have the welfare of good music at heart.

The Musik Verein is busily rehearsing for its concert, December 12, which will be largely devoted to male chorus work. Among the numbers to be sung are "Fest Motette," by Klughardt; "Gypsy Songs," by Brahms, and "Liebe," by Strauss. The last named will be sung for the first time in this country in public. Jean Gérardy, the 'cellist, is to be the leading soloist, the other soloist being J. Erich Schmaal, of this city.

The Arion Musical Club, which is entering upon the twenty-fifth year of its existence, will give a jubilee course of four concerts, the excellence of which is guaranteed. The season will open with a festival performance of "The Messiah," the society having engaged Mme. Eleanor Meredith, Miss Mabelle Crawford, E. C. Towne and W. A. Howland for the performance. As the chorus is the largest and best in the history of the club, an ideal rendering of the oratorio may be expected.

Miss Helen Glenny announces three subscription recitals to be given at the Pfister Hotel, similar to those which, under her auspices, Milwaukeeans enjoyed last year. For these recitals Miss Glenny has secured Miss Howell, Esther Feé and Plunket Greene.

Franz Neumann, recently from Berlin, has been engaged by Hugo Kaun as an assistant in his newly established school of music. Mr. Neumann is a thorough musician and a welcome accession to the Milwaukee music colony.

The United Wisconsin Conservatories of Music are in a decidedly flourishing condition, the largely increasing number of pupils having necessitated further additions to the faculty.

Herman Zeitz, formerly instructor of violin in the University School of Music at Ann Arbor, Mich., and more recently with the Wisconsin Conservatory of Music, this city, has opened a school of music of his own, which is in a prosperous condition. He recently gave a very successful pupils' recital.

The Milwaukee Trio, consisting of J. Erich Schmaal, piano; Herman A. Zeitz, violin, and Ernst Beyer, 'cello, inaugurated its series of musicales by giving a recital at the Athenæum, November 15. As a novelty the trio performed a Quartet, op. 9, in A flat, by Ippolitoff-Iwanoff, Albert Fink, viola, assisting. The composition found favor with the audience, it being both brilliant and tuneful. Why the composer should have titled it Quartet is a mystery, as it savors more of a potpourri than anything else. The program further included the C minor Trio, op. 101, Brahms, and several concerted songs creditably executed by Miss Eva Thelen, soprano; Mrs. Louis Frank, mezzo soprano, and Mrs. Bruno Fink, alto.

Daniel Protheroe, the well-known conductor and composer, has recently published a number of songs entitled "Six Lyrics." They are among the best efforts of Mr. Protheroe, and are receiving high commendation from some of the leading critics.

CINCINNATI, December 7, 1901.

THE musical event of the present week was the first concert of the Orpheus Club in the Auditorium on Thursday evening, December 5. For some years past the club has been the only English singing society of importance before the public since the Apollo Club retired to the privacy of entertaining only its members and invited friends. Under the long and able direction of Charles A. Graninger it enjoyed a prosperous and useful career. Only this year was the club reorganized, after the regretted departure of its old director, and Edwin W. Glover, who has been for some time identified with the training of the festival chorus, took the reins in his hands.

This was the first public appearance of the reorganized club under its new régime. The result was most gratifying, and proved how well and enthusiastically the members have responded to the situation. The chorus has been considerably strengthened, both in the firsts and seconds. The first tenors were particularly resonant and responsive. The uniform quality of musical tone that was maintained attracted attention. It was never volume at the sacrifice of tone—and yet the volume was entirely adequate to the requirements of the selections. One of the successes of the chorus singing was Nevin's "Marching." Its rhythm was spiritedly given. The best number in point of shading and an almost perfect ensemble was Parker's "The Night Has a Thousand Eyes." In "The Lost Chord" of Sullivan the chorus rose to a genuine crescendo. Two da capos were given to "The Lost Chord" and "The Monk of the Mountain."

There were two soloists—Sidney Biden, baritone, of Chicago, and Signor P. A. Tirindelli, violinist, of the Conservatory of Music.

Mr. Biden left a favorable impression. He has not a "big" voice, but it is musical, well rounded—true to the feeling and full of temperament. He failed somewhat in the dramatic requirements of the Massenet aria, but in the miscellaneous numbers proved himself a warm, sympathetic singer, especially in Schubert's "Faith in Spring."

A beautiful number was the Noeturne by Tirindelli, sung by the chorus. Its soft, languishing character suits well the sentiment of the words, and its instrumental fabric shows ingenuity and uncommon skill of treatment, as a solo. The composer was called out before the audience at its close. In his solo numbers Mr. Tirindelli proved himself an artist of keen musical perception and scholarly accomplishment. His interpretation of the "Fantasia Appassionata" was of a lofty type—technically clean, of fine gradations and poetic to a high degree. The encore was a Capriccioso of his own, which he played crisply. His miscellaneous numbers were a Serenade by Saint-Saëns and one of his own compositions.

An operatic concert quite out of the ordinary run of events was given at the Aeolian Hall on the evening of December 6. A large and cultured audience was present. The following program was presented:

Aeolian Orchestrelle, Lohengrin Introduction.....Wagner
Scene and Duet, Act II.:
Elsa .....Jessie Langlands Thomson
Ortrud ..... May Perin
Frederick.....Charles H. Thomson
Aeolian Orchestrelle, La Favorita (Overture).....Donizetti

Pitti-Sing.....Ella May Bassett
Yum-Yum .....Pearl Keith
Chorus—Mary Rice, Ella May Bassett, May Perin, Bertha Calvert, Eugenia Pedretti, Ida Ewing, Julia Heltrich, Marie Blackman, Naomi Chapman, Florence Keith, Jessie Langlands Thomson, Pearl Keith.

The impression of the entire evening was that Mrs. McAlpin has thoroughly mastered her subject—the training of pupils for grand opera. She was responsible for every detail of the success. The costuming was elegant and correct; the staging was such as would have reflected credit upon a professional performance. At the head of a school of American opera Mrs. McAlpin would find a place which would well become her tact and ability. Several of the participants, such as Jessie Langlands Thomson, May Perin and Mary Naomi Chapman, have exceptional talent for the operatic stage.

The following from the Minneapolis Journal gives some idea of the attention and esteem Chas. A. Graninger is receiving as director of the Apollo Club, of that city. Mr. Graninger is a Cincinnatian, and has spent some twenty years in the musical life of Cincinnati as an educator, director, pianist and organist, wherein his efforts have met with much success. He is the founder of the Auditorium School of Music, in the direction of which he is assisted by Mrs. Graninger:

"A delightful affair of last evening was the reception given by the Apollo Club in the new club rooms in the Lyceum Building. Great clusters of white and yellow chrysanthemums were arranged with palms in the parlors, and red roses were in the studio. The guests were received by the officers of the club, Mrs. George Eustis, Frank Joyce, Barrow, Eichman, Brimmer, Cooper and Ludgsdin, who assisted Charles A. Graninger, the new director and the guest of honor. A charming musical program was given by Miss Clara Williams, Miss Helen Hall, Mr. Hollenberg, of Little Rock, Ark., who has recently come to Minneapolis. Mrs. Edgar Runyan and Mr. Graninger were the accompanists. Hugh O'Donnell gave several readings. Frappé and ices were served. About 400 guests were present to meet Mr. Graninger. The club will give a second reception in about six weeks for the musicians who have recently come to Minneapolis."

Mr. Tirindelli, head of the violin department of the Conservatory of Music, will give a violin recital in Hamilton, Ohio, some time in January.

On Friday afternoon, the 22d ult., the first of a series of lectures at the Auditorium School of Music on "The Anatomy and Physiology of Voice Production" was given by Dr. W. C. Harris. The lecture was illustrated by charts and some rare models the doctor brought from abroad. Besides these Dr. Harris brought for the examination of those in attendance a human larynx, which was the means of real understanding of his remarks. The lecture was well attended and appreciated by the large class of vocal and elocution students present. The next lecture in this series will be given January 17.

A violin recital of considerable interest was given by Leroy McMakin, assisted by Miss Frances C. Shuford, pianist, both of the Conservatory of Music faculty, on Friday evening, December 6. Both proved themselves growing musicians, who are steadily increasing in their artistic calibre. Mr. McMakin is a pupil of Tirindelli. The program was as follows:

Sonata for piano and violin, No. 2, A major.....Brahms
Concerto in G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Introduction and Rondo, Capriccioso.....Saint-Saëns
Romance in E flat.....Rubinstein
Appassionato .....Tirindelli
Hungarian Dance, No. 8, A minor.....Brahms-Joachim

The date of the first college orchestra and chorus concert has been changed from December 18 to January 18, 1902. Mr. Van der Stucken made this change at the request of a number of music lovers who did not wish to deprive themselves of the pleasure of hearing both the orchestra and chorus concert and the grand opera. The college orchestra and chorus rehearsals have been unusually well attended for this concert. In the orchestra the strings alone comprise thirty members; while in the chorus there are over 100. The rehearsals will continue to be held on Wednesdays and Thursdays—the chorus on Wednesday and the orchestra on Thursdays, at 3:15 p. m.

Miss Mannheimer, director of the School of Expression of the College of Music, will give a recital in Indianapolis on next Wednesday evening, December 11. "Nance Oldfield" and a miscellaneous program will be given.

The fourth of the series of invitation events will be given by the School of Expression of the College of Music on Saturday evening, December 21. The program includes an evening of comedy, and will be given under Miss Mannheimer's direction.

The subject of the next lecture in the history of music course will be "The Age of the Netherlanders," and will be given Monday afternoon, December 9, in the Lyceum. A. J. Gantvoort, who delivers these lectures, is exceedingly well pleased with both the attendance and the interest the students have taken.

Mr. Van der Stucken will personally direct one of the rehearsals before Christmas of "The Messiah," which will be given by the Cincinnati Choral Union. The rehearsals are now being conducted by Dr. N. J. Elsenheimer.

Dr. Wade Thrasher delivered the fourth of the series of lectures on the voice, Friday afternoon, December 6. The next lecture will be given by Dr. Thrasher on Friday, December 13, at 4:30 p. m., and all members of the vocal profession are invited to attend.

Edmund A. Jahn, member of the College of Music faculty, was one of the soloists at the first Orpheus concert of the season.

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN.

IF any of this week's concertgivers in Brooklyn are overlooked they must put the blame upon the calendar. The writer does not recall a week when events crowded upon each other as they do from Sunday to Saturday of the current week. Under the circumstances several of the reviews must be deferred until next week. The musical week began Sunday afternoon with a matinee by the Arion Society at Arion Hall. Miss Cottlow played Brahms' B minor Rhapsodie, Liszt's "Waldesrauschen" and the Schubert-Tausig "Military March"; Miss Liebling the aria "Thou Charming Bird," from David's "La Perle de Brésil"; an eighteenth century song, "At Parting," by Rogers, and "The Nightingale," by Alabieff. The selections by the club included compositions by Spicher, Beschnitt, Sokolow, Kremser and John H. Knowles. A review of this concert will appear next week.

The Venth-Kronold String Quartet, assisted by Mme. Berta Grosse-Thomason, gave the second concert of the season at Wissner Hall on Tuesday night. A report of this concert next Wednesday.

Mrs. Stuart Close, a professional pupil of Dr. Hanchett, gave the second in a series of musicales at her home, 209 Hancock street, last night (Tuesday). The hostess contributed several piano solos.

Master Arthur Claassen, a son of Conductor Claassen, will make his début, playing a duet with Miss Eloise Bramble, Miss Hildegarde E. Claassen, a daughter of the conductor, will also appear. Small violin pupils of Carl Venth will assist Miss Wagner's pupils.

Friday evening, December 13, the Boston Symphony Orchestra revisits Brooklyn. The concert will be at the Academy of Music. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist. Here is the program:

Symphony in C major, with Fugue Finale, Jupiter..... Mozart
Concerto for Piano in E minor, op. 11..... Chopin
Overture, Cockaigne (In London Town)..... Edward Elgar
(First time.)

To-morrow afternoon and evening the New York Church Choir Company will take possession of the Academy of Music. In the afternoon Flotow's "Martha" will be sung and in the evening the company will "wrestle" with Gounod's "Faust." Most of the members of this company have sung in comic opera, in addition to their work in the church choir. A few have had brief experiences in grand opera, but no names of prominent singers are upon the list. Optimistic souls hope for the best in this latest venture to give grand opera at popular prices.

With the assistance of the Maxwell House Orchestra, Miss At Lee and Albert E. Andrews as the vocalists, Dr. Henry G. Hanchett gave his closing lecture in Adelphi Assembly Hall Monday night (December 2). The orchestra played selections from Haydn's "Military Symphony," frim Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, and the march from Raff's symphony, "Lenore." The piano illustrations played by Dr. Hanchett were the Largo from Beethoven's Sonata, op. 2, No. 2; the Scherzo from Schumann's Sonata, op. 11; Rubinstein's Barcarolle in G major and Liszt's arrangement of Wagner's Spinning Song. Dr. Hanchett gave outlines of these compositions as well as those played by the orchestra. Miss At Lee sang Chadwick's "Allah" and the Händel aria, "Oh, Had I Jubal's Lyre." Mr. Andrews sang "Gypsy John," by Clay. The two singers, as a duet, gave Goetze's "Still wie die Nacht." An engagement elsewhere prevented THE MUSICAL COURIER reporter from attending the lecture recital. But we hear the hall was crowded as usual and all received some benefit from so instructive a musical evening. The spring series of lecture recitals will begin on March 3. "Musical Contrasts," the subject for the season, will be continued by the lecturer, Dr. Hanchett. These recitals at Adelphi Hall are given under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute and Adelphi College. Dr. Hanchett is the director of the school of music connected with the college.

Tuesday evening, December 3, George Francis Morse gave an organ recital in the Flatbush Reformed Church, of which he is the organist and choirmaster. Clemente Bologna, basso, was the assisting singer. The program follows:

Prelude and Fugue in E major..... Bach
Andante from E flat Symphony..... Mozart
Recitative and aria from Rebekah..... Barnby
Clemente Bologna.

Clemente Bologna.

Music to A Midsummer Night's Dream..... Mendelssohn

Miss Edith C. Milligan, a youthful pianist, gave a recital in Wissner Hall Tuesday evening (December 3) She played compositions by Chopin, Weber, Moszkowski Mendelssohn and Liszt. Mrs. Harriet Diamont-Nathan, soprano, assisted.

Arthur Whiting, the pianist, and Mr. Longy, first oboe player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assisted the Kneisel Quartet at the concert given in Association Hall last Wednesday evening. Compositions by Beethoven, Grieg, Mozart, Chadwick and Brahms were presented. Mr. Whiting and Mr. Schroeder gave an uncommonly beautiful reading of the Grieg Sonata in A minor, for piano and 'cello. Much depends upon the pianist in this characteristic music, and at this performance, Mr. Whiting, as ever, impressed his hearers with his skill. Such control of the pedals and such warmth of tone one does not get every day from ensemble pianists. Then the modesty of the man is another cause for congratulation. Mr. Whiting, Mr Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder played two movements from Brahms' Trio in B major for piano, violin and 'cello, and thus the audience again heard Whiting at his best, for is he not a Brahms player par excellence? The assistance of Mr. Longy was required in the Mozart Quartet in F major for oboe, violin, viola and 'cello. A foot note on the program announced this as a first performance here. While antiquated to our modern ears, the quartet is one the music lover hears gladly. Sweet and pure as a lily and gentle as a zephyr, the piece is, in faet, a continuous solo for oboe with obligato by the strings. Mr. Longy did full justice to the seore, and his associate players retired at the conclusion of the performance and permitted him to receive alone the cordial acknowledgments from the audience.

AAGOT LUNDE, BOSTON, MASS.

MISS AAGOT LUNDE was born in Christiania, the capital of Norway, of an artistic family, and was brought up amid artistic surroundings. Quite early she developed a taste for music, which was diligently encouraged, and she was placed under the best masters obtainable. Her voice, when settled, was found to be a warm contralto of large compass, and after three years' study in her native city she went to Dresden, where she remained for five years to perfect herself under the care of Frl. Auguste Götze, the well-known and able teacher of singing, who is now a teacher of the vocal art at the Leipsic Conservatory.

Miss Lunde has been heard in all parts of this country, in recitals, concerts and oratorio, with and without orchestra, and wherever she appeared she gained great praise. She renders programs of Norwegian folksongs, German lieder and English songs, and her press notices, a few of which are reproduced, show the estimate critics place upon her work.

AAGOT LUNDE.

Miss Lunde will give a song recital at Steinert Hall, Boston, on Monday, December 16, when she will give a highly interesting program of songs seldom if ever heard in this country. Miss Lunde's charming personality has won her hosts of friends everywhere:

Miss Lunde uses her smooth and sympathetic voice with skill, taste and effect, and she sings with a frankness and an ease that are peculiarly winning. In addition, a thoroughly refined spirit pervades all that she does, and she has that rare gift, an artistic temperament. Miss Lunde has every reason to be gratified by the artistic success she achieved, and by the cordial appreciation with which her efforts met. There was much applause, and she was enthusiastically recalled several times.—B. E. Woolf, in Boston Herald.

As sung by her, one song did not sound like another. Her appreciation of the character of each song was almost always right, and she showed throughout a sense of values.—Philip Hale, in Boston Journal.

Miss Lunde's voice is a mezzo-contralto particularly well suited to the Norwegian folksongs and German ballads she always sings. She possesses an indefinable grace and charm in singing that is particularly winning. Her enunciation is delightful, and though all her songs were in their native language, her interpretations were so expressive that she carried her listeners with her with ease.—Brooklyn (N. Y.) Standard-Union.

Miss Lunde, one of the best of altos, excelled with deep emotion in Zöllner's "Dead Was Her Soldier." Her piano gradation in singing of the anguished grief of the soldier's widow was masterly. She also sang most excellently Draseke's "Pilgrim of St. Just."—Ludwig Hartmann, in Dresdner Nachrichten.

We feel justified in predicting a great future for the alto, Miss Aagot Lunde. Last night she sang the part of Azucena, from "Trovatore," and both her deep and strong alto tones, as well as her higher ones, which reach almost to a high mezzo-soprano, are beautiful, clear and round, yet elastic in the middle register. Her musical expression was intelligent, and her dramatic power all that was needed.—Emil Naumann, in Dresden Zeitung.

Miss Aagot Lunde made her second appearance this season at the Eldorado last night, and again achieved a very great success. Miss Lunde's voice is well known as an especially pleasing mezzo-soprano. It has gained in its musical quality. Her singing may be characterized as distinctive fine art, and it left behind an unmingled feeling of enjoyment. The applause from the large audience, and the many recalls must have convinced the artist that she has won the hearts of Christianians.—Otto Winter Hjelm, in Christiania Aftenposten.

Amy Murray.

ONE of the largest and most select audiences ever assembled in Summit, N. J., greeted Miss Amy Murray in the lecture room of the Summit Central Presbyterian Church on November 18. Miss Murray gave one of her instructive and delightful programs, which she announces as "An Evening of Scottish Song." November 29 Miss Murray was one of the soloists at the great St. Andrew's Day concert in Guelph, Ont. This annual celebration in the "Royal City" has long been considered in Scottish-Canadian circles as one of the most important events of the year. The Guelph Mercury says of this in part:

Miss Amy Murray's fame has gone abroad, and many in the audience knew her by repute, but this was her first appearance before a Guelph audience. It is safe to say she did not disappoint expectations. Hers is a pure, sweet voice, that carried well to the farthest parts of the house. Her enunciation is clear and distinct, and she enters fully into the spirit of her songs, and is enabled thereby to secure perfect expression. Her singing is delightfully easy, the highest notes being taken without apparent effort. The song that, perhaps, pleased her Guelph auditors most was her last one, "Caller Herrin'." For this Miss Murray was clad in the costume of a Newhaven fishwife, with short skirt, creel and all the other accessories. Very taking, too, was the way in which, at the conclusion of the song, she made an appeal to some of the gentlemen standing near for assistance in raising her creels to her shoulder, the assistance called for being most gallantly rendered by H. Weatherston. As an encore she gave an authentic toast, heard from the lips of a fishwife at Newhaven, when spending some time with them. Each of her solos were encored, and in reply she gave "Cam' Ye by Athol?" and "Whustle and I'll Come to Ye, My Lad."

We republish Miss Murray's program of "Historic Songs," given at Glen Ridge, N. J., on December 3:

BOSTON, Mass., December 8, 1901.

THERE were several concerts last week. At the Kneisel concert, December 2, Ernest Hutcheson, of Baltimore, made his début here as a pianist in Chadwick's Quintet for piano and strings. He proved himself to be an excellent ensemble player, a pianist of clean, agreeable touch, well developed technic and self-controlled musical spirit. The quartets were Borodin's in D and Beethoven's, op. 135.

There were two recitals the afternoon of December 2. Max Bendix, violinist, played at Steinert Hall Händel's Sonata in A; Tartini's Variations on a Gavotte Theme of Corelli; the first movement of Beethoven's Concerto; Wieniawski's Air Varié, op. 15, and pieces by Arensky, Ogareff, D'Ambrosea, Hubay, Paganini, Lauterbach and Bendix. He played with breadth, feeling and general mastery. I did not hear Mr. Sherwood's piano recital at Chickering Hall.

Francis Rogers, baritone, gave a song recital December 4, and Mr. Kubelik made his first appearance here at Symphony Hall the evening of that day. Josef Hofmann gave recitals December 5 and 7.

I wrote you a week or so ago that the concert audiences thus far have been small. The statement still holds good. The singers and players have been known and applauded, or they were strangers of reputation, so that curiosity at least might count in their favor. They were well advertised in advance, in shop windows, on billboards and in the newspapers. But even Mr. Kubelik, who apparently has at his control the cable, telegraph and telephone systems of the world, had a small audience. The visiting pianists have not been treated according to their deserts.

Is it possible that the private musical clubs, the subscription recitals, interfere with the professional musicians? A woman, for instance, who has finally worked her way into the outer circle of society, sings in this or that parlor, and as she sings for little or nothing her mediocre performance is applauded by the fashionable ignorant. It occurs to her that she may make money by giving a series of subscription and exclusive recitals. A patroness passes the favoring word. Many who wish to stand in her good graces eagerly pay $5 or $6 for a course ticket. And these calls are so many that subscribers shrink from spending $1.50 or $2 for that which is truly worthy or interesting. Money is spent on the musical clubs—which are life saving stations of mediocrity—and the members are anxious to hear Miss Jumperdown, of an old Boston family, maltreat the keyboard; but they could not be persuaded to hear Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Hofmann or Slivinski. An engagement with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and a pronounced triumph at one of the concerts promise nothing for success in recital. Time and time again a pianist or a violinist has been recalled three or four times, and has been the talk of the town for at least twenty-four hours. The poor wretch, emboldened to give recitals, has met empty benches or veterans of the noble army of deadheads.

Some say that the scale of prices is too high; that few Bostonians or suburbanites are willing to pay $2 or $1.50. Others say that the order of concerts is not well arranged, that too many of a like nature are crowded into the same week, that persons of moderate means are confused in their regret and anxiety, and since they cannot hear all, hear none.

The two chief events of the week were the first performances here of Bach's Mass in B minor as a whole, and Richard Strauss' "Heldenleben."

Portions of the huge Mass were sung by the Handel and Haydn in 1887, when Lilli Lehmann was one of the solo singers. As John S. Dwight, the laudatory chronicler, wrote that Madame Lehmann had no solo, we may infer that the dull and difficult "Laudamus te" was omitted.

Nor do I see why the whole of this Mass should ever be given in a city where there are other amusements and the full exhibition of the strenuous life. In a town like Bethlehem, Pa., where choristers are willing to work in a devout spirit under an enthusiast and able conductor like Mr. Wolle, I can understand how such performances are for the public good; the preparation occupies the mind and tires the body; it keeps the young from mischief; the older tenors and basses are not urged by the tedium of daily routine to seek relief in wood alcohol or Jamaica ginger. They kill time, and thus Bach is as a city club.

The furious Bachite is more objectionable than the Wagnerite, or even the Brahmsite. To him every scrap of counterpoint in organ work of doubtful authenticity, ever measure of an aria with obligato for an obsolete instrument, the dreariest choral waste is an instance of plenar inspiration. Music died with Bach. Palestrina was Dago. Händel—fie on him; he wrote for male soprano and singing jades. The Bachite sees in every bit of imitation the title of à Kempis' book. He will not endure th thought of mutilation. Any singer that is willing to sacrifice vocal reputation on the altar in this Gothic cathedra is a great artist. She that shrinks and says "I canno and I find the music impossible" is fit only for "L Traviata," and idle songs of light o' loves. Examin closely, and you will find the most aggravated, maniaca cases have no knowledge of historical perspective.

It was the fashion in Bach's time to think in contrapunta language. A fugue was religious per se. A direct dra matic stroke was impossible. Even the magnificent Händel the man of infinite melody, whose operas are a vast treas ure house of wondrous songs—and he that is acquainte only with the oratorios of Händel knows not Händel—even the magnificent Händel stooped in his pride to snee at Gluck because he was not a master of counterpoint Now counterpoint is only a means, it is not the end. Th freest, the most radical composers are often those wh have the science at their immediate command. Yet to-da I see reviews in German music journals condemning chora compositions, because there is no fugue in them.

The fugue may be of imperishable beauty when there i no text. It may suggest regret, love, melancholy, despai devotion. There are fugues in "The Well Tempered Clav ichord" that are more devout than nine-tenths of th choruses in Bach's sacred compositions. The Fugue in I major (Vol. II., No. 9) is an example. It is not too muc to say that the character of Fesca's music is admirably re flected in Rheinberger's little known organ fugue F-ES C-A—a gentle, plaintive, shy, twilight fugue.

Furthermore, it was the custom in Bach's time to se music to words with the indifference that in Rossini ha been described as Olympian. Take this Mass. The Bachit dreams of his revered master as writing it on his knee with a prayer over each measure, with the thought only o consecration to the Lord.

What are the facts?

The sections of the Mass were written at various time without any unity of purpose, and for no particular occa sion. Bach took the Kyrie and the Gloria with him t Dresden to gain the favor of Frederich Augustus, Prince o Poland and Lithuania and Duke of Saxony. He wrote t this ruler a letter which if it had been written by som starving maker of operas would be dubbed sniveling an cringing. He belittled the worth of his work; he told th story of a diminished income at Leipsic; and if he could onl be given the title "Praedicat" he would be ever grateful and he would compose in the honor of the ruler cantata and all sorts of music forever and forever, amen. Th august monarch paid no attention to him at the time, no did he show any willingness to hear the two portions o the Mass.

Furthermore, Bach did not always write this music fo the particular words. The Gratias is taken from a cantat to celebrate the election of a municipal council at Leipsi in 1731. We elect a mayor here next Tuesday, and Mr Lang would have done well if he had kept the Mass fo the civic result. The music would then have voiced th joy of the victor. The Crucifixus is taken from a Jubilat —of all things in the world. The Agnus Dei is from a Ascension cantata.

And how inappropriate, incongruous—at least to the fee ing of this period—is much of the music. Is there an pirit of prayer in the "Quisedes"—"Thou that sitteth at hc right hand"? Is there any entreaty for mercy? The lto sings an ornamented air, with four measures or more f running passages on the syllable "se," while an oboe 'amore plays an obligato. I am not speaking of the value f the air as music without association of words. The air s one of the finest—and they are few—in the Mass. But he sentiment as felt by Bach and the men of his genera- ion is as obsolete as the oboe d'amore itself.

So there are choruses, pages of them, that are without sthetic or religious significance. They are long sandy tretches, through which the singers plod their weary way. tudy for a moment the passage in the Creed which be- ins with the announcement of the descent from heaven nd includes the incarnation and the crucifixion. Is there ven a mood of contemplation suggested? Or take the tting of "Et in terra pax hominibus."

The orchestration soon becomes intolerable. Think of hc endless treadmill of the 'cellos and basses, so mo- otonous as are the cadences themselves. How many igid lines in this music instead of curves; how many eometric effects! Look at that painful solo "Lauda- us te!" which the singer may well read "We praise Thee— ecause we are through with it without a breakdown." low many pages that are purely didactic!

I am not so foolish as to deny the splendor, the sublim- y of certain pages, but why should not one discriminate n the case of Bach as in that of Händel, Mozart, Bee- hoven, Brahms, Verdi, Tschaikowsky, Richard Strauss?

For this performance by the Cecilia oboi d'amore, high rumpets and a corno da caccia were borrowed. The solo or the unusual oboe was exquisitely played by Mr. Lenom, nd the trumpets were effective; but even with these in- truments it is impossible for us to hear the orchestra as Bach heard it. Flutes were different in his day; he had o 'cellos as we understand them. He had the viol da amba and the violoncello-piccolo, which was probably ned to the octave of the violin. He did not make much f the bassoon, and he generally used it to double the basso continuo," although he was perhaps the first to ut it in unison with his substitute for 'cello. In many f his cantatas the orchestration is ingenious and con- antly varied; but I submit respectfully that in the Mass is generally heavy and tiresome.

Why should the Mass, I repeat, be sung as a whole? ome of the choruses and one or two solos are enough.

The performance of the chorus was accurate, sonorous, rilliant at times in tonal body and lustre. It was not xpressive, for there was little or no nuancirung. At mes there was ugly and grotesque accentuation, for the ake no doubt of keeping the singers together. The trociously difficult solos were sung by Mrs. Kathrin Hilke, Miss Adelaide Griggs, Miss Adah Hussey, Messrs. 'an Hoose, Townsend, Hay.

One of the chorus asked me: "But was it not a good erformance, when you take into consideration the fact hat we rehearsed only for a comparatively short time." When it was decided to perform this Mass at a Paris onservatory concert (1891) seventy picked singers udied the music for two years. To sing many notes ourageously, accurately and at times with a noble shout not all.

Let me here note a singular fact. Lorée, of Paris, has tried to imitate the old oboe d'amour. His instrument has fine qualities, but the skilled in these matters say that absolute imitation is impossible. The primitive voice, as Constant Pierre puts it, is lost. Pierre goes so far as to claim that old instruments owe their particular timbre to rudimentary construction. "The more rationally they are made, the more the deviation of the holes has been suppressed or increased in number, the more has the sound been modified." The reed was stronger and coarser in those days. I am tempted to add that certain modern clarinets sound more and more like flutes and oboes like clarinets.

The program of the Symphony concert last night was as follows:

Overture, Don Giovanni.....Mozart
Concerto in A minor, No. 5.....Vieuxtemps
Ein Heldenleben.....Strauss Symphony No. 2.....Beethoven

This was a singularly arranged program. Was the purpose to rebuke the obstreperous Strauss by the suavity of Beethoven? The overture to "Don Giovanni" is ineffective, futile outside of a small theatre. And after the Violin Concerto of Vieuxtemps came a tone poem in which there are long, bizarre, extremely difficult passages for the first concertmaster.

Strauss' colossal work was loudly applauded. A novelty of simpler and immediately pleasing structure and decoration has seldom if ever been received here so enthusiastically.

"Ein Heldenleben" has been carefully reviewed in THE MUSICAL COURIER by Mr. Floersheim and Mr. Huneker. I do not propose to go over the ground. Yet I cannot refrain from recording my wonder, admiration, enthusiasm. There are unforgettable, amazing passages. The section of the hero is surely sufficiently orthodox for the most hardened formalist. The musical characterization of the foes of the hero is a masterpiece of grim, sardonic humor. And those tubas which, as they say, give out in fifths the portentous objection of a certain Leipsic doctor to Strauss' music. The first part of the love music, where the beloved one is coy and coquettish, seems after one hearing too long, and—uninteresting. But there are beautiful measures in this section. I know of few such glorious bursts as the hymn of victory that follows the battle. And from there to the finale is a succession of eloquent, gorgeous, deeply moving pages. How wonderful the weaving together of the quotations from earlier works. The mood of the finale is that of Beethoven in contemplation, brooding as Buddha.

In former works of Strauss there has been too often an absence of fundamental bass. The structure has seemed as in the air. This reproach cannot be brought against "Ein Heldenleben"; the bass is here granitic, as though it reached far down into the bowels of the earth.

And why do some object to the battle scene? Why should not tonalities war one against the other in a portrayal of the din and shock of the fight? Such music must necessarily be more or less panoramic, but Strauss' music is much more than this. Years ago Beethoven's "Battle of Vittoria" was produced here—I think by J. L. Hatton, with the advertisement that all the proper effects would be supplied. What do the gentlemen miss in Strauss' scene? Cannon and the groans of the dying? Let them play neatly on the piano "The Battle of Prague." But to object because this music is discordant, or because certain "modulations are forced"———.

Whether a battle should be portrayed in music or not is another question. The ancient Romans had an expression "to dance a tragedy" (saltare tragœdeam). But "saltare" was something more than dancing as commonly understood among us, for the dancer made important use of arms rather than legs; and this dancing was the mute action of a man who translated by his gestures the idea that another expresses by words. Thus we find Coleridge speaking of the pleasure he felt in "beholding the combat of the Horatii and Curatii most exquisitely danced in Italy to the music of Cimarosa."

Slavish imitation will not serve the purpose. And I commend to doubters about the art of Strauss this passage from De Quincey:

"If a man * * * should say that he would 'whistle Waterloo'—that is by whistling connected with pantomime would express the passion and the charges of Waterloo—it would be monstrous to refuse him his postulate on the pretense that 'people did not whistle at Waterloo.' * * * It is the very worst objection in the world to say that the strife of Waterloo did not reveal itself through whistling. Undoubtedly it did not; but that is the very ground of the man's art. He will reproduce the fury and the movements as to the only point which concerns you, viz., the effect upon your own sympathies, through a language that seems without any relation to it; he will set before you what was at Waterloo through that which was not at Waterloo—whereas any direct factual imitation, resting upon painted figures drest up in regimentals, and worked by watchwork through the whole movements of the battle, would have been no art whatsoever in the sense of a Fine Art, but a base mechanic mimicry."

Mr. Gregorowitsch played the concerto by Vieuxtemps with full technical mastery, pure and sustained sentiment, and rare elegance.

AMERICAN GUILD OF ORGANISTS.—The sixteenth public service of the American Guild of Organists (the first of the present season) will be held at St. Bartholomew's Church, Thursday evening, December 12, under the direction of Richard Henry Warren, organist and choirmaster.

The choir will sing a "Magnificat" and "Nunc Dimittis," by Palestrina, a "Pater Noster," by Henry Holden Huss, and "How Lovely Is Thy Dwelling Place," Brahms. The organ voluntary will be played by Clarence Eddy.

ERSKINE PORTER.—Master Erskine Porter, the gifted boy soprano, sang at a meeting of the Cambridge Club, of Brooklyn, on December 2. The sweet little singer delighted the members and astonished them, too, for his numbers showed that the little artist has intelligence as well as a rare voice. The songs included "The Trout," by Schubert; "Hush, My Little One," by Benjamin; "Songs My Mother Taught Me," Dvorák; "Summer," by Chaminade.

Baker and Harry Baker, of the Apollo Club; Mrs. J. H. Smissaert, Miss Hilda Gottesleben, Miss Florence Taussig, Fritz Thies, Henry Houseley, E. S. Cullis and Wardner Williams. Others are to be added to the committee.

One of the finest musical entertainments given in Dubuque, Ia., for a long time, was the concert given at Saenberbund Auditorium for the benefit of the Holy Ghost Church. The audience was a large and cultured one, and included many representative citizens and nearly all the singers and musicians of the city. The concert was under the immediate direction of Prof. Joseph J. Dreher. The chorus taking part were Mrs. B. Jestel, Miss Louisa Adam, Misses Lizzie Hartmann, Lena Holz, Lizzie Grode, Bertha Brede, Veronica Lierheimer, Lonia Weitz, Mary Kaiser, Emma Schyerrer, Emily Richter, Anna Luthmers, Martha Eisert, Mamie Oser, Margaret Huekels, Marie A. Henriette Weber's Success.

CONSIDERING that this is only Henriette Weber' second winter of professional work in New York her success has been remarkable. In addition to a growing class of pupils, who are studying piano, German or Frenc diction, or are being coached in repertory, she is filling many engagements as accompanist and pianist. Among th recent concerts where Miss Weber has appeared in one o both capacities are: A recital with Oley Speaks, th basso, at Huntington, L. I.; a concert at Wallkill, N. Y. Mansfield, Ohio, with Minne Humphryes, where the paper had the following to say in regard to this pianist:

Miss Henriette Weber, a charming pianist, accompanied Mr. Humphryes, and played three numbers on the program. She wa also compelled to respond to encores, and gracefully responded Her playing was most artistic and she shared in the triumph ma terially.—Mansfield Shield, November 23.

Mrs. Humphryes divided the honors with Miss Weber, and ever number that each rendered was received with high appreciation * * * Miss Weber's piano selections included among others Rach maninoff's Prelude, Sinding's "Fruhlingsrauschen" and March Grotesque, Rubinstein's Valse Caprice, and as many others in re sponse to recalls. She played with great expression and skill, and was gracious in her responses to the appreciation of her hearers. Mansfield News, November 23.

Other concerts at which Miss Weber has recently ap peared were Pittsfield, Mass.; the concert and reception tendered the "Baldwin" artists by Arnold Somlyo, o Carnegie Hall; a reception at the studio of the well known artists Miss Lufkin, and last evening the concer given by Minne Humphryes in Brooklyn.

Some of this pianist's dates for the near future are: New York Press Club, December 12; Madame Newhaus' musi cale, December 15; Church of the Divine Paternity concert December 18, and with Dr. Carl E. Dufft, at Trenton, N. J. December 19.

FLORENCE RANSTEAD.—Miss Florence Ranstead, the young Baltimore contralto, who recently made her débu at the Waldorf-Astoria, was the soloist at the first concer of the new Peabody Symphony Orchestra, given at Pea body Institute, Baltimore, Saturday evening, November 30 The Baltimore papers published extended criticisms of the concert. We reproduce the paragraphs about Miss Ran stead:

Miss Florence Ranstead, of this city, who made her first appear ance at a symphony concert here, sang a recitative and air from Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah," with orchestral accompaniment and "Sea Slumber Song," by Edward W. Englar, and "Noël Paien and "Pensée d'Automne," by Massenet, to piano accompaniment b Miss Clara Ascherfeld.

* * * Miss Ranstead's voice has been carefully cultivated. It range is good, being better in the middle register, and she sang last night with intelligence and care. There was, however, evidence a times of effort. All the songs were well sung, but the best effec was in the Massenet selections. She was rewarded with beautifu flowers, and was several times recalled.—Baltimore American.

It was apparent from the start that principal interest was man fested in the appearance of the talented Baltimore vocalist, Mis Florence Ranstead, who for the first time was given the opportunit to display in this city those musicianly accomplishments whic brought her so much favorable comment in New York city as we as in foreign musical centres.

Of a splendid stage presence, and possessing a great, big con tralto voice, of excellent range and agreeable mellowness, sh proved a delight to the audience, who gave her an ovation afte her singing of Saint-Saëns' recitative and aria from "Samson an Delilah." This dramatic number was well adapted to the soloist' vibrant lower register notes and was sung with a fine verve sug gestive of the operatic stage rather than concert work.

For her second numbers Miss Ranstead arranged a series of thre songs, with piano, which, though trying for a contralto, were pre sented in a manner that elicited the sincere approval of the critic present.—Baltimore Herald, December 1, 1901.

VITTORIO CARPI'S WORK.

WHEN Vittorio Carpi, the distinguished operatic baritone and teacher, returned to this country several months ago, the fact was announced in THE MUSICAL COURIER. Many of the friends of the artist welcomed him when he arrived here, and later when he let it be known that he would locate in New York and devote himself to teaching he received numerous applications from singers. Then came Mr. Carpi's concert at Mendelssohn Hall, at which he was assisted by his pupil, Miss Winnie Titus. The program for the concert gave some hint of Carpi's extensive repertory. The operatic numbers which he gave included the Romanza from Massenet's "Re di Lahore," the "Credo" from Verdi's "Otello" and the humorous "Quard'era Paggio," from Verdi's "Falstaff." Mr. Carpi sang also with Miss Titus. a duet from Donizetti's comic opera, "Don Pasquale." The audience at Mendelssohn Hall compelled Mr. Carpi to repeat the "Falstaff" number. But Carpi interprets songs as convincingly as he does operatic selections. He sang Lohm's "Still Wie die Nacht" in the original German, R. C. Hole's "Auf Wiedersehen" in English and Cherubini's beautiful "Ave Maria" in Italian. A group of three numbers in the second part of the concert included Mr. Carpi's own tender song, "And Have You Too"; the Habanera from Tradier's "El Sol de Sevilla" and Coen's "Chanson Trompez moi Trompons Nous." When Mr. Carpi sang these last named compositions at the Singakademie in Berlin, he was heartily applauded and compelled to respond with encores. In phrasing, intelligence, repose and sincerity he reveals the true artist and man.

At the above mentioned concert Miss Titus sang the "Staccato Polka," by Mulder; the Waltz from Gounod's "Mireille," an aria from Auber's "Manon"; "The Nightingale's Song," by Nevin, and "Juniata," from Tradier's opera "La Perla de Aragon." Miss Titus' coloratura voice has been admirably trained by Mr. Carpi. Her high notes are brilliant, and her middle register is sympathetic. The young singer achieved notable success in Italy, as her press notices prove:

(Translations.)

Miss Winnie Titus, at the Famiglia Artistica, in the Proch Variations met with great success.—Corriere della Sera, Milan, Italy.

The singing of Miss Winnie Titus, at the Famiglia Artistica, was partily applauded in the rendition of the Variations of Proch.—La Perseveranza, Milan, Italy.

At a concert given at the Famiglia Artistica, the singing of Miss Winnie Titus was highly appreciated, giving evidence of great intelligence and the best vocal qualities.—La Lombardia, Milan, Italy.

In a recent musicale at the Carpi School, the singing of "Caro Nome" by Miss Winnie Titus was greatly admired. She has a perfect soprano voice of great range and clearness.—La Lanterna, Milan, Italy.

At the Famiglia Artistica an interesting concert was given, in which Miss Winnie Titus, a young and distinguished singer, took part. She is a singer leggiero, and shows remarkable skill in coloratura, singing with ease and fluency all runs, trills, cadenzas and staccato notes.—La Ribalta, Naples.

In the concert at the Famiglia Artistica, Miss Winnie Titus, soprano leggiero, possessed a voice of great purity and sweetness. She appeared to great advantage in the Proch Variations. She showed therein great intelligence and an unusual degree of cultivation, which does honor not only to her own industry, but also to the method of her teacher.—Il Mondo Artistico, Milan.

At a musicale given at the home of the renowned maestro, Sig. Vittorio Carpi, at Milan, a pupil of his, Miss Winnie Titus, a singer of rare vocal attainments, was tendered an ovation after the rendition of the "Shadow Song," from Meyerbeer's "Dinorah," winning the warmest applause and admiration of the critics.—La Nuova Musica, Florence.

In these days we have had the pleasure to hear Signorina Winnie Titus, distinguished pupil of Sig. Vittorio Carpi. Miss Titus possesses a voice of great extension, purity and sweetness, and modulates with mastery her splendid and flexible voice of soprano leggiero, astonishing with her rare evenness and intonation. To this young lady, on whom smiles an artistic and brilliant future, we offer our heartfelt wishes, and also our congratulations to the renowned Maestro Carpi.—Il Palcoscenico, Milan.

Miss Winnie Titus is a young American who has studied in the Carpi school. We have heard her sing the aria, "Deh, vieni, non tardar," from Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro," and the waltz, "Mireille," of Gounod, and we are convinced that with a voice of such extension and facility to high E, clearness of diction, natural ability and good pronunciation she can with honor dedicate herself to our stage. Signorina Titus, however, at present, has not the intention to embrace the Italian career, but instead to sing in her own country, in which undoubtedly her good qualities and excellent method of her renowned teacher will be appreciated as truly they merit.—Il Mondo Artistico, Milan.

As an artist, Mr. Carpi has achieved many triumphs, and as a teacher his success has been phenomenal. During the last year of his teaching in Chicago the number of his pupils possibly exceeded that of any singing teacher there engaged in the work of instruction of that city. A bona fide list of his pupils in that year included the following:

Miss Cora Vance,	Miss W. S. Gelleland,

Jessie Shay.

MISS JESSIE SHAY, the piano soloist at the Kubelik concerts, is reaping her share of the honors. Following are extracts from reports in the New York and Boston papers:

Miss Jessie Shay played with finish the piano part of the last two movements of Henselt's F minor Concerto. Her later number, the Litolff Scherzo for piano and orchestra, was given in all its crystalline glory. Miss Shay was recalled several times.—New York Sun, December 3.

Miss Jessie Shay played the piano in her refined and finished manner.—New York World.

Miss Shay, the pianist, was on the program with two movements from the F minor Henselt Concerto and the scherzo from Litolff's Concerto. In the former she displayed taste and a smooth, soft tone. Miss Shay has facile fingers, a delicate finger technic and strong wrists.—New York Journal.

That Miss Shay was not eclipsed is a proof of her sterling merit. She attacked the Henselt Concerto with the authority of a young person who knows to a nicety what she wishes to do. She has more than the average technical equipment; much more than the average intelligence. She has considerable nerve, and is one of the best of the young pianists of this country and time.—New York Press.

Miss Shay is not unknown in our concert halls, and occupies a foremost place among the younger pianists of the city. She proved last night not only her excellently perfected technic, but also good musical taste. The applause with which her performance was richly rewarded was well earned.—Staats-Zeitung.

Miss Shay played with a nice, crisp technic, a good singing tone and an altogether admirable command of her instrument.—Commercial Advertiser, December 3.

Miss Jessie Shay, of New York, played unostentatiously and excellently two movements from the familiar Henselt Concerto, and gave light and lucent gayety to the scherzo of the Litolff Concerto.—Boston Herald, December 5.

Miss Shay's piano solos were admirably played, especially the staccato work in the Litolff Scherzo.—Boston Globe, December 5.

JACOBY IN CHICAGO.

Her Big Success at the Apollo Club's Concert.

CHICAGO, December 4, 1901

THE most important concert of the week has taken place. December 2 was the date. Chicago's Auditorium the scene.

And as a brilliant event it must be described. For the Apolio Club presented before several thousands of interested hearers Saint-Saëns' "Samson and Delilah."

This chorus of 400 voices knew its parts well, the biblical opera having in past seasons been sung by the Apollo Club. Therefore the occasion was devoid of that species of anxiety which permeates stage, gallery and orchestra chairs when a "first night" production is given.

The chorus, under Harrison Wild's able and commanding guidance, did much excellent work. There were prompt attacks, satisfactory tone blendings and some intensely dramatic effects. "Israel! Break Your Chain" reached a fine climax. "Psalms of Praise Loudly Swell," for male voices, was, it must be admitted, decidedly off pitch. "God Meant Thou Shouldst Take the Command" received a stately and impressive interpretation, the contrapuntal passages being nobly voiced; while later, in the same scene, the chorus sang "He For a Woman Sold His Power" admirably, both from musical and dramatic points of view, the cadence terminating on G major being especially worthy of praise. The semi-chorus, "Now Spring's Generous Hand," must be mentioned among particularly finished and attractive features. As a conductor, Mr. Wild practically and satisfactorily demonstrated that he cherishes high ideals.

Support given by the Chicago orchestra was, as a rule, acceptable. The interlude preceding Delilah's first solo was well played. At the organ Wilhelm Middleschulte presided in musicianly manner.

And the soloists?

Charles Gauthier sang the exacting part of Samson. Now, Mr. Gauthier is considered a remarkable tenor, and so he may well be considered. His voice is of great range and power. But in his singing of Samson's lines there was lack of tone coloring. Where were the shadings? Everything seemed to be forte. And usually double forte. In the words, "Delilah! Delilah! I love thee!" artificiality existed. There were "tears" in the voice, when the tears should have been elsewhere. Mr. Gauthier sang with warmth, and always with sincerity. To the French text he adhered.

Herman Devries likewise sang in French, and the mixture of languages was unfortunate. For, with the exception of these two, everyone else sang in English. As the High Priest, Mr. Devries was heard in a role well suited to his excellent dramatic and musical qualifications. "Curse You and Your Nation Forever" he gave finely, and his work in the second scene of act two was particularly noteworthy. Mr. Devries is emotional. He sacrifices his voice to the dramatic effect not infrequently. But then he secures the dramatic effect, and thus compensation presents itself.

Abimelech's part was taken somewhat spasmodically by John W. Lince, who possesses an exceptionally heavy bass voice. Assistance was given by two popular Chicago tenors, H. W. Newton and Walter Root.

The musicians of Chicago have been discussing the Apollo Club concert. Yesterday it was much talked of and to-day it remains a topic of conversation. There are few who will deny that what has already been described served as a picturesque setting, a musical background, so to speak. For the heroine of the occasion was an eminent American contralto. Chief interest centered in the appearance of

JOSEPHINE JACOBY AS DELILAH.

Madame Jacoby's majestic beauty and her wonderful voice alone would have been sufficient to arouse enthusiasm. But her intellectual conception of the role, her dramatic interpretations and fine vocalization combined to make her artistic achievement remarkable. "To-night Samson Makes His Obeisance" was sung magnificently. "My Heart at Thy Dear Voice," full of fervor, marvelous tone coloring and expressiveness, indeed rose, in the words of the song, to "heights of splendor." More animation would have been welcomed in "The Spring, With Her Dower of Bird and of Flower," but in this opening number diction and enunciation especially were exquisite. A thrilling dramatic climax found expression in "Coward! You Loveless Heart, I Despise You! Away!" followed by "Your Aid, Philistines." The high B flat was taken with as much ease and effectiveness as that which characterized the low A flat, previously heard, and both tones were of pure contralto quality.

When at Richard Burmeister's private musicale in New York last winter Madame Jacoby sang "The Two Sisters," Tennyson's tragic poem, set to music by Mr. Burmeister, the eminent musicians present reflected: "How dramatic!" And now, at the Apollo Club concert, her dramatic presentation of Delilah once again has exerted its powerful influence.

You may have heard that a grand opera company is to visit Chicago this season.

If, on some auspicious "first night," or second night—it wouldn't matter which—Madame Jacoby should happen to appear as Carmen, where do you suppose the other contraltos would be?

Don't you think the first impulse of one or two of them might be to run across the wintry boulevard and take refuge under the protecting ice of Lake Michigan?

So, after all, it is quite providential that Madame Jacoby is not singing in grand opera just at present.

Concerning her appearance on this occasion tributes worthy of reproduction were printed in the Chicago papers.

Glenn Dillard Gunn in the Journal wrote in praise of the eminent contralto: "The second act opens with the well-known aria, 'O Love! Of Thy Might Let Me Borrow,' which Madame Jacoby sang superbly. From that point to the end of the work the interest does not flag, the beauty of the music alone, aside from the dramatic element which abounds, being sufficient to sustain it. The second act is the strongest. It reaches its climax, and the climax of the opera as well, in the wonderful aria, 'My Heart at Thy Dear Voice.' This Madame Jacoby sang very artistically. Her voice is a rich, sympathetic mezzo, strong and with that throbbing sensuous vibrato—in short, just such a voice as Saint-Saëns might have had in mind when he wrote the part."

"Madame Jacoby received more kind words than the others, more applause and as many flowers as she could carry away with her. She not only has a voice of rare sweetness and power, but she is handsome and wears her clothes well." Such was the practical estimate of the Inter Ocean, which later on affirmed that "the song which was received most enthusiastically was Delilah's 'My heart at thy dear voice opens wide like the flower which the morn's kiss wakens.'"

"Of the soloists Mme. Josephine Jacoby claimed first attention," said the critical Tribune, "not alone by reason of the importance of the part she took in the performance but by virtue of the superior quality of her work. Delilah long has been identified with her as an artist, not only the rich, luscious quality of her voice and her manner of singing, but her appearance and temperament all tending to qualify her especially for satisfactorily interpreting the sensuous music Saint-Saëns has written for the beautiful enchantress.

"Last evening her singing failed not to exert its charm and although a little more of animation would have been acceptable in the dramatic moments at the close of the second act and throughout the scene in the temple, one could but realize that the singer was hampered by the polyglot conditions imposed upon her, and could give her, therefore, only heartier commendation for her admirable work in the temptation scene of Act II."

The Evening Post asserts that Madame Jacoby put "feeling, variety, emotion and color" into her singing, while Leone Langdon-Key, of the American, explained that "Madame Josephine Jacoby, who sang the part of Delilah, is one of the most satisfying singers sent us from the East and was the artist of the evening.

"She has a rich contralto voice, dramatic and magnetic which might easily be heard here once every two years and lose none of its charm and value; a radiant personality, reposeful and confident almost to a point of nonchalance."

"Madame Jacoby has been heard here before in the role

)f Delilah and, therefore, nothing new can be said of her," he Chronicle stated, and added: "She has a voice pecu- iarly warm in tone and flexible in execution, that shows o good advantage in the melodious arias allotted to De- ilah, and her phrasing and enunciation are so nearly per- ect as to merit high commendation."

The Record-Herald's critic wrote: "The performance gave evident satisfaction, and there were many outbursts)f applause, intended especially for Mme. Josephine Jac-)by and also for M. Charles Gauthier.

"As Delilah Madame Jacoby repeated former successes. Her mellow, rich lower register, the tender, passionate notes above, and her clear enunciation enabled her to give n excellent interpretation of the taxing part assigned her. Her denunciation of Samson at the close of the second ct was a well handled climax, in which she displayed reat tonal power and earned enthusiastic applause from udience and chorus."

And here, in conclusion, is a quotation from the Daily News: "The popular aria, 'My Heart at Thy Sweet Voice,' was given in beautifully clear tones and with a fair egree of warmth and feeling. The English enunciation, oo, was decidedly acceptable, which is more than can be enerally conceded for our harsh language as presented in ong."

Many Musicians Present.

Among the many musicians in the large audience were Irs. Anna Groff Bryant, Helen Buckley, Mabelle Craw- ord, Clara Murray, Louise Blish, Mrs. van Valkenburg of Kansas City), Karleton Hackett, Frederick Warren, Charles W. Clark, L. G. Gottschalk, Frederick W. Root, V. H. Pontius (of Dubuque), Charles Beach and P. A.)tis.

Officers of the Apollo Club.

In addition to Harrison Wild, conductor; Arthur Dun- am, accompanist, and Wilhelm Middleschulte, organist, the fficers of the Apollo Club are: Clarence P. van Inwegen, resident; Nathaniel Board, vice-president, and Louis vans, secretary-treasurer. The directors include Frank- n C. Hollister, Geo. D. Holmes, Charles H. Blatchford, Geo. L. Cragg, J. H. Levi, Arthur Heurtley, C. A. Adams nd W. W. Dodge, while the music committee consists of H. Levi, Arthur Dunham, E. T. Clissold and Chas. H. Marsh.

The Club's Forthcoming Events.

On December 25 the Apollo Club will give "The Mes- iah," with Eleanor Meredith, Mabelle Crawford, E. C. owne and W. A. Howland as soloists. At the next vent, on February 17, 1902, with Madame Schumann- Heink and Holmes Cowper as assisting artists, the ensuing art song program will be presented:

idge Me, O God.....Mendelssohn
antata .....Clarence Lucas
Composed for the Apollo Club.
ing Out, Wild Bells.....Gounod
Arranged for the Apollo Club by Frederick W. Root.
ove Wakes and Weeps.....Caldicott Shadow.....Golmick
pring .....Grechaninof
he Lord Is My Light.....W. H. Parker

And on April 28, 1902, Helen Buckley, George Hamlin, harles W. Clark, Claude Cunningham and the Chicago rchestra will take part in the Apollo Club's performance f Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." All these concerts will e held at the Auditorium.

It is unfortunate that audiences do not know better than to applaud singers in the midst of critical passages during oratorio or operatic performances. At the Apollo Club concert on Monday night, when "Samson and Delilah" was being sung, thoughtlessness was displayed in this regard. If it is impolite for one person to interrupt another in conversation, how much more inconsiderate must it be for a large assembly thus to embarrass one soloist.

The Spiering Quartet.

The Spiering Quartet recently made a successful tour of Texas, places visited including Galveston, Huntsville and San Antonio. Last week important appearances were made in Ohio. In Chicago this organization has auspiciously entered upon its ninth season, Mozart's beautiful Quartet in C major, and Friedrich Kiel's Waltz, for string quartet, in G major, being among this year's interesting program features.

Chicago is in a practical manner showing its appreciation of the estimable work which is being accomplished by the Spiering Quartet on behalf of the best ensemble music. The subscription list for the series of concerts at Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, is large and representative, and the local press has been enthusiastic in its estimates.

On December 17 the quartet will present the ensuing program in the Music Hall:

Quartet No. 2, in E flat major, op. 11 (first time).....D'Albert
Songs by Schumann, Liszt, Grieg and Spiering.
Miss Bertha M. Kaderly.
Rondo for violin and piano.....Schubert
Otto Roehrborn and Walter Spry.
Quartet in A major, op. 18, No. 5.....Beethoven

It is learned that Madame Nordica recently complimented Mrs. Regina Watson on her charming songs, several of which the eminent soprano will sing at concerts this season.

Two books of songs by Carrie Jacobs-Bond are attracting attention among the Chicago musicians, "Lily and the Rose," "Just a Wearyin' For You" and "Po' Lil' Lamb" being particularly popular features.

A program of music by Chicago composers was given by the music department of the Englewood Woman's Club on the afternoon of December 2. Among composers represented were Frederic Grant Gleason, William Sherwood, Frederick W. Root, R. H. Bowers, Mrs. Crosby Adams, Mr. Weidig, Eleanor Smith, John West and W. C. E. Seeboeck, while the performers included Miss Fay Hill and Errico Sansone, of the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory.

The fact that Karleton Hackett, of the American Conservatory's faculty, does not devote more time to literary matters has been deplored by musical authorities, who rightly hold in very high esteem his exceptional ability as a writer. But the musical world need not complain, for, as is well known, Mr. Hackett is eminently successful in the realm of voice culture and artistic singing.

Mme. Margaretha Wunderle, the harpist, has signed a contract giving Dunstan Collins her exclusive management until July 1, 1903. She wil also tour with the Steindel Company next season, under Mr. Collins' management.

Dunstan Collins has retired from the lecture and lyceum bureau direction, and hereafter will manage only high class musical companies and prominent artists.

This week Burton Holmes' illustrated lecture on Siberia attracted many interested hearers to the Studebaker Hall, Fine Arts Building.

Apropos of Sunday concerts: A manager in Montreal was, on November 29, sentenced to two hours' imprisonment for allowing the doors of his theatre to be opened on their account.

A legal authority in Canada writes to The Musical Courier's Chicago Department: "Unless the theatre is successful in its appeal, this will close the series."

Anna Millar, manager of the Paur Symphony Orchestra, of New York, paid Chicago a short visit this week.

George Hamlin, the eminent Chicago tenor, will arrive in New York next week for the purpose of giving recitals in Mendelssohn Hall on December 12 and 16, when he will be associated with Victor Harris, as accompanist.

For the past sixteen years Prof. G. Mantellini, director of the Chicago School of Languages, Fine Arts Building, has successfully taught foreign languages in Chicago, besides being the author of numerous articles and pamphlets, published in this country and abroad. It is learned that he is also the translator of Edmondo de Amici's works, "Cuore" ("The Heart of a Boy"), and "La Maestrina degli Operai" ("Won by a Woman"), which have met with great success in educational centres. Professor Mantellini has recently finished the translation into English of Gabriele d'Annunzio's latest work, "La Citta Morta" ("The Dead City"), a tragedy, played abroad by Eleonora Duse and Sarah Bernhardt. He is now engaged in putting into English "La Ballerina" ("The Ballet Girl"), the last sensational work of Mme. Matilde Serao, whom Professor Mantellini describes as "the Georges Sand of Italy."

Esther Feé will play Bruch's Violin Concerto in G minor at the Pittsburg Orchestra concert in the Auditorium on Tuesday evening, December 10.

Jeannette Durno, the pianist, will give a recital on December 9, at Adrian, Mich., and a musicale on the afternoon of December 12, at the residence of Mrs. Bertram W. Sippy, in the Winnemac, Chicago.

The Lincoln Daily News prints the following appreciative paragraph concerning Miss Katherine Johnston, one of Maurice Aronson's pupils:

The piano playing of Miss Katherine Johnston was a revelation to her most sanguine friends. She was received enthusiastically, and her playing well merited her cordial reception. The Caprice on airs from Gluck's "Alceste," by Saint-Saëns, is a difficult composition, requiring great technic and skill. Miss Johnston played this number magnificently, and the audience gave her close and appreciative attention during its rendition.

Gratifying to themselves and their instructor is the success of a large number of Maurice Aronson's pupils, some of whom have studied with him since they came to Chicago five years ago. It should be remembered also that Mr. Aronson's pupils are as loyal as they are successful.

At Mrs. Regina Watson's School for the Higher Art of Piano Playing an interesting children's program was presented on December 7 at 3 p. m., sixteen talented young performers taking part. On Wednesday afternoon, December 11, pupils of Mrs. Regina Watson will hold an informal musicale at her residence on Indiana street.

Many people were turned away from Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, in a state of disappointment on Tuesday evening, December 3, for so large was the audience that seats were at a premium. The event was a song recital, given under the auspices of the American Conservatory by Madame Ragna Linne, soprano, and Glenn Hall, tenor, with Allen Spencer as assisting pianist.

Mr. Spencer opened the program with compositions by Haydn, Schubert and van Westerhout, his interpretation of "Momento Capriccioso," by the last named musician, being particularly brilliant. Later he played Grieg's "Wedding Day at Troldhaugen," improvisation on Walther's "Prize Song" (Wagner), Schuett, and, as a final contribution, Leschetizky's Tarantelle in E minor. Though he received a well deserved ovation, Mr. Spencer could not be prevailed upon to give an encore.

Madame Linne sang "My Rest Is Gone," Graben-Hoffman; "Woodland Serenade," Mascheroni; "When the Land Was White With Moonlight," Nevin; Schumann's "The Lotus Flower"; "My Heart is in Bloom," Brahms; Schubert's "Mine" and a duet with Mr. Hall, "'Neath the Stars," Goring-Thomas. Madame Linne's singing was finished in style and artistic in conception. On one or two occasions her voice showed signs of fatigue. She was enthusiastically encored.

The tenor, Glenn Hall, who is one of the most prominent singers in the West to-day, was heard in contrasting numbers, extending from "Who Is Sylvia?" to French, Irish, Scotch and German songs. Mr. Hall's interpretation of Foote's "I'm Wearing Awa', Jean" was exquisite. His first selections were somewhat lacking in repose, but this gifted tenor is always artistic. Full of beauty and strength as his voice is now, it will continue to develop. Leoncavallo's C'était un Rêve" was admirably sung. One of his encores, "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes," was a memorable feature. "Si mes vers avaient des ailes" also is deserving of special mention.

Mrs. Karleton Hackett and Miss Julia Caldwell were the efficient accompanists.

The second event in the series of ballad concerts under the auspices of the Clayton F. Summy Company will take place on Thursday afternoon, December 12, at Music Hall, Fine Arts Building. Artists announced for this occasion are Mme. Ragna Linne, soprano; Miss Elaine de Sellem, contralto; Claude Cunningham, baritone, and Mr. Seeboeck, pianist. Several Chicago composers will be represented on the program.

Under the capable direction of Louis Evans, Gaul's sacred cantata, "The Holy City," was given on the evening of December 5 at the Normal Park Baptist Church. Mr. Evans was fortunate in securing for this occasion prominent soloists, including Charles W. Clark, Mrs. Stevenson Tewksbury, D. V. Key and Adah Bryant. Miss E. Humphreville, the accompanist, played in a sympathetic and musicianly manner. The chorus was well balanced, and its phrasings and shadings were praiseworthy.

ton, and Mrs. Mullette sang the "Laudate Dominum" from Mozart's Vespers with so much taste and finish, fine interpretation and facility of execution that she called forth encomiums of praise from a number of the best musicians and critics of the city. In consequence she has received excellent offers for church, concert and recital engagements. Last month she sang at a musicale given by the Alumnæ Association of the Sacred Heart Convent in Chicago. Before the large and cultured audience Mrs. Mullette interpreted Schubert's "Erl King" with dramatic intensity and expressive tone coloring. She assumed in turn the descriptive, pathetic, graceful and tragic; her emotions and facial expression changing with the music, and so distinct was her enunciation and so vivid the picture she portrayed that the audience was held spellbound. Responding to an enthusiastic encore she sang a Chopin waltz.

Her numbers last week at the St. Patrick's Church concert, Chicago, included "With Verdure Clad," from "The Creation," and a recitative and aria by Händel.

Mrs. Mullette possesses not only a voice of exceptionally pleasing quality and much flexibility. She is gifted also with an artistic temperament.

GLENN HALL'S SUCCESS.

MUSIC critics continue to write in enthusiastic term concerning Glenn Hall, tenor, of Chicago. The ensuing well merited estimates are of recent date:

THRONG HEARS LOCAL SINGERS.

Glenn Hall and Madame Linne Please Big Music Hall Audience

It is refreshing to hear improvement. A man so much before th public, and so capable, usually considers himself good enough. I takes to doing unheard of things.

He becomes a graduate with "high honors," in his own estimati at least, and that usually settles him so for as genuine artist progress goes.

In so far as it is possible to prophesy, I predict eventual su cess of exceptional mold for Glenn Hall. He practically has h future before him, and his large circle of admirers are fully justifi wishing him a brilliant career.

Mr. Hall sang "I'm Wearing Awa', Jean" (Foote), and the "Iri Love Song" (Long), with real warmth and expressiveness. H lighter numbers were delicately done and artistic. The Vanni Serenade showed the voice in its best light, and was incidentally good composition.—Chicago American, December 4, 1901.

THE GLENN HALL CONCERT.

Mr. Hall has a voice of fine quality and large service. It is b almost baritone in its depth, yet capable of bringing out the m delicate effects. His personal style is also very pleasing, for in a dition to good looks he has an authoritative assurance, which c tributes to the comfort of any audience. He was epecially effecti in the recitative and aria, "Eugen Onegin," by Tschaikowsky, whi he sang with expression and style. He gave a classic group, cluding Schumann, Brahms and Schubert numbers, with excelle taste and finish, and his ballads, which were perhaps more enjoy than his other numbers, were well chosen and beautifuly sung. M Hall is one of the most interesting concert attractions that Kans City has had. It is said to be more than probable that he will heard with the Oratorio Society later in the season.—Kansas C Star, November 29, 1901.

Mr. Hall in his solo work was thoroughly enjoyable. His Germ songs were perhaps the most profoundly musical, but the Scot ballads won the audience by their exquisite pathos—"The Land the Leal" and "Mavourneen" being the favorites. The old Engli ditties were charming, "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes" bei especially winsome in the romantic version so natural to his voi "Love Has Eyes" and "Who Is Sylvia?" half playful, pretty c ceits, brought him much laughter and appreciation. He was ten and thoughtful in "Du hist wie eine Blume" (Schumann); happy the "Standchen" (Brahms), and wistful in a free but lovely trans tion of the well-known Schubert Serenade. "Si mes vers avaient d ailes" (Hahn) was given with a bewitching coquetry. A very s and beautiful effect was made in his rendition of "Thy Beami Eyes" (MacDowell). Perhaps the severest artistic test was his op ing number, the recitative and aria from "Eugen Onegin" (Tsch kowsky), in which his dramatic tenor come out in the eloqu German cadences of impassioned pleading and sorrow.—Kansas C Journal, November 29, 1901.

GREGORY HAST IN GREAT DEMAND.—Gregory Hast, t distinguished English tenor, who has already proven o of the season's big successes, repeated his triumph of N vember 20 in Philadelphia by singing a return date the Saturday, December 7. He then presented a full recit program, and was indorsed by both press and public cordially as upon his initial appearance.

Mr. Hast has been engaged for a recital at Wells C lege, Aurora, N. Y., in celebration of "Founders' Da and, among other dates in the near future, he will sing wi the Chromatic Club in Troy, N. Y.; at a private music in Pittsburg; again with the Mozart Club in that city. B sides singing the tenor role in "Elijah," with the N York Oratorio Society in a special performance Mond night, Mr. Hast will also sing with the same organi tion in the evening performance of "The Messiah." Carnegie Hall, December 28. His brief season in Ameri may have to be extended a few weeks, so great is t demand for this artist.

JOSEPHINE MILDENBERG.—Josephine Mildenberg will s at the Professional Women's League December 23, wh a special program offering novel attractions suggestive the season will be given.

SOUSA'S BAND ABROAD.

GEORGE FREDERIC HINTON, the assistant manager of Sousa's Band, has returned to New York. He sailed from New York August 28 on the St. Paul for Liverpool, and arrived here on the Oceanic December 4. Mr. Hinton talks interestingly about Sousa's wonderful success in England and at the Glasgow Exposition. He says from every point of view the trip abroad was far more successful than was anticipated, either by Mr. Sousa or the English managers. The financial results were unexpectedly large.

The day after the band arrived in London it opened a short engagement in the Royal Albert Hall, playing to 29,000 people in two concerts and one matineee. This broke all records.

At Glasgow a four weeks' engagement was played. The band was the principal musical attraction there. Every concert was attended by an enormous crowd and the enthusiasm was unparalleled. Sousa's farewell concert attracted a throng which exceeded in size any audience that had gathered together on any occasion during the exposition. He was given a magnificent send-off. The diplomas which were awarded to him at the Glasgow Exposition arrived here yesterday and are now on exhibition in Mr. Sousa's office in Astor Court.

Mr. Hinton says that the tour through the Provinces was an unmatched success. In Liverpool over $4,000 was taken in in one concert and matinee. In Birmingham the police had to stop the sale of tickets on account of the crowds. The same thing occurred at Oxford. Altogether Mr. Sousa's band gave thirty-one concerts in London, and the attendance and the enthusiasm increased to the very end. The press was very considerate, and in many instances exceedingly kind. Contrary to all precedent, the newspapers were extremely liberal in their advance notices for the Sousa concerts. The music critics in the main were fair, particularly those on the London press. The tour from the beginning to the end was a gratifying success, not only to Mr. Sousa, but to the English syndicate which backed him. This body of moneyed men, with Philip York at its head, directed the tour with great ability and achieved the best possible results. Wherever the band played a return engagement was demanded, and the entire trip could have been repeated with even greater success.

It has been definitely decided that the band shall return to Europe next June for a twenty-five weeks' tour. Two years from now Sousa expects to make a grand tour of the world. This trip will occupy thirteen months. Sousa was the recipient of many honors at the hands of the English nobility and the distinguished citizens of London and Glasgow. He was entertained at a dinner and reception by Alfred de Rothschild. On this occasion Melba sang and Ysaye played. Many social courtesies were shown him and Mrs. Sousa. The most notable distinction conferred upon him was the command for him to play before King Edward VII. This event has been already fully described in the papers.

Sousa and his band will sail from Southampton for New York at the close of a short engagement in some of the cities which he did not visit on his previous tour, and it is expected that they will arrive in New York December 21. Mr. Sousa will then take three weeks' vacation. He will spend most of the time in North Carolina.

The night after his arrival in New York (Sunday night, December 22) his band will give a concert in the Broadway Theatre. This will afford Mr. Sousa's friends an opportunity to give him a fitting reception.

The regular tour will begin January 12. After the band makes a tour through New England it will go to the South and wind up in the Middle West.

Mr. Hinton says that the soloists who were with the band, namely, Dorothy Hoyle, violinst; Maud Reese Davies, soprano, and Arthur Pryor, trombone player, achieved considerable success and received many fine notices at the hands of the critics.

TRIBUTE TO LEONORA JACKSON.

LEONORA JACKSON, the distinguished violin virtuosa, has appeared during the past two weeks in the chief cities of the New England States, arousing the same enthusiasm which has crowned her efforts throughout Europe and America. Like all noted artists she is the recipient often of rich gifts, poems written in her honor, &c. The following tribute was sent her recently by a stranger, a lady who heard her at a recent concert:

To Leonora Jackson, violinist:

She stands in queenly pose of noble calm,
And o'er the precious instrument she loves
Bends low her girlish head, as in caress;
And then with gracious curve of conscious power,
Lifts o'er the vibrant strings the arching bow.
And lo! the lark wheels high in Heaven's blue,
Exulting in an ecstasy of song,
And in an undertone, the purl of streams
And whir of insects, fluttering wings unite
With children's laughter, and the zephyr's sigh;
And twilight falls, the while the nightingale
Across the misty valley yearning calls;
And then from out the darkness comes a cry,
A human voice in throes of mortal woe,
An anguished prayer outreaching toward relief,
Yet mellowed by a throbbing note of trust,
And lighter grows the darkness toward the dawn,
And sweeter, fuller, stronger grow the chords,
'Till faith, and hope, and love, and prayer, and praise
Unite in noble strains of victory,
And Heaven's choir is opened, and we hear
The note that satisfies our long desire.

* * * * * *

And thus, upon our hearts' vibrating strings,
Her supple fingers delicately play;
Her bow a mystic spell doth o'er us cast,
Till, at her lightest touch, our ravished souls
To hers respond, with melody athrill.

WHO said that this was to be a dull musical season?

LILLIAN RUSSELL was born in Clinton, Ia., December 4, 1861. She was therefore forty years old last week. Why this mystery on the part of the dailies?

THE recent revelations in Theodor Reichmann's New York business affairs only prove that a shoemaker should stick to his last. Reichmann was an excellent Hans Sachs, but an indifferent wine merchant.

PLACING music boxes in tombs is now a custom among devoted survivors of the dead. It recalls in a vague way the ancient practice among certain races of putting food and drink on the grave of the departed one. But music boxes!

A FEW hours after M. Paderewski and Mr. Adlington left Warsaw the former was commanded by the Czar to play before the court at the Imperial Palace at Skierniwice, which is near Warsaw. But his Majesty was too late, and the performance must be postponed until after the pianist returns from England and the United States. Paderewski went to Vienna, where at one concert he played concertos by Beethoven, Chopin and himself. He is now touring in Germany, and this month he will be in London.

THE success of John Philip Sousa and his band in London and in Great Britain generally is of still greater magnitude than his triumphs last year in Paris and in Germany, and as a result he has arranged with Philip Yorke, the English manager, to return to London and to give concerts in Great Britain and on the Continent, the tour to begin June 26. A special concert theatre will be secured for the Sousa concerts in London. This signifies that some other band will play at Manhattan Beach next summer. Sousa is due here in about ten days.

PERCY BETTS, of the London Daily News, describes Patti's only appearance in concert there at Albert Hall as entirely satisfactory. Her voice is but slightly worn—not much considering that forty years ago she was singing with Mario at Covent Garden—and she delivered the "Jewel Song," Wagner's "Träume"—Patti—Wagner, what next? and Tosti's "Serenade" with her usual marvelous art. In the face of this prodigy the achievements of Sarah Bernhardt, Lilli Lehmann, the late Sims Reeves and young Jan Kubelik sink into insignificance. Marriage seems to agree with Madame Patti—agree in a way that recalls Henry James' novel, "The Sacred Fount." And as the gentleman remarked in another story after his forcible ejectment from a building: "Vot a method! Vot a system!"

IN the art news of the Evening Post we found the following item:

The judges appointed to consider the designs of the Richard Wagner Monument in Berlin have awarded the first prize of the second competition to Gustav Eberlein, one of the unsuccessful competitors of the earlier contests. In the new design Wagner sits in a massive armchair or throne. On the steps of the pedestal are figures representing poetry and music. The composer, who is represented with a far away look and pondering expression, is writing upon a scroll placed upon the arm of his chair. Behind and by the side of Wagner are smaller figures, illustrating his more famous creations—Siegfried, Brünnhilde, Isolde, Senta, &c. There are three scales for the sizes of the figures, that of Wagner being the largest, the muse of music next, and the operatic characters so small as to suggest pigmies. The result is said to be unfortunate, and quite out of question for the monumental structure intended. The second prize fell to Ernest Freese, who also shows Wagner seated, and the third prize went to Hermann Hosaeus for a symbolical figure representing the genius of the composer. It is not probable that Eberlein's design will be accepted.

IT is a curse to the musical art and its artistic exponents to see the latter puffed to such an extent in the daily illustrated papers as has been Kubelik in the World, Journal and other dailies. It is not necessary for an artist of such magnitude as this gifted Kubelik to have sensational, stupid and sickening articles and interviews printed, and it reacts upon him who becomes the innocent victim after all. It is a sad commentary upon our system of journalism to see art degraded into the realms of the prize ring and the dog and poultry shows and leveled with them in the daily press—a certain portion of it.

The music critics of those papers are not responsible for such a miscarriage of sentiment, and it must be as nauseating to them as it is to all those who can differentiate on the problems of art and of life with its required culture and tact. The effect upon artistic Europe is fatal to our reputation, and it cannot help but damage every one associated with such abominable réclame.

Jan Kubelik and his managers are not accountable for it, as they are also men of taste and of culture; it is all due to the disgusting system of parading sensationalism in public for the sake of revenue.

THE PROFESSOR'S MUSICAL INCUBATOR.

THIS professor is so well known in unmusical circles that his name is as obvious as the third head in puzzle pictures. There rests his identity. Years ago he began climbing the fire escape to Fame, and, having reached the first landing, wrapped his sedate coat tails around one of the rungs and began to shout in order to attract attention. This coat tail episode is not merely lugged in, but has subtle significance: He uses his hands extensively when talking, and had to have them free for shouting. He shouted, but Gotham heeded not. Here was his misery in a nutshell: He had to talk, and was not happy when he was not talking. But no one would listen, and that was a disappointment. So he unwound his coat tails and floundered to earth, and the jolt started an idea: "Why not make them listen? Why not disguise my real purpose, and, under the garb of music or any old thing, get them into the hall and then talk at them?" But his better judgment answered that no folks of mature years would buy musical gold bricks any more, and for a moment he was stumped. Then, with a cunning as old as the Ten Commandments, he bethought him of a subtler scheme: Get the little children to come by announcing that he would play tunes for them with his band, and in this way get all their "Pinafore" relations to attend as escorts. There was the idea, the scheme. But would it last? He knew as well as anyone that, once having heard such a talk as he proposed to let loose at them, they would never come back! It needed a sterner purpose in order to make it last. So the Professor wiped his glasses and then looked at himself in the mirror, and the reflected image suggested the solution. He saw in looking into his own eyes that he knew nothing about musical form, and suspected everyone of being in just the same state of ignorance. "Why not talk to them about the form of the compositions they mean to play? Then, by telling them about it, I can listen to myself and perhaps learn something about it myself. That's it." He turned a mental somersault and went to work. Through the list of the unmusical elect he went with a very fine tooth comb—even finer than the one on which Schubert used to play the "Erlkönig," and that must have been fine indeed—and worked up a list of gurglin-gushing patronesses. He promised them that on certain afternoons during the season he would hold these talks on music with an orchestra for a background; that he would make clear in elegant, oily phrases the inner meaning of musical compositions which ordinarily escaped the child; that, in short, he would, for the mere pleasure of talking and the price of season tickets, analyze for the child the most intricate of musical structure, and by employing definitions and dates (which he was then memorizing from Grove) would so confuse the infant's mind that it must end hopelessly by believing in him and his talk, and in this way gain a wonderful knowledge of music. By transforming the hall into an incubator, he would, during the course of the afternoon, hatch musical intelligence out of every child. And, like a practical incubator agent, he counted the eggs before he began to hatch. He found there were many, and the concerts began.

The Professor is happy—he may talk. He talks all kinds of talk, innocent and ignorant, talks by the yard or by the bucketful and always gives good measure. Now and then he lets the band play; but only for a minute at a time, and he has interrupted them again with his talk. He burdens the young mind with leaden terms until it has dreams of the Submediant eloping with the Concluding Theme and Syncopated storks jamming drooling Dominants down the chimney. Music becomes a hideous nightmare to the child and it firmly believes that Bach and Beethoven only lived so that the Professor might have something to talk about. When the orchestra plays it seems delighted and forgets as hard as it can the jumble of names the Professor has applied to this music. But when the child is happy, when the Professor is conducting, then the older folks are in misery. The Professor has a beat which passes all understanding and especially that of the musicians who play under him. If during a slow movement one follows with the eye the end of this baton one sees that it describes something resembling the figure 8 cut backward by an awkward skater; and during faster episodes the Professor pencils in the air all kinds of cabalistic figures, relieved now and then by motions in place at the handle of a rusty pump. But why take all this part of the Professor's performance seriously? It is all an excuse for his talk; and, of course, no one would dare to take that seriously.

Out of the eggs entrusted him he has thus far made only verbal omelettes. No maidenly hen clucks Bach's air on the G string as the result of the Professor's talk, nor does any youthful rooster crow the Professor's praise as he sits in the sweltering air, choked with words, of this incubator. Yet the Professor talks on and he is happy in his verbal bliss.

EVERY Saturday the Evening Post prints an interesting number from a series of essays entitled "Dialogues in My Library." They are readable, and sometimes the point of vision is fresh. But in the latest contribution there is some criticism of Wagner that carries one back to the prehistoric days when Wagner was a "noise maker," when he dealt in "discords," when his music lacked "spontaneity"; was more "intellectual than emotional." And writers of this sort of ill-considered stuff always confronted the composer of "Die Meistersinger" with Mozart—as if that were a sufficient reason for wiping Wagner off the face of the earth. "J. P. M.," the author of the Evening Post essays, makes one of his mouthpieces talk about "the metaphysician displacing the minstrel," the lack of joy in Wagner's music, its formal, mathematical qualities, &c.

THE SAME OLD WAGNER?

"The difference between Arcady and Wagner is the difference between David and Solomon," said the Dominie, adjusting himself for a peroration. "One was content to be led by Nature herself 'beside the still waters.' The other was intent on erecting the worship of the Eternal into theatric splendor, with all the adjuncts of cedars, and gold and brass. Solomon's work perished in an hour, and with it perished the conceit that God dwelleth in temples made by men's hands. But David's work, that sweet canticle of old, has lived on down all the centuries, like the singing element itself, bringing the gladness of the Judean springs to myriads of parched hearts. Wagner does not commune with anybody. He is the pageant master, and he whispers no little secrets in the gloaming of our spirits. He rings no 'Bells of Iss' under his German ocean that send up strophes out of the heart of Nature. His messages do not perch upon our lips or nestle in our memory. They do not go with us to our work, not fit themselves to our aspirations, nor lend gossamer wings to our joy. They belong to special calendar occasions. He makes only gala days for us, in which we can have music marshaled and thundering like an army with banners. It is music, horse, foot and dragoons. In this sense it celebrates one side of the modern spirit—that side which organizes everything, proclaims itself and is revolutionary, looking to accumulation and concourses for its vindication. How unlike Chopin's dainty concert of music as a little shepherd who takes refuge in a peaceful grotto from an approaching storm! In the distance rushes the wind and the rain, while the shepherd gently plays a melody on his flute."

Now, we ask our readers if all this is not delightfully familiar? But unhappily facts are against the "Dominie." Wagner's music is more emotional and less formal than Mozart's; it is full of the "little secrets" for those who have ears—consider "Tristan und Isolde" and its revelations of two souls! And it is not for "gala days" alone, except in the sense that great art should always be a time for rejoicing. The "still small voice" in Chopin is charming; but there is a time for epics—and Homer could never have written nocturnes. The sense of proportion in criticism seems to be a lost art nowadays. There are some of the superannuated with us who still believe that Wagner's music is "noiser" than Rossini's. To them we recommend "J. P. M." and his sentimental and pathetic fallacies.

MR. FINCK writes in last Saturday's Evening Post: "George Sand, in her 'Histoire de ma Vie,' looked forward to the day when the music of Chopin, the master she had loved, should be brought completely to the orchestra, so that the whole world should appreciate at its full value an individuality 'finer than Bach's, more powerful than Beethoven's, more dramatic than Weber's.' 'Her estimate of the composer would scarcely be accepted by Chopin's keenest admirer nowadays,' says the London Telegraph. That may be true in beefy England, where Chopin has never been understood. In America there are not a few who think that George Sand (except as regards the orchestra) was a sound prophet. In Italy a curious attempt has been made to construct an opera based in part on Chopin's life, and with musical themes taken from his compositions. The opera is thus described:

A CHOPIN OPERA.

"In the first act, 'Christmas,' Chopin is seen at the age of sixteen hard by a village in the neighborhood of Warsaw. Here, amid the noise of a skating festival and other rejoicings, he meets Stella, a young girl who is supposed to typify pure and exalted love. Thus an idyllic love story begins, broken in upon only by the songs of the peasants who go churchward to celebrate Christmas. 'April,' as the second act is entitled, shows us Chopin in the prime of life. He is dwelling near Paris at the villa of Flora, under which name George Sand is represented. A Polish legend, related by a friend of the composer to a group of children, brings forward in the orchestra Chopin's most famous Polonaise; while the hero himself, in the course of the act, becomes inspired and composes one of his nocturnes.

"The third act is entitled 'Storm.' Chopin is now on the island of Majorca, whither he has gone to seek renewed health. There he confides his sorrows to an old priest, who offers him consolation. A tempest falls upon the island, while Flora, Elio and other friends are at sea on a pleasure trip. Chopin, after trembling for their lives, sees all return in safety save Grace, a young girl who is drowned, and whose funeral forthwith takes place. Twelve more years elapse, and then the fourth act, 'Autumn,' shows the musician's end. The scene is laid at Chopin's house in Paris, where the master is dying. Memories of Stella, the Polish girl, disturb the failing man—the girl he loved before he knew aught of evil. Then in the distance a song is heard, and Stella herself comes to soothe Chopin's last moments."

But who comes to soothe the feelings of the audience after listening to this egregious plot? Putting musicians in novels, poems and operas has never been a success.

THERE is an end to all things. With this number of THE MUSICAL COURIER we complete the twelve papers on musicians' birthdays with brief comments upon the significance of astrological signs. Intelligent teachers of astrology in our day have over and over again declared that their science is one greatly misunderstood, and that many of the scoffers profess faith in matters far more difficult to comprehend. This being the closing article in the series it may be well here to give a brief outline of zodiacal conditions and spheres. The ancients who tested the philosophy and wrote treatises for the world of their day, divided the zodiac into twelve signs or houses, and again subdivided these by four, with three signs in each one of the four subdivisions. The four subdivisions, sometimes described as domains, were named Fire, Air, Water and Earth. The astrological signs in the fire domain are Aries, Leo and Sagittarius; in air, Gemini, Libra and Aquarius; in water, Cancer, Scorpio and Pisces; in earth, Taurus, Virgo and Capricorn. Aries prevails from on or about March 22 to April 21, Leo from on or about July 21 to August 20, Sagittarius from November 21 to December 20. Gemini prevails from May 20 to June 21, Libra from September 21 to October 21, Aquarius from January 19 to February 19; Cancer prevails from June 21 to July 21, Scorpio from October 22 to November 21, Pisces from February 20 to March 21. Taurus prevails from April 21 to May 20, Virgo from August 21 to September 21, Capricorn from December 21 to January 19.

MUSICIANS BORN IN DECEMBER.

The ancient philosophers claimed that human beings were influenced by the zodiacal conditions under which they were born. While the best thought of modern times is opposed to the doctrine of fatality, it is impossible for any man of wide experience to wholly doubt that there is a "divinity that shapes our ends." All faith, whether in one of the established religions or in some occult philosophy, depends, after all, upon man's imagination or his "bump" of credulity. Tennyson most beautifully describes this faith in the opening stanza of "In Memoriam":

> By faith, and faith alone, embrace,
> Believing where we cannot prove.

As in most men there are tendencies to certain diseases, so the occult teachers claim there are certain mental tendencies influenced by zodiacal conditions. If men regarded these more men would be successful. In plainer words, the world would not be peopled with so many "square pegs in round holes." If understood and practiced intelligently astrology would provide safe guides in friendship and marriage, in business, and in all that makes for a happier and serener humanity.

When we once understand that Water and Fire are hostile elements people in these domains will either keep apart, or seek to sympathize with each other, realizing that the individual could not prevent faults that come from some mysterious power. The fire people are impulsive, inclined to generosity and frank. The water people are restless, like the ocean, prone to hoard, and sometimes as treacherous as the "mighty deep." Earth and Air are equally hostile elements. Air people are magnanimous, but flighty, and the earth people are rather unforgiving, and prefer facts to fancies. Air and fire people work well together. Both are volatile, and the inspirational currents drift their way.

When we learn the birthdays of men of genius then we must admit, if we reason honestly, that there may be something after all in this mysterious philosophy. Certainly it is no difficult matter to prove that the greatest composers were born in the domains of Fire and Air. Musicians and composers born in the Fire domain include Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Rubinstein, MacDowell. Air claims even a longer list of great names, for it embraces Mozart, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Wagner, Gounod, Verdi and Richard Strauss.

The astrological sign Sagittarius, which begins November 21 and continues to December 20, is the last sign in the Domain of Fire. We described the traits of the Sagittarius people last month. The beneficent Jupiter is the ruling planet of this sign, and when well placed the Sagittarius man or woman should be both good and talented. Benevolence and introspection are the higher attributes of this sign. Music, literature, philanthropy, religion, teaching, banking, railroads and all reformatory movements appeal to the Sagittarius man and woman and in any of these branches it is possible for them to attain success. Beethoven, the greatest composer born in the sign Sagittarius, represented in his life the traits, good and bad, ascribed to men born in this sign. Sagittarius people are born with a well developed temper, but their anger is aroused when indignation seems to be consistent with self respect.

A very different sign is Capricorn, which begins December 20. Capricorn (the goat) is the closing or last sign in the Earth Domain. The men and women born in it are material in their tastes and aspirations. Like the goat, they take good care of Number One. When Capricorn people do not see big material results ahead of them they become blue and discouraged. However, the Capricorn man and woman, when awakened and spiritualized, are very noble, and on reaching this higher plane repent of the sins committed in their days of rashness. The malign planet Saturn rules Capricorn. It is this malefic star, with the four moons, that is responsible for the subtle, secretive, jealous and capricious nature of the Capricorn genus homo. But when Saturn is well placed, the natural tendencies are neutralized and the Capricorn character may become as exalted as that of almost any other. Capricorn people make excellent accountants, bookkeepers, housekeepers and teachers, because they are patient with details. They are rarely found among leaders. Not one composer of the first rank is born under the sign Capricorn.

Musicians born in December in the sign Sagittarius are: December 1 (1810), Joseph Gungl, died January 31, 1889; December 2 (1813), Jakob Rosenhain, died March 21, 1894; December 3 (1758), Louis Adam, died April 11, 1848; December 4 (1791), Johann Gottlob Töpper, died June 8, 1870; December 5 (1851), Mary Krebs, still living; December 5 (1859), Anton Strelezki, still living; December 6 (1806), Gilbert Louis Duprez, died September 23, 1896; December 7 (1863), Pietro Mascagni, from all we hear he is very much alive (Jean Gérardy, the 'cellist, and Richard Burmeister, the pianist, were also born on December 7); December 8 (1791), Peter Josef von Lindpaintner, died August 21, 1856; December 9 (1610), Baldassare Ferri, died September 8, 1680; December 10 (1824), Theodore Kirchner, from what we know this venerable musician is still alive; December 11 (1803), Hector Berlioz, died March 8, 1869; December 12 (1822), Sigismund Lepert, died December 8, 1884; December 13 (1767), August Eberhard Müller; December 14 (1778), Nikolaus Kraft, died May 18, 1853; December 15 (1775), François Adrien Boieldieu, died October 8, 1834 (December 15 is also the birthday of Josef Slivinski, the Polish pianist, now touring the country); December 16 (1770), Ludwig van Beethoven, died at Vienna March 26, 1827; December 17 (1749), Domenicio Cimarosa, died January 11, 1801; December 18 (1786), Karl Maria von Weber, died in London June 5, 1826; December 18 (1861), Edward Alexander MacDowell, now at the head of the Department of Music in Columbia University; December 20 (1786), Pietro Raimondi, died October 30, 1853.

Musicians born in December in the sign Capricorn are: December 21 (1826), Ernst Pauer, our records give no mention of his death; December 22 (1819), Franz Abt, died March 31, 1885; December 23 (1840), Isidor Wilhelm Seiss, still living; December 24 (1843), Nicola d'Arienzo, still living; November 25 (1840), Peter Iltsch Tschaikowsky, died November 5, 1893; December 26 (1793), Franz Hünten, died February 22, 1878; December 27 (1800), Sir John Goss, died May 10, 1880; December 28 (1812), Julius Rietz, died September 12, 1877; December 29 (1821), Julius Joseph Maier, died November 21, 1889; December 30 (1837), Heinrich Germer, so far as our information goes this musician still lives; December 31 (1846), Richard Kleinmichel, still living; December 31 (1813), Theodor Oesten, died March 16, 1870.

In the first issue of the year last January we published the first paper in this series, and in that reviewed the musicians born in January in the sign Capricorn and also in the sign Aquarius, which begins on or about January 19.

THE news regarding the ushers at Carnegie Hall opens up the question as to the system of tickets and seat checks prevailing at the present time. If such a charge as the one which has now been brought against the ushers can be substantiated it would signify that there must be a general system prevailing in the theatres of New York city and in the concert halls, by means of which employees are enabled to make money on the outside, unknown to the management. We have frequently sneered at the system in vogue in Europe, but there can be very little chance under that system to secure any advantages such as are said to be derived here from such an income. The fee system in Europe, of course, takes the place of the system here. After all, the system of ticket distribution, ticket selling and seat tickets is a primitive one, which may have been an admirable one years ago, but which does not apply to the present time, and for that reason the ticket speculator has an advantage which he would not have if a new and revised system were introduced; and that new and revised system is not introduced for the reason that the ticket speculator has partners on the inside who divide with him, which prevents the adoption of a modern scientific system. Mr. Daniel Frohman is to be congratulated for having taken this matter up, and with his usual determination and insistence upon correct business methods something may at last be done. There is a considerable amount of impudence manifested by ushers in this city, anyway, and it has spread to other cities. Ushers should remember that they are in the employ of the people. In the box offices the ticket sellers are frequently shameless in their conduct toward people, and they should also be brought back to a realization of their position, for they, too, are employees of the people. They are semi-public, as it were, for theatres and public halls do business under a municipal license.

KATHARINE FISK'S RECITAL.—Mrs. Katharine Fisk gave one of her very artistic and delightful song recitals in the Barnard Club rooms, Carnegie Hall, last Monday afternoon. Her carefully chosen and high class program included three arias from Saint-Saëns' "Samson et Delilah," the group of children's songs which have proven so attractive wherever she has presented them, and numbers by Henschel, Nevin, Lalo, Hollander, Jensen, M. V. White and other modern composers. Miss Sally Sherwood Betts was at the piano, and the large audience was cordially appreciative throughout.

COTTLOW PIANO RECITAL.—Miss Augusta Cottlow will give a piano recital in Mendelssohn Hall January 9, and this will be her first New York recital since her return from Europe.

SENEX AD CHLOEN (AN IMITATION).

There sings no nightingale to win you forth,
And I myself am old and cannot sing,
But, see, the pear tree stands in bridal white;
Have pity on me, Chloe, it is spring.

I would not wrest you from the Traeian boy,
Who loves you and whose vows of love you love;
I ask but that you sit awhile with me,
And let the blossom kiss you from above.

Give me your hand; long, long ago I sat
With Lalage beneath the flowering tree;
As you, she sat and mused, with love-lit eyes—
Ah! Chloe, weave a golden dream for me.

The nightingales are dumb, the blossom falls,
The hand I hold in mine is limp and cold,
The stars are dead that lived within your eyes,
Have pity on me, Chloe, I am old.

TWO FRENCH OPERAS.

PARIS does not differ greatly from New York in the matter of operatic disappointments. I had determined to hear Gustave Charpentier's "Louise" before I left the city of light and secured seats Thursday, September 26. To my naïve disappointment I saw the announcement "Lakme" on the affiches of the Opéra Comique. I went in, not caring to return to Auteuil. Delna was billed for the "Carmen" performance a day later, but I had heard Delna in "Carmen" and "Orfeo," and I wanted "Louise"—nothing else. However, when a crowd urges you upward and you hold the check for a good seat, you generally make the best of a bad bargain. Soon I was in the clutches of the usual lady of the cloakroom, and to her I aired my dissatisfaction. "Never mind," she returned encouragingly, as she unlocked several doors, "'Lakme is not so bad, after all. Perhaps the American sir may like it better than 'Louise.'" Was this a veiled prediction? Well, I listened to a mediocre performance. Miss Courtenay was the Lakme. Her voice has no top bloom, though it is agile enough. Having heard Edouard de Reszké and Van Zandt, I was not greatly impressed by the singing. The men were only fair. Strangely, the very finish I expected was not forthcoming. The orchestra was noisy, the chorus rough, while the scenic effects were stale. Perhaps I was in an unreceptive mood, for I escaped after the second act full of regrets at no longer being touched by Delibes' charming music.

I regretted this later, for October 3 I heard "Louise," the much vaunted Parisian opera; not French mind you, but Parisian! Having lived a year up in the slums of Montmartre, when that quarter was virginal of the ill-starred publicity it now enjoys, I looked for nothing short of a revelation. The composer is also his own librettist. He calls his work Roman musical. It is in four acts and five tableaux. My copy of the book tells me that the first representation occurred February 9, 1900. The story is a symbol of Paris, the conflict between duty and pleasure. Pleasure wins. It is a pretty tale and without music would be most interesting, if somewhat conventional. At least, it indulges in no hypocritical whining about lost virtue; it is without a moral tag. The four characters are father, mother, daughter and lover; the latter is a poet. After an inconsequential prelude in C the curtain rises on the home of a workingman. A window on the left discloses an adjoining balcony. It is the balcony of Julien, the lover of Louise. They appear, they sing. They fear mamma. She is to be feared, for she is the typical hardhearted parent. She detests Julien. Her music snarls with irritation. She comes in. There is a row. Julien disappears. Then arrives the father, in blouse, hungry and tired. He asks for soup and swallows it to most realistic noises in the orchestra. He smokes and listens with an air of impartiality to the complaints of his wife and daughter Such goings-on with that young man next door, the mother avers. Louise contradicts her. And now out of this dry, yeasty froth of the orchestra arises a tune. It is Gounod's, though the father of Louise sings it. It begins: "O, mon Enfant." Valentine uses different language when he apostrophizes the portrait of Marguerite in "Faust" to very much the same measures. Matters reach a crisis when Louise sits down to read the evening paper for papa. She reads: "La maison printanière est des plus brilliantes. Paris tout en fête * * *." "Paris" she sighs as the curtain falls. Paris is the leading motive, without doubt.

The prelude to the second act is called "Paris S'Eveille." In it are several street cries, the mysterious murmur of the street, all symbolic of the eloquent voices that tempt the heart of that young girl. As symbolism it may mean something. As music of a symphonic web it is disappointing; it evokes no particular mood, paints no picture. The scene is at the bottom of Butte Montmartre. It is early morning, so early that the lamps are still lighted. Working people of the streets, ragpicker, milkwoman, sidewalk sweeper and various sorts of nondescripts are seen. This is a realistic bit, but thrown out of perspective by the arrival of a Noctambule, a symbolic figure that spouts misty nonsense to the women. Full of humor is the arrival of the policemen, and the Bohemians, Julien's crowd. They are a jolly, reckless crew. They bandy phrases like these: "My ideal," says a youthful philosopher, "is to be a bourgeois. The desire of the bourgeois is to be noblemen. The dream of the patrician is to be an artist. The artists aspire to be gods. And the gods!" Then they are interrupted by a boy who makes faces at them and bids them go to work. Their music is the chorus—hardly to be called musical—that one hears in ateliers on a fine day when the spring fever has made paint and canvas repulsive. Charpentier has caught the exact note here. Julien lays in wait for Louise on her road to the dressmaker's where she works. He narrowly escapes her suspicious mother. Louise comes in and the conversation interrupted the day before is resumed. It is nothing remarkable as music making, and the scene closes with an old clothes man passing as he cries his wants. It is the night watchman in "Die Meistersinger" over again, mood-key and all.

The next, while it does not help the story much, is full of comedy. It takes place at the dressmaker's, where we see the girls working, gossiping; an apprentice raises laughter at her buffooneries. Music made by a hand organ is heard in an adjoining alley, and the girls rush to the window. Then a guitar is picked and Julien serenades Louise. She turns pale, wavers, and goes out to him. The girls are excited by this elopement en plein air, and make an awful row. The little apprentice shrieks with glee as she rolls on the ground. Lo! the curtain falls. It is a scene that anyone might have written musically. Before Act III. another prelude is given. "Vers la cité lointaine" it is called, though built on "Wahn, Wahn, überall Wahn." Louise and Julien installed in a little cottage on Montmartre are happy at last. Paris lies below them. Twilight is at hand. Then, as Mr. Henderson once said of another situation, taking advantage of the impending darkness, they sing a wonderful distortion of "Tristan and Isolde"—but a butchery, I assure of the duo in the second act, Charpentier being a younger man, a more muscular man than Wagner was when he wrote "Tristan," is able to make more noise. And a terrific din he kicks up in his orchestra. As I looked about me and saw the beatific faces of the Parisians I was filled with wonder. Their capacity for self deception amounts to a talent. Are they merely naïve or do they really accept this boiling-over, this vulgarization of Wagner's exquisite orchestral workmanship for original music? I cannot say. I only know that André Messager, who conducted in a heedless, slipshod way without a notion of nuance, was surprised when asked if he did not think "Louise" Wagnerian. "Pas une note!" he replied. No, not one, but thousands!

To resume, Julien sings a song about experience—defying routine, tradition—and to the melody of the "Exile Song" in Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet." It is unmistakable. Read your piano score. He discourses more philosophy than Fafner. The pair rave over Paris. We will march down to the conquest of this city marvelous! They sing, O! dream of a retired bootmaker. Always the conquest of Paris! André Murger, the foolish boys in "Trilby"—and a half hundred thousand heroes of romance have been depicted uttering this Balzacian phrase. Rastignac shakes his fist at Paris. So does Sachard in Zola's "L'Argent." Why? The lovers salute their dream in detached, passionate Tristanish phrases. Then the ballet appears. No opera is possible in Paris without a ballet—as Wagner discovered. Charpentier has furnished capital diversion here. The friends of the lovers serenade them. There is a grand charivari Crepared. This scene goes off with éclat, though the symbolical Noctambule reappears as the Pope of Fools in the merry masque. He is a nuisance, a grave blot on the realism of the piece; every young French composer nowadays must ring the changes on mysticism or else confess that they have not been to Bayreuth; to "Parsifal." But they wear their culture as a baseball catcher's mask—you can see through it.

That tiresome mother soon turns up. Her husband is ill, must see Louise before he dies. Transparent as to this deception the lovers accept it and Louise leaves. One incident at the close is effective. The wretched ragpicker, whose daughter has been led away by deluding joys of Paris, passes in the rear of the scene singing his song of sorrow, "Un père cherche sa fille." This determines the lovers. Julien consents to Louise's visit—but it must be a brief one. Curtain. For those persons who are hypnotized as soon as French issues from a singer's mouth, regardless of the quality of the music, regardless of its artistic emission, this scene may seem strong. It is theatric, but false, with a false realism, false pathos, ridiculously false philosophy. The music is chiefly Wagner's. Wagner's well mixed with noise.

After a short prelude in G minor, cribbed principally from "Parsifal," the last act begins. The father is sick and Louise nurses him, while the mother makes herself a bore when she isn't making soup for the invalid. Louise regrets her homecoming. There is another parental outbreak, after the father has sought to win his daughter back to her old life. She desires it not. Paris and liberty is her dream—the dream of a crazy cocotte. Enraged, the father banishes her, then calls her back, and, as she runs down the stairs, he throws open the window, and, shaking his fist at the distant lights, "Paris" he hoarsely roars before the curtain drops. His phrase, a minor seventh, strongly resembles a street cry, the cry of an old clothes man. Cerebral throughout, dominated by the Paris motive, "Louise" does not contain one line of original or characteristic music. Ah! I was reproved, you are not a Parisian. It is the point of view. You are not sympathetic with the Bohemian idea. Thereat I gasped. I know Paris fairly well. I have lived in poverty, a flannel shirt and hopes on top of Montmartre at a time when one's heart is impressionable. But I can't discern the Parisian atmosphere in this score. What I do hear is a rechauffée of Wagner, toujours Wagner! All the lovely traditions of the Gallic stage are forgotten for this carnival of noise. Fancy Bizet or Delibes or even Gounod with this romantic theme! We would have had genuine opera comique, not a savage Teutonic blend, neither fish, nor flesh, nor good Bayreuth.

The performance was vocally smooth. The title role was assumed by Madame Charles. She did not sing wonderfully well. The father was Fugère. He can pass; so can the mother and Julien, the latter a young man named Beyle, with a good clear tenor voice. The other parts were admirable, especially the apprentice, Madame Vilma. She is a genuine comedienne. Charpentier's orchestration is very crude.

The night of October 11 I saw for the first time at the Grand Opéra Xavier Leroux's "Astarté," and, as I had just been reading Pierre Louij's exquisitely corrupt "Aphrodite," the opera made an impression. Who is Leroux? you will ask. He was born in 1863 at Villetri, and studied with Théodore Dubois and Massenet at the Paris Conservatoire. He won the Grand Prix de Rome in 1885 and has composed "Endymion," a cantata; music for "Cleopatre," by Sardou; "Harold," an overture; "Evangeline," a lyric drama for the Monnaie, Brussels: a Mass; "Venus and Adonis" and "Astarté." This latter was produced by Gailhard at the Opéra February 15, 1901.

I have witnessed gorgeous productions, but nothing on the same scale of grandeur as this one. "Salammbô" is a mere melodrama in comparison. When Gailhard becomes interested he accomplishes something. The story is a classic one. Hercules, weary of his various labors, and possibly of Déjanire, resolves to conquer Omphale, Queen of Lydia, and overthrow the disgraceful worship of Astarté, replacing it with the chaster Vesta. He leaves his home, his wife (who has her jealous misgivings), reaches Libyia, and after a drugged drink—shades of Brangaene—promptly falls in love with Omphale. The usual high priest of the Meyerbeer and Verdi order, Phur by name, schemes against the victorious stranger. Omphale and Hercules love. A wedding feast is arranged, and Hercules puts on the shirt of the centaur Nessus, sent to him by the suspicious and wrathful Déjanire. It consumes him, for it is fiery. To the red-colored smoke of a magnificent conflagration Hercules perishes horribly, while Omphale, cold-blooded and remorseless, prepares to worship Astarté. "Gloire à la Reine Omphale! Gloire à la Volupté!" chants the chorus.

There is not much action, the first act being tiresome. Of course Hercules—"Vous savez qui je suis, guerriers: je suis Hercule!"—sings of his mighty feats, and there is marching and countermarching to satisfy Sousa. I fancy the length of the act was to give the soprano Déjanire her solitary chance. We see her no more—and praise be to the gods for this concession. O, Cléanthis! It is in Lydia that the eye is filled with beautiful ballets, with scenic glories and delicious music. When Leroux forgets Wagner—Helas! toujours, Wagner—he writes graceful dance measures, picturesque music. Fancy a Lesbian ballet! Such is the fashion in the Paris of to-day. "Les filles de Lesbos, servantes d'Astarté" dance to the antique measures a ballet of great beauty. Little wonder that Hercules and her men are shaken as trees in a tropical storm! In Act III. Omphale appears. It is la mère Heglon, the much beloved Heglon, with two baritonal notes left in her massive throat, attired in a ravishing auburn wig and a costume that defies description. It is both hieratic and voluptuous as befits a priestess of the venerable, though not pudic cult of Astarté. This charmer soon unsettles the reason of the boastful warrior with the club and lion skin. She does not use a spinning wheel, either, as is indicated in Lemprière, and suggested by the clever M. Camille Saint-Saëns in his symphonic poem. Her eyes accomplish victories, and when she walks empires totter, so the librettist says. Really Madame Heglon surprised me. Her voice is a dusky ruin, but she fascinates still; her very waddle is fascinating. The finale of this act is tremendously effective. It represents a bacchanalian orgy. The sacred courtezans rush from the groves. The priests chant. A whirling maze of color, dazzling, intoxicating, and the two lovers, to the sound of languorous music, disappear in the darkness. The last act is short. The opera is without genuine dramatic nerves. Leroux is an intellectual composer. In his score is the whole of the "Ring," "Parsifal" and much of Meyerbeer. His own original contribution is slender. But he has assimilated his material better than has Charpentier; above all, he has a native feeling for tone color—there are the usual imitations of Greek modes—the two cults of Vesta and Astarté are musically well contrasted. What most surprised me was the impassioned singing and acting of Alvarez. He was quite another man from the robustious actor and singer we knew here. On his own heath he sang with force, color, dramatic intelligence. The rest were the usual band of screamers and worn-out voices collected by Gailhard years ago. Taffanel conducted with all the passion of a flute player.

I went to Rouen, rode down there in company with Mr. and Mrs. Rudyard Kipling, both of whom I left tranquilly eating their breakfast en route for Diéppe. At the birthplace of Flaubert I spent two days. I had heard that John F. Runciman was there, but if he was I could not find him. A ride to Croisset, where Flaubert wrote four masterpieces in forty years, dispelled the illusion that France cares for her great men. The old Flaubert home is in ruins, even his atelier, upon whose balcony he paced when composing his wonderful prose rhythms, was a wreck. At a neighboring café I found his old cook, now a man of repute, who showed me the photograph of Flaubert's mother. Show me a great man and I'll show you a great mother! E. Colange is the cook's name. It was all very sad. The master writer is buried in the Monumental Cemetery, but his monument, executed by Chapu—put there in 1890—is in the Solférino Gardens, opposite one of his beloved disciples, Guy de Maupassant. I saw the statue of Boïeldieu in the Cours Boïeldieu, and also the statue of the dramatist Corneille. But what is Boïeldieu to Hecuba nowadays? The cathedral, the churches, the monuments, the curious ferry bridge—"le transbordeur" they call it—and the Jeanne d'Arc memorial at Bonsecours, all these and many more I enjoyed. Rouen is a jewel of a city. Sarah Bernhardt came down that Saturday to play one night. The next morning she returned to Paris for her usual Sunday matinee. I saw her as she left the Hotel d'Angleterre at 9 o'clock. She was as fresh as a girl of twenty. Such vitality, such a rage for life—is it not extraordinary?

Dear old London—as they say on upper Broadway—has changed little in five years. My ten days there were spent in visits to the National Gallery, British Museum, South Kensington Museum—most wonderful of collections!—to the theatres and the Tate Gallery. I was in hot pursuit after data of John Martin the mezzotinter, and finally, thanks to the kindness of Sidney Colvin, found nearly all I wanted in the National Gallery—all, but not everything, for the mezzotints in the print-room are not so numerous as I had expected. With shameful pride I confess that my own collection is numerically stronger. At the South Kensington Museum I found five or six water colors by Martin. But after all London spells Turner, Reynolds, Gainsborough, Hogarth, Constable—and again Constable. George Morland's pictures at the National Gallery still enchant the eye. The International Society of Sculptors, Painters and Gravers in Piccadilly, No. 191, displayed some beautiful Whistlers and one of Meunier's strong bronze figures, "Lamineur."

Francis Neilson troubled himself to show me the new stage of Covent Garden, upon which the Syndicate has lavished £11,000. It is one of the most complete operatic "plants" in the world. But the house is as dingy as ever, its position as mean as you can well find in all London. I saw an Alhambra ballet and I enjoyed Mrs. Patrick Campbell's exotic acting in "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" at the Royalty. In the Café Gambrinus Hans Richter, "Gus" Kerker and Max Beerbohm, most brilliant of dramatic causeurs, were housed one Sunday evening. Beerbohm Tree's brilliant and elaborate revival of "Twelfth Night" at Her Majesty's Theatre was drawing to a close when I visited it. Mr. Tree's Malvolio is one of his most original impersonations. He is always subtle, intellectual and picturesque. One thing struck me. Malvolio is accompanied by a leading musical motive. It was singularly effective. Courtice Pounds, who may be remembered here as Nanki Poo in "The Mikado," made an excellent Clown. Mr. Tree was rehearsing "The Last of the Dandies" when I left London. As a production it is rich, and the versatile actor's characterization of Count d'Orsay is remarkable. He may visit America next season. For me he is the one dramatic artist of truly cosmopolitan culture on the English speaking stage.

Robert Newman's Promenade Concerts in Queen's Hall are the very British, very philistine transposition of a Continental custom. They are called Promenade because no one promenades, I suppose. The Englishman takes his music en masse. Wedged in a formidable mob he wears his hat indoors, like one of Walt Whitman's "powerful uneducated persons," and he smokes—smokes pipe, cigarette or tale-bearing cigars. These latter are terrible weapons of offense and defense. From the balcony one Saturday evening I listened to Henry Wood's orchestra. It was foggy without, but foggier within. Tobacco smoke obscured the stage, the players; even the music came to me huskily through yellow rifts of nicotine vapor. The program was monstrously long, and built for general consumption. Fancy two numbers from Glazounow's "Les Saisons"—charming ballet music—a conglomeration of Liszt Rhapsodies, the "Preislied," two Songs without Reason, for orchestra, written for piano, by Mendelssohn, "Batti, Batti," Prelude to Act III. of "Lohengrin," a Benedictus by Mackenzie, a violin solo by Wilhelmj, called "In Memoriam," a new suite, "Sweet Nell of Old Drury," by Raymond Roze—six numbers—a song by Sullivan evocative of lost chords, overture to "Flying Dutchman," "Faust" Fantaisies, with solos by members of the orchestra, a song, "Macgregor's Gathering," by Lee, bassoon solo, two more songs by Goring Thomas and Paul Rubens—the latter wrote the Malvolio motive for Mr. Tree's production—another song and the "Wedding March," by Mendelssohn—toujours Mendelssohn in England! There's a hodge-podge for you! There's a Yorkshire pudding, a Welsh rabbit and an oyster stew for you! There's an English salutation in English slop for you—pace Shakespeare! Little wonder that the band plays roughly, that finish, nuance and dynamic variety are lacking. Where does Mr. Wood get the time to rehearse such an amazing medley of musical nonsense? And how do his men stand the strain? How does he stand it? He is a conductor of force and a certain quantum of individuality. I should not care to hear him reading the classics. He has temperament—and I think that he plays upon his temperament a trifle too strenuously.

So much the record of a musical holiday. I really prefer staying at home in the summer time all play and no work makes Jack a very dull boy indeed. And last summer it was too much play—music play, Wagner play!

MUSICALE AT NEW YORK ATHLETIC CLUB.

IN connection with "ladies' day" at the New York Athletic Club last Saturday, a musicale was given in the afternoon in the gymnasium, under the direction of the entertainment committee of the club. From 11 a. m. to 6 p. m. the large, well appointed club house was crowded with women. Each one of the 4,000 members of the club has the privilege of inviting one woman on "ladies' day," and from the crush it looked as if few members had neglected their rights. The musical artists who contributed to the entertainment in the afternoon included Mrs. Elizabeth Hazard, soprano; Mrs. Dora Phillips, soprano; Miss Marguerite M. Fritsch, violinist; William H. Rieger, tenor, and Charles Schuetze, harpist. The remainder of the entertainment was given by vaudeville artists.

Mrs. Hazard sang charmingly to harp accompaniment "Si Mes Vers Avaient des Ailes," by Hahn, and "The Last Rose of Summer." Her beautiful head tones and the general refinement of her style appealed to the discriminating. Mrs. Phillips, with her rarely sympathetic voice, was heard with pleasure in "O Come With Me," by Van der Stucken, and "Ich Hat Mir ein Lied Erdacht" by Bungert. Mr. Rieger, who was in particularly good voice, delighted the audience with a group of songs "Unter Blumen," by Meyer-Helmund, and "All for You" by d'Hardelot, and an English ballad. Miss Fritsch showed good schooling and drew from her violin a small but true and lovely tone. She played Wieniawski's "Légende" and one of the Brahms' "Hungarian Dances," arranged by Joachim. As a harp solo, Mr. Schuetze played "Danse des Fées" and he played so well that he was obliged to add another number.

The entertainment committee of the New York Athletic Club is composed of Charles L. Burnham, chairman, George D. Phillips, Howard P. Frothingham and Frederick Vilmar.

HARRIS AND QUESNEL AT HOTEL MAJESTIC.—Estelle Harris, the soprano, and Albert Quesnel, tenor, both of the Church of the Divine Paternity quartet, were the soloists at the far famed hotel last Sunday evening. Miss Harris sang "Then Weep, O Grief Worn Eyes," from Massenet's "The Cid," and Harris' "A Madrigal." Mr. Quesnel sang Leoni's "The Wildflower," "O, for a Day of Spring" and "Violets," by Wright. Both artists united in the love duet from Howland's opera "Nita." Joseph J. Rothschild and Mr. Townsend are making these Sunday evening sacred concerts very popular.

SECOND PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

THE second brace of this season's Philharmonic concerts was given at Carnegie Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of last week. This was the program played:

Symphonic Prologue to Sophocles' King Œdipus (new)...Schillings
Symphony No. 6, B minor, op. 74, Pathétique.....Tschaikowsky
Concerto for 'cello, A minor, op. 33.....Saint-Saëns
M. Jean Gérardy.
Overture, Leonore, No. 2.....Beethoven

Again it contained a novelty—the Schillings number. There is a deep seated belief in the minds of the musically dissatisfied ones, who contend that the golden age of music is not behind us, that new masterpieces are written every day only to fill the composer's portfolio. But those who delve in modern scores find many of these musical swans to be geese—and stuffed geese at that. Despite discouragements, Mr. Paur continues on his hunt for interesting new works worth the trouble of playing and hearing, and as a result the Philharmonic concerts are looked forward to with unusual expectancy.

Max Schillings is not entirely unknown here, his Prelude from an opera, "Ingwelde," having had performance at a Symphony Society concert five years ago. He is a German who absorbed his musical education in Munich, and was—clearly shown in the "Ingwelde" excerpt—influenced by Wagner to a vivid extent. Since then, however, he seems to have slipped these moorings, and is sailing a very straight and uneventful course of his own. Perhaps it is a voyage of discovery. At all events, to judge by this more recent work, the musical egg has not been made to stand on its pointed end.

For the performance of Sophocles' tragedy at the Berlin Schiller Theatre Schillings composed this Symphonic Prologue to "King Œdipus," and reasonable allowance must be made for the fact that while it was composed to accompany a scenic reproduction we hear it only in all the nakedness of absolute music. This circumstance does not favor it, since the composer has striven for a mood severe and unelastic, which does not respond readily in the bleakness of a concert hall. Furthermore, there is a lack of hearty climax, a feeling of a message uncompleted, or, even more than that, a feeling that the message itself must not be sought in the music but in the tragedy to which it is a prologue. And from this field of view the composition is not a satisfying one.

On the score Schillings has quoted the pessimistic lines of the chorus which serve him for a motto to his work:

Gleich dem Nichts
Acht ich der sterblichen Menschen Geschlechter.
Wem, wem ward
Mehr von Glück als des Wahnes Rausch
Und vom Rausche die Ernüchterung?
Steht vor Augen mir, Œdipus,
Dein Verhängniss, ja deins, so scheint mir
Nichts mehr glücklich was sterblich ist.

These find musical utterance in the first broad, accented theme voiced in bald unison, which is immediately answered by a tender, almost timid counter theme which might stand for a patient people awed by the fearful words of the chorus. After a shortened repetition of both of these a contented melodious subject is introduced which outlines a picture of the King's self-satisfaction. This is then developed, and to it is added a middle episode still in the glorifying vein, but grandiloquent. After a moment's pause this material is again rehearsed and gives rise to the most beautiful incident in the work when the flute chaunts the Œdipus theme, solo, against an occasional obligato by the violin. In the following development the fate of the King is hinted at and the composition ends sombrely.

The composer, once a student of philosophy, evidently has tried to write his philosophy in musical notation, which results in making his Prologue sound experimental. That he is not devoid of emotion is heard in the first and second working out sections, when he almost attains to a climax; and what he may do on these lines with a more malleable subject remains to be seen and heard. His orchestration is very clear—at times there is a sweet limpidity, nearly Mendelssohnian, in his tone color; and violence has no place in his scheme. His greatest plea for public favor is his originality, but in this he has little daring. A long list of famous names, running from Bach to Strauss, has proven to us that in music only he who dares may live; this bodes little good for Schillings' future—but the critical oracle has fallen off its tripod too often already.

Tschaikowsky's Sixth Symphony is not heard here very often, which is fortunate; as steady diet it would soon lead to morbid indigestion. The English can hear it as often as they eat porridge and yet remain stolid—which defines the emotional calibre of that race. For us once a season is quite enough, and even then the gloom of the last adagio drabs our view of life for days. But with each hearing, especially if one anticipates the emotional, it becomes more and more obvious that there is much in it that is banal and unsymphonic—always excepting the last movement—and that some very meagre themes are made presentable only by the glorious garb of orchestral coloring which hides their bareness and misleads the unwary into admiration. But all protest is silenced by the tremendous last movement, in which the composer has made the orchestra his mouthpiece and through it has voiced some untranslatable griefs. However, one movement does not make a symphony; and it seems rational to predict that Tschaikowsky's fame as a symphonist will rest rather with the Fifth than with this work.

Gérardy's playing of the Saint-Saëns 'cello concerto was another exhibition of artistry with which his name has become linked. His technic is amazing, but not obviously so; his sense of tone color discriminating; his phrasing poetic. And over it all is stamped the personality of the great artist that Gérardy is. His reputation as a very great player need not be shored by a constant repetition of his praises.

The concerto itself is interesting. Not as grateful as the Lalo, it has some inspired moments and is entirely within the range of the instrument. Saint-Saëns has not, like some other composers of 'cello music, tried to prove that music can be written for the instrument which cannot be played upon it.

Although Gérardy received applause galore for his wonderful playing he here should be applauded once more for having refused to play an encore. And it having been proven to Mr. Paur that a Philharmonic concert can be brought to a peaceful end without this inartistic indulgence, perhaps he will profit by it and forbid them for all times. A footnote on the program would save the audience any disappointment. Paur schemes his programs too carefully to have them thrown out of balance by any catchy thing it might come into the performer's head to play as a recall number.

Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 2, seldom heard, was the closing piece. Coming after the work of a modern and a symphony by the most brilliant of colorists it had a fine opportunity of sounding old fashioned. But to the contrary it shone with that unmistakable splendor of immortality. There are in it mood, atmosphere and music, undying music, music which needs not the opera to keep it alive. In parts it is more interesting than the popular overture No. 3 of the same name, although not so mature. Certainly it would be worth while to revive the No. 1 at these concerts.

Of the performance of the orchestra there is something to be said and, unfortunately, not all in praise either. At the Friday afternoon concert some things went pretty bad indeed and Paur evidently was not in the mood for his best work. So it would be more charitable to judge the playing of Saturday evening alone. Save for the "Leonore" the band was not in its usual form. The brass lagged persistently and refused to be urged into tempo speed. Then the woodwind earned some reproaches by its slips and intonations—that choir is not evenly balanced yet. There was in the Schillings Prologue a flute solo so beautifully played that it offset many of the later shortcomings. Paur's reading of the "Pathetique" was not as sympathetic as one might have expected it to be. Tempo is something which musicians discuss only when the temper is sour; and it is so arbitrary a quantity that a discussion of it leads nowhere; so Paur probably was as much justified in taking the "Pathetique" at the tempi he chose as some other conductors are in not doing the same. But the proof of everything is the result: There were emotional places in this work out of which Paur made amazingly little, and there were ineffectual spots, which were made to stand high and clear in all their shrieking ugliness. Still he had to labor too strenuously with his men to obtain easily the best results. The "Leonore" was read beautifully and with absolute control of all forces. As a conductor of Beethoven and Strauss, Paur has few equals. The accompaniments to the 'cello concerto were sympathetically subdued. Large audiences attended both concerts.

CARBONE.—The success of the pupils of Signor Carbone proves his reputation as a vocal teacher is due to his deep knowledge of the production of the voice, and that this is the secret of his own success. At the last Eclectic Club concert at Delmonico's two pupils of Signor Carbone, Miss Marie S. Dax and Baroness von Ryhiner, made a great success. The Mail and Express of December 5 says: "The vocal numbers showed excellent training as well as individual magnetism. The sweet purity and perfect legato of Miss Dax's singing is well known, while Madame von Ryhiner's rich and sympathetic contralto always pleases."

C. Wallmann, bass, and C. Levsen, baritone, are also two successful pupils of Signor Carbone, the former well known in Brooklyn musical circles and the latter in Newark. Signor Carbone's devoting himself to teaching deprives the grand opera stage of a distinguished artist, but gives to the students of the art of singing a great instructor.

STRONG WEST.—Tenor Edward Strong left for the West this week to fill the following engagements: December 10, song recital at Wooster, Ohio; December 12, soloist at the Deutsche Club, Milwaukee, Wis.; December 13, Eau Claire, Wis.; December 16, song recital at Owatonna, Minn., when he will sing songs by Miss Harriette Ware; December 17, Faribault, Minn.; December 18, "The Creation," at Northfield, Minn. On the 21st he returns, in time to resume his place as solo tenor at the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church. Last Sunday night he sang at Roseville Avenue (Newark) Presbyterian Church, his second appearance there this season.

At their evenings with music and musical history the pupils of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Davidson are proving what benefits are derived from years of faithful work with the classics.

November 12 the following program was given by pupils showing a fine technic, good phrasing and shading and a thorough understanding of their selections:

A pleasing Thanksgiving concert was given at St. Stephen's Church by the popular Carbone sisters; P. E. Kenney, of Rochester, tenor; Miss Lilly Hoenig, sopano, of Lockport; T. A. Reilly, baritone; Miss Josephine Kroll, soprano; Wm. Hart, baritone, and John Miller, violinist. Aside from the solos and duet of the Carbone sisters, the most delightful number was the "Ave Verum," a trio, composed by Prof. Frank Hanrahan, and given by Misses Shea, Bennett and Cowing.

The first concert of the Buffalo Saengerbund (season 1901-2), at German-American Hall, Monday evening, proved a triumph for the new director, Arthur Plagge, who comes to this city from Syracuse, where he has been director of the Liederkranz, one of the best known musical organizations in New York State. Mrs. Agnes Champeaux, of Syracuse, sang two solos; she has a sweet soprano voice of wide range. The enthusiasm of the evening was won by Frederick Lower, of Pittsburg, who gave several cornet solos with a mellow tone and brilliant execution.

One of the most delightful entertainments of the season is promised for December 13, at the Twentieth Century Club by several of Buffalo's most popular artists. Mrs. Laura Dietrich-Minehan, contralto, will sing "Daddy," a Nevin selection, and "The Brook and the Wave," by Henry Lautz, of Buffalo, and as a second number "Love Is Springtime," by Victor Herbert. Mrs. Herbert Mickle will play a group of piano solos—"Consolation," by Arensky; "Witches' Dance," by MacDowell; "En Route," by Godard. Mrs. Burton Fletcher will give "The History Lesson," "L'Aiglon"; "Two Incidents in Mario's Life," and Mr. Robert Burton, tenor, will present "Claribel," by Lambeth; "Obstination," by De Fontenailles, and "Come Into the Garden, Maud," by Balfe. Mrs. Nellie M. Gould will be the accompanist.

THE MUSICAL COURIER representative was one of the party of Buffalonians who had the great pleasure of attending at Jamestown, Thursday evening, the delightful concert given in the armory by Madame Belle Weaver Cole, the noted contralto, of London, England; Raimund Pechotsch, the Austrian boy violinist, and Miss Barlow, of Jamestown, accompanist. Madame Cole and Master Pechotsch have just returned from a long and most artistically successful Australian concert tour, and their many admirers regret exceedingly that this season they give in the United States only the one concert at Madame Cole's birthplace, and hope that next year a series may be given here by them.

In the following program Madame Cole's magnificent voice was heard to greatest advantage in the stirring "Creation's Hymn" and the aria from "Don Carlos," while in the lighter selections and numerous encores her wealth of tenderness and sympathy swayed her listeners. Rarely does any one artist possess such a marvelous range, power and sweetness of voice, such an abundance of temperament, such perfect enunciation, and render her selections with such varied tone colorings and perfect phrasing.

Although Master Pechotsch is but fifteen he is already an artist—a master of the violin—rendering the most difficult selections with the greatest ease and assurance. His tone is full, sweet and sympathetic, his fingering facile and his bowing firm. The mature musician was evident in his interpretation of the Beethoven sonata, and an astonishing technic (for his years) was displayed in other selections.

Much of the artistic success of the evening was due to Miss Barlow's ideal accompaniments and in her beautiful rendering of the Beethoven sonata nothing was left to be desired:

MACONDA'S TRIUMPHS IN THE FAR WEST.

MME. CHARLOTTE MACONDA, in her tour in the Far West, continues to gather laurels. Here are additional criticisms:

A good-sized audience greeted Mme. Charlotte Maconda at her song recital last night, under the auspices of the Ladies' Choral Society. She gave a varied and highly pleasing program of eighteen numbers that demonstrated her versatility as a singer. Her voice is a clear, limpid, flexible soprano, sweet and sympathetic, and possessed of good dramatic vigor and power. It is under most admirable control, and the tones are clear, round and full from the lowest to the highest note.

It is no light task to sing a program of eighteen numbers in close succession, but at the close Madame Maconda's voice was as clear, full and sonorous as when she began the recital with Bartlett's "L'Amour."

It was also a splendid tribute to her art, the magic of her voice, the charm of her interpretation of the various numbers and her pleasing personality, that she sustained the interest of her auditors until the last note died away.

Every number was finely rendered, but David's "Brilliant Bird" brought forth the greatest applause, and was a fine bit of coloratura, as was the Polonaise from Thomas' "Mignon" a fine example of bravura work. Among other selections that pleased greatly, though each and every number was warmly received, were Foote's "Irish Folk Song," Delibes' "Maids of Cadiz," Saenger's "Blumengruss" and Nevin's very pretty "'Twas April."—Sacramento, Cal., Bee, November 21, 1901.

Madame Maconda's song recital last night drew a fine audience, despite the stormy weather. The ladies of the Choral Society are to be congratulated in having brought this sweet and strong singer to Sacramento. She not only fulfilled expectation, but exceeded it. As a coloratura soprano she is quite abreast with the foremost of American artists, and superior to some who are far more pretentious. Madame Maconda is American product; she is the result of American musical tuition. It was not necessary for her to develop and train her splendid natural vocal gifts to go to Europe. We have heard not more than one coloratura singer whose tones in the middle register are so expressive, strong, flexible and sweet. But that is not to say that the upper register of this high soprano is inferior. On the contrary it is more than charming, fine as the most delicate lace work, yet strong and clear; flexible and soft, yet full of vitality. In management of voice Madame Maconda is a model; she is as near letter perfect in management and attack as any concert singer who has appeared here in very many years. Another charm of her work is the informing intelligence behind it. This vocalist understands whatever she undertakes to render, and she possesses the gift of being able to make her hearers understand it, too, which is but another form of saying that in expression she is a dramatic artist. The audience was greatly pleased with Madame Maconda's recital, and manifested its appreciation in a most emphatic manner. The concert was a success in all respects; a musical entertainment of the first order. The gem of the evening—artistically considered—if there is to be selection from a program of twenty choice numbers, was her rendering of David's "Brilliant Bird." It probably better displayed the range and versatility of the singer's voice. But there were very many, and we confess to being of the number, who will bear in recollection for many a day, after the other numbers have faded from memory, Maconda's soultful, tuneful, sympathetic and moving rendering of the "Irish Folk Song." It was a splendid bit of delicate feeling and masterly expression.—Sacramento (Cal.) Record-Union.

A beautiful woman with an enchanting voice ought to win any audience. It would have been strange indeed, therefore, if the people who crowded the White Temple last night had not fallen under the spell of Charlotte Maconda, who is as modest and unassuming in demeanor as she is beautiful. She made such a charming picture on the stage gowned in glittering white that something could have been forgiven her if she had not come up to vocal requirements; but this was not necessary. Her voice is one of very unusual range, and of most delicious clarity and purity of intonation. Its flexibility was shown in the brilliant Polonaise by Thomas, which was a remarkable proof of her ability to handle the most difficult fioriture with grace and skill. Her trills in "Maids of Cadiz" and "Thou Brilliant Bird," from David's "Perle du Brezil," were thrown off with the delicacy and sang froid of a bird among the branches. In the David and the Thomas numbers she reached a note that was either high D or else something very near it above the staff.

The program was apparently not made with the sole idea of proving Maconda to have the most remarkable coloratura soprano of the day; but to present an alluring group of composers of varied and distinct styles, schools and nationalities. Heavy drafts were therefore made upon her powers of interpretation. She was simple and natural in the love songs, filled with gladness of maternity in the lullabies and operatic in the Polonaise. She went down into the subtler depths of feeling for Schumann. She was gay with touches of French diablerie and abandon in Delibes' "Maids of Cadiz," and voiced melancholy of three distinct types in the Irish folksong, the air from "Mignon" and the Grieg numbers.—The Morning Oregonian, Portland, November 28, 1901.

Charlotte Maconda, one of the most brilliant of all the American coloratura sopranos, gave a recital at the First Baptist Church last evening which more than fulfilled the expectations which had been built on the news of her coming.

From the opening notes the singer held the audience enthralled, and as each number was given the enthusiasm of the music lovers was increased.

Madame Maconda has great charm of face and manner, her vivacious personality making her stage appearance peculiarly winning. Her voice is one of musical sweetness and purity, with a wonderful carrying power which easily fills the largest hall. In each cadenza every note was given its full value.

Madame Maconda is as dainty in her interpretation of delicate songs as she is delightful in music of larger scope. Her versatility enables her to appear to equal advantage in oratorio, the most fioritura work, German lieder and quaint ballads. She deserves indeed to be recognized as an artist of extraordinary ability and temperament. The expression and finish of the various songs were as different as the demands of the selections required.

Her first songs were "L'Amour," by Bartlett; Berceuse, Godard; "Tu Me Dirais," Chaminade; "L'Ete," Chaminade.

"L'Ete," by Chaminade, was given with such a power of expression as to completely captivate her hearers, while the Berceuse, from Godard's "Jocelyn," was altogether admirable.

To Foote's Irish love song was imparted a charming sentiment. This was followed by Bendels' beautiful "Maiden's Message" and Lehmann's ever-popular "You and I," which were received with much favor.

Faultless training and pure intonation were displayed in the marvelous trills. The bird song from David's "Perle du Brézil," a duo for voice and flute, was exquisite in the extreme.

The two Schumann selections, "Nussbaum" and "Auftrage"; "Solvejg's lied" and "Waldwanderung," Grieg, were interpreted with an unaffected simplicity of style that captivated every one present.

Beach's passionate "Ecstasy" was delivered with thrilling effect, the singer's voice ringing out clear as a bell.

One of the gems of the evening was Thomas' Polonaise, which awakened a storm of applause.

Among the most pleasing songs were "Chere Nuit," Bachelet; Delibes' "Maids of Cadiz" and "Mignon," Gounod. Each was given with a rare grace.—Evening Telegram, Portland, Ore.

Piquant, artistic and charming is Mme. Charlotte Maconda, the singer who appeared last night to give the first of the series of artist recitals before the Tacoma Ladies' Musical Club. The concert proved a success in point of numbers also, although the audience was by no means as large as the excellence of the entertainment merited.

Madame Maconda was given a warm reception last night when she came on the stage to give her first group of songs. Her appearance is particularly pleasing, and from the first the audience was in sympathy with her, and heartily appreciated every number. Her dainty, graceful manner lent added charm to her faultless vocalization, and her costume of pale blue, richly tucked and trimmed with handsome duchesse lace appliqué, suited her admirably.

The program included twenty songs—no slight effort to present in an unbroken series. French, German, Norwegian, English and American composers were represented, and every style of vocal composition was illustrated, giving the versatile powers of the singer full scope and affording a varied and thoroughly enjoyable musical feast to the listeners. To choose from the long list would be eo express individual preference. The two Schumann songs were especially delightful in their lyrical character, and they were given with the greatest delicacy. The opening group comprised four brilliant French songs, which Madame Maconda gave with the individual character of each—the exquisite Berceuse from "Jocelyn" being one of the most satisfying numbers of the evening. Her voice is exceptionally pure, sweet and flexible, and she sings with simple naturalness, executing brilliant coloratura passages with absolute ease and grace and never forcing a note or straining for an effect. The Scandinavian songs were much enjoyed, and the "Solvejg's lied" was repeated after the number, and again at the close of the program, when the audience remained in their seats, begging for one more song after a program of twenty songs had been eagerly listened to. The Polonaise with which the recital ended was given with rather more abandon and intensity than any previous selection, the artist wisely holding herself somewhat in reserve until toward the end of her work.

Throughout the evening the applause was hearty and continued, and the charming songstress acknowledged many recalls, though singing but two encores.—Ledger, Tacoma, Wash.

EMMA LUCY GATES.

MAJOR J. B. POND soon will introduce to the musical people of New York a young singer whose phenomenal voice and artistic singing have caused the music critics to bestow upon her very generous praise—Miss Emma Lucy Gates. Recently she sang to a very large audience in Salt Lake City, and the newspapers bestowed upon her the most beautiful eulogiums. Below is given the critique which appeared in the Salt Lake City News:

A scene of enthusiasm that is rarely witnessed in Salt Lake occurred at the Tabernacle last evening. Professional singers and actresses who for years have been complaining that playing before Salt Lake audiences was like trying to melt so many icicles would have had their eyes opened could they have beheld the tumultuous applause bestowed upon the latest of our young songstresses to enter the professional arena, Miss Emma Lucy Gates.

Of course, there is a certain allowance to be made for local pride and the warmth of personal friends, but making every allowance for this, and speaking from the standpoint of the most impartial critic, it must be said that Miss Gates scored a triumph. She gave eight numbers during the evening, all of the most exacting character, and some of them selections in which the world's greatest sopranos had been heard on the same platform, but she passed through the ordeal without a break or a flaw. She was greeted with a ring of applause after every number, and at the close, when the audience was dispersing and she returned to the platform to gather up the flowers which had been tendered her, the whole choir of 500 rose to their feet, a big section of the audience joined them and the little singer was overwhelmed with a tumult of shouts and plaudits that shook the air. It was a rare ovation, but a most deserved one, and she must be pardoned for escaping from it as quickly as she could and running off the platform to where her father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Gates, of Provo, and her grandmother, Mrs. Lucy B. Young, received her, almost as pale and excited with gratification as she was herself.

It would be hard to say which one of Miss Gates' numbers deserves principal commendation. If left to the vote of the audience the palm would probably be accorded to "Sing, Sweet Bird," a familiar song, in which she imitates the warblings of a bird. In this she touches high E natural, and the warmest applause of the evening arose as she ended; but the Jewel Song, from "Faust," was most gracefully done and the German selection, "Nachtigal Sag Doch An," was done in thrilling style. "The Last Rose of Summer," in which she sustained high C, was also great, and the "Rusticana" selection, with the rare accompaniment McClellan gave her on the organ, intensely moved the audience. She came off with flying colors for her rendition of the famous cavatina from "The Barber of Seville." "Una Voce Poca Fa" is a brilliant, difficult number, full of runs and trills, and is a sort of test selection for high sopranos. Patti, Gerster, Di Murska, and, we suppose, every lesser light that ever stepped on the concert platform has essayed this number at one time or another. Miss Gates was simply admirable in it throughout. The triumph of the star of the evening was so pronounced and the general enthusiasm over the concert so great that there is talk of a repetition next week.

Miss Gates will make her début on the occasion of young Florizel, the violin prodigy's, first appearance here on February 4 at Carnegie Hall.

ERNEST HUTCHESON.—Ernest Hutcheson, the Australian pianist, scored a great success last Monday night, in Boston, with the Kneisel Quartet. Hutcheson displayed a wonderful sense of proportion in ensemble playing. His touch was clean, remarkably musical and singing and his technic equal to all demands. The Mason & Hamlin piano which Hutcheson played supplemented his artistic nature.

PADEREWSKI IN BRESLAU.

WHEN Herr Ignaz Jan Paderewski paid his first visit to the people of Breslau, ten years ago, he was an unknown man. That is passed now. Even if he is not the first piano player of the world, still he stands among his peers as one of those most in demand and most active. If one can speak of infallibility in the field of piano technic, Herr Ignaz Jan Paderewski comes at least very near to this ideal condition. Indeed his mighty abilities do not hinder him from coming, on occasion, as near to it as any other of his less famous colleagues. His strength seems to have no limits. To play Bach's Chromatic Fantaisie and Fugue, Beethoven's last Sonata and Schumann's Sonata, op. 11, without the slightest trace of exertion or weariness in any way, is only possible for one who has fingers of iron and nerves of steel. On hearers who visited the concert without closer knowledge of the individual pieces performed, Paderewski's playing must have made a fascinating impression. The artist is free from customary virtuoso mannerisms; he does not coquette with the public, and does not by any striking gestures make the audience take notice that what he plays is extraordinarily difficult. At the utmost he lets his right hand, when it is a question of melody especially to be marked, fall on the keys from a moderate height—in other respects his bearing is thoroughly quiet. In cantilene, full of feeling, we may even notice that he at times closes his eyes and listens to his own playing, like one dreaming and detached from the world.

What is in the first place interesting in his playing is the endeavor to procure for the hearer the utmost clearness respecting the form and content of the pieces performed. What he plays stands there firmly outlined; there may be defects in the conception, but as it is played it is a whole and means something. Paderewski never weakens; his technic is so reliable that he does not find it necessary in places where others are in distress to take refuge in concealment or skips. He never abuses that universal aid in trouble, the pedal; the pleasure of hearing a rapid E major scale, clearly without any footwork, is not often our lot. Technical correctness alone would naturally not suffice to make Paderewski appear as a virtuoso of the first rank; to-day technic has been carried to such a giddy height that a pianist who is not perfectly at home in it cannot venture to appear before the great public. Above technic must stand expression. Here, too, Paderewski is master. Into certain brilliant bravura pieces, as e. g., the glissandi in Liszt's Tenth Rhapsodie, even he cannot breathe the breath of real life; but where a composer has placed a thought capable of life, there Paderewski seeks to seize it, and so far as his individuality allows to reproduce it in such a manner that the hearer can understand and retain it.

Pianists by profession have had many objections to make against his treatment of the Schumann F sharp minor Sonata; they would have liked the scherzo more plastic and the finale more rhythmically defined, and perhaps have even thought that this or that virtuoso has conceived the sonata in its main outlines with more energy and grandeur. It may be so. But no one can transcend his nature, and Paderewski in spite of his force inclines at times to a certain Slavonic softness for which the North German hero "Recken" temper can feel no enthusiasm. Bach's Chromatic Fantaisie and Fugue could very well bear a more heartfelt attack, and the fugue ought not to fall over into the elegiac and the pretty. In Beethoven's last sonata the rendering of the Arietta and Variations was especially enchanting; here everything was so well weighed, so finely calculated and yet so poetically figured, that one could follow the player with delight, bar by bar. The opening movement, on the other hand, one can imagine more grand and monumental. As a Chopin player Paderewski enjoys a worldwide reputation. To lay down an unbending form for the execution of Chopin's piano work will occur to no one; but that Chopin was very much annoyed when so-called "thinking" pianists disfigured his compositions by their own additions is an historical fact. Liszt tried it under Chopin's eye, and was in consequence repeatedly treated unmercifully by the composer. How Paderewski plays Chopin is beyond doubt interesting, but it is repeatedly not covered by what Chopin positively laid down in his manuscript as his original intention.

In the Etudes (op. 10, Nos. 7 and 12) I sincerely admired the rapidity with which they were rendered, but I must still say to myself that just this extreme rapidity was dangerous to the contents. In the C minor Etude the up and down rushing passages of the left hand precipitated themselves in such a manner that the prescribed crescendo and decrescendo were unattainable and often, as, for example, in the long notes of the right hand, many half bars were, in consequence of overhaste, quite lost. In the Seventh Etude I missed the clearness of the middle voice which Chopin had provided for; each of the repeated notes did not present itself as a comprehensible unity to the ear, so that the etude did not do its duty. Paderewski played nobly the little G flat major Etude (op. 25, No. 9), and even in the C sharp minor Waltz one could—some passages excepted—take sincere pleasure. Some virtuosi have found the first "Webersatz," with its flight of eighth notes, not sufficiently rich in variety, and have sought to remedy this supposed deficiency by constructing out of the final notes of each bar a second lightly uttered melody. Paderewski does the same; it sounds very piquant, but this nuance is not Chopin's. The G major Nocturne (op. 37, No. 2) was least to my taste, the caprice to which Paderewski allowed himself to be carried away went too far. The middle movement is one of the most beautiful, if not absolutely the most beautiful of Chopin's ballades. How it is to be rendered the composer has carefully indicated by accurate dynamic signs. They ought not to be trifled with. Paderewski broke the flow of melody repeatedly by fermato-like slashes, and came besides to the most peculiar notion of giving the melody when repeated (E major) in forte—piano is prescribed—so that the subsequent climax must be lost. This is not merely individuality of conception, it is caprice and arbitrariness. In the final bars Paderewski found the ethereal tone, which alone suits this melody, and the public did not delay to overwhelm him with applause. With the A flat major Polonaise the Chopin part of the program ended. In the octave runs of the left hand, increasing from the softest piano to the most threatening forte, one thought of the poet's words: "Where it strikes no grass can grow."

Paderewski presented himself is a composer in a nocturne. He has written better. I do not deny that the accompanying figure which runs through the whole movement is worked out very neatly and delicately, but this detail painting does not compensate for poverty of thought. Played by himself his nocturne is to be listened to; mediocre players are strictly warned off it. The concluding number of the program, the Tenth Hungarian Rhapsodie, with its glittering glissandi, I have mentioned already. The applause which followed this piano performance mocks all description. In the rear of the hall nearly all of the piano playing youths and maidens of Breslau were seated, and the enthusiasm for the Polish artist assumed truly uncanny dimensions. Herr Ignace Jan Paderewski had played two full hours without a pause worth mentioning, and must have been, by human standards, dead tired. Whether he was so the music hungry enthusiasts did not ask. Paderewski sat down again at the piano, and as the addition so graciously given did not come out strong enough, the audience insisted on a continuance of the experience, and willingly accepted as a definite conclusion the Sixth Rhapsodie of Liszt.—E. Bohn, in Breslauer Zeitung, October 29, 1901.

Jan Paderewski, the piano Titan who makes the musical enthusiasts of America forget their account books as soon as he is heard, who has London, whole and separate, in his pocket, and in Paris is regarded as one of the greatest, has at last presented himself to us, and gained a success such as, so far as our recollection goes, never happened before. The Breslau public, reckoned and decried as cold and reserved, was at the conclusion of the concert not to be recognized. It screamed, shouted, raged. An impenetrable phalanx of Paderewski's young countrymen surrounded the platform and greeted the artist as he appeared again and again with loud calls of hoch and bravo. When the thundering applause declined a little, then the hero took his place at the piano and gave an "encore," which naturally created renewed enthusiasm and made a second "encore" necessary. In this way Paderewski had enriched his program by four numbers, the G flat minor Etude of Chopin, the "Nachtstück" of Schumann, the Sixth Rhapsodie of Liszt and the charming minuet of his own composition, before the enthusiasm finally calmed down enough to render a conclusion of the concert possible. If it is asked what are the means that Paderewski employs to enrapture the public to such a high decree, the tumultuous character of the applause is the best answer. It was the dazzling methods of the virtuoso, the fascinating technician, which carried people away. Profound impression as shown in great art revelations, does not express itself in jubilant "bravos." As a virtuoso Paderewski stands at the top. He unites in his technic, as Symon Rymanowitsch sings of the Polish lady in the "Beggar Student," all the most exquisite refinements of his moods; he is the ideal of a virtuoso. Who will therefore reproach him if in all his performances this special side of his artistic nature stands in the foreground, if he asks himself first of all what produces effect, and then what has the composer to say?

As loud rumbling parts are the more effective the more tenderly the preceding part is played, as a rushing passage is most sharply distinguished from a lingering ritardando, Paderewski has become especially the man of contrast. These, fundamentally regarded, really make the essence of music, and are of striking power when they come in the right place. That means always the places indicated by the composer. These the interpreter must restrain himself to. Paderewski was of another opinion. He did not refrain from ignoring the most express indications when they crossed his plan, to captivate by sharp contrasts. Chopin and Liszt endure, even demand the most subjective conception possible; Schumann suffers not too much from such treatment, but in Beethoven they are an evil. Wonderfully as the Sonata (op. 111) was played in particular parts, yet the expression resulting was that of an imperfect translation. On the other hand the execution of the Chromatic Fantaisie and Fugue, by Bach, was brilliant, as the free handling of the former was sufficiently justified by its character of a fantaisie. The artist found tones which go to the heart in the aria, the most beautiful movement in the F sharp minor Sonata by Schumann. Rich in charming details and delicate spiritual traits was the A flat major Ballade, by Chopin. The program mentioned the Fourth in F minor. Stupendous virtuoso performances are the Etudes Nos. 12, 3 and 7, from op. 10 of Chopin, although the middle one, for the sake of the contrast, was played strikingly slow. The G major Nocturne and the C sharp minor Waltz were treated as regards the degree of strength and tempi so as to be scarcely recognizable; but their contour was interesting. Those of the

A Virgil Recital in Staten Island.

MISS LAURA DEAN, who has been a prominent teacher at West Brighton for some years, is about to retire from professional life, and Miss Cora C. Hulburd, a teacher connected with the Virgil Piano School, 29 West Fifteenth street, is to take her place.

Miss Hulburd will advance Virgil ideas in her teaching. By way of interesting the people of Staten Island still further and deeper in these ideas, which have of late years become so successful and satisfactory to pupils, parents and teachers alike, it was thought best to invite Mrs. Virgil and some of the players of her school to give a recital. Accordingly the following program was given on Saturday, December 6, to a large and highly interested audience at the Woman's Club, St. George, Staten Island, together with a short address thoroughly to the point and full of merit by Mrs. A. M. Virgil, who in her enthusiastic talk aroused in her audience a great deal of interest:

CRITICAL PRAISE FOR VAN HOOSE.—"At last Sunday's Metropolitan Opera House concert the singing of Ellison Van Hoose was received with the warmest appreciation. Being an American, Mr. Van Hoose was not well known to his audience, and his voice and art came in the nature of surprises. He has sung on several occasions recently, and it looks as if he was about to obtain the recognition which he deserves.

"Mr. Van Hoose has a pure tenor voice, exquisite in quality, warm and beautiful in tone, with a register that is without breaks, and he uses it with skill and taste. On Sunday his singing of Walther's 'Preislied' and of 'Celeste Aïda' was a delightful achievement.—New York World, December 8.

WETZLER'S SONGS PUBLISHED.—Two books of songs by H H. Wetzler are being published in Germany, and may be obtained at Novello's and Schirmer's. They are the children's songs, and five songs, op. 2. These songs have been sung with greatest success by Milka Ternina and David Bispham in London and New York, and many prominent singers in Germany have taken them up in their repertories.

FIRST KUBELIK RECITAL.

IN Carnegie Hall last Saturday afternoon Jan Kubelik appeared here for the second time, but chose this for his first opportunity to display his skill in recital playing. And on this occasion he was assisted by Miss Jessie Shay, and accompanied by Herr Rudolph Friml. The program was the following one:

Concerto in E major (Allegro Moderato, Introduction and Rondo).....Vieuxtemps
Herr Kubelik.

Piano soli—
Rigaudon.....Raff
Etincelle.....Moszkowski
Miss Jessie Shay.

Aria.....Bach
Romance, G major.....Beethoven
Herr Kubelik.

Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12.....Liszt
Miss Shay.

Nel cor piu non mi sento.....Paganini
Herr Kubelik.

The hall was crowded to the doors with an eager and enthusiastic audience, and as soon as the slender Kubelik tripped into view round after round of applause greeted him. Though a great public casts its applause before, this was but a shadow of what was to come. The very air was charged with applause, and Kubelik had but to toss off some one—any one for that matter—of his marvelous runs or trills, and it would come thundering down on him. But he stood bravely under it all—his seasons in London have acclimated him to this sort of thing—and he played to the end with an unflagging display of dexterity.

Over the difficulties of the Vieuxtemps Concerto he leaped with no effort at all, and the intricate cadenza, at which all criticism and most violinists balk, he played with such a convincing show of ease that in the end one believed it really was quite as easy as it looked. All this breath taking show of technic he does without ever an unnecessary circling of the bow arm or a grimace of the fingering hand.

To show that not all his powers had run to technical seed, he gave as a second number the well beloved Wilhelmj arrangement of the Bach Aria from the D major Suite. In this, while his phrasing was long breathed and cautious, he did not succeed in drawing from his G string a very beautiful or a very big tone. True, there was in it a semblance of sympathy and warmth, but of the earnest emotion of Bach he got not the slightest vestige.

Nor did he fare better with the following classic, Beethoven's G major Romance, in which the austere mood was not evoked; also was the outline blurred; in a word, it was un-Beethovenish. Why does Kubelik attempt these masters at all? Perhaps when he grows older and really learns (after the present foolish social adoration has been worn threadbare) that it is enough of a task for one man to be one kind of a genius, he will give up trying to be several kinds of them at the same time.

Then for a last printed number there was Paganini's Variations on an air from Paisiello's "La Molinara," in which the youthful violinist set off most of his violin pyrotechnique at once. One forgot that he ever had a beautiful tone—one did not care whether or not he had one or not—the brilliancy of the work dazzled the ears, which could not follow fast enough the hurtling arcs of tone while the composure of the player seemed to belie their possibility. Double stopping—thirds, sixths and octaves with astounding ease; the same in harmonics and in chromatic scales; arpeggi and trills, all drove the audience to a state of applausive hysteria. His staccato passages were clear and decisive. All these tricks he trotted out again in one of his encores, that difficult version of the "Lucia" sextet, which he played so that one believed that he had fiddled away all the technical difficulties that ever had existed. For another encore he played a movement from Bach's E major Violin Sonata, and finally Sarasate's "Spanish Dances." The audience applauded madly and indiscriminately. In the Vieuxtemps Concerto it broke in with its applause immediately after every solo passage and thus interrupted the piano tutti, destroying the continuity of the number; it should at least be borne in mind that one applause in the hand is worth two in the tutti.

Again in the excerpt from the E major Sonata of Bach did Kubelik prove that he has no real understanding of this master; his playing lacked lamentably in breadth and comprehension. He has not even a bowing acquaintance with the classics.

In the matter of intonation he sins frequently and grievously. Of course he keeps his instrument tuned sharp in order to give additional brilliance to his tone—a trick resorted to by Paganini. Yet he often plays disagreeably sharp.

His one great feature is his technic, and there for the present at least his greatness rests. He walks away with technical difficulties and in the end technic walks away with him.

Miss Shay played her three solo numbers with that dash now identified with all her work. And incidentally she shows how easily possible it is for one with talent to have it developed on this side of the water and nurtured to a point of virtuosity.

One feels in her work a thorough acquaintance with the composition—structure, phrasing and interpretation; and the ease with which she masters knotty problems of fingering is noteworthy. The Raff Rigaudon was daintily done; Moszkowski's "Etincelle" was swift and brilliant, and her reading of the Liszt Twelfth Rhapsodie was remarkable. The audience was responsive to her and applauded liberally.

Herr Friml played the accompaniments discreetly.

CHARITY CONCERT.—A concert for the benefit of the Riverside Association was given last Friday evening at the Fifth avenue studio of Miss Nora Maynard Green. The program was contributed by Mrs. George A. Smith, Mrs. Irving Pierson, Miss Katherine Richards, Miss Augusta Rossiter and Miss Florence de Vere Boese, vocalists. Miss Theo Boone recited in French, and accompaniments were played by Miss Sibyl Worthington Smith and Frank H. Warner. The Riverside Association maintains a settlement house in the Nineteenth Assembly District, a district with a large tenement house population. The patrons of the concert were Mrs. Hamilton McK. Twombly, Mrs. Frank H. Dodd, Mrs. George H. Mairs, Mrs. Frank Jefferson Blodgette, Mrs. George Shearman Weaver, Miss Martha Gilbert Dickinson, Miss Dodd, Mrs. Herbert Jerome Davis, Mrs. Harvey Edward Fisk, Mrs. Wilbur C. Fisk, Mrs. Eugene E. Adams, Mrs. Simon E. Baruch, Mrs. William G. Wilson, Mrs. S. B. Rossiter, Miss Blanche B. Sammis, Mrs. Charles W. Morse.

ARTHUR WHITING.—Arthur Whiting will give a series of four recitals of chamber music at the Fine Arts Building, West Fifty-seventh street, on Sundays, December 15, January 19, February 2 and March 23, at 4 p. m. The program for the first recital will be as follows:

Sonata, G major (Köchel, No. 379).....Mozart
Sonata, E minor (Köchel, No. 304).....Mozart
Violin and piano.

Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyâm, op. 18.....Whiting
Baritone and piano.

Sonata, D minor, op. 108.....Brahms

MUSICAL CLUBS.

Constantin von Sternberg played before the St. Cecilia Society, at Grand Rapids, Mich., in November.

The Chicago Mendelssohn Club did not lose a member during the summer months, not one failing to put in an appearance at the first rehearsal, recently held. The membership of the club is limited and there are twenty on the waiting list.

The Concordia Singing Society, of which Carl Heller is the musical director, gave the first in the series of entertainments for this season at Newark, N. J., on November 19. The society had the assistance of Mr. von Goehren, baritone; Louis Baruch, tenor, and Miss Elsa von Moltke, violinist, as soloists.

The Schumann Club held its regular weekly meeting in Society Hall, Bangor, Me., on November 21, when the program was devoted to compositions by Beethoven, Schuett and Nevin. The solos by Mrs. W. A. Nelson were among the chief features of the occasion. The next meeting will be occupied with a study of the operas and oratorios of the seventeenth century.

The Tuesday Musicale Society, of Rochester, N. Y., made an interesting deviation from its wonted course at its meeting November 19. All the composers represented in the program were women. First, Mrs. H. G. Danforth read a paper on women musicians. Though largely biographical the paper did not shirk the oft repeated question, "Why is there no great woman composer?"

The first concert for this season of the Orpheus Club was given in the Great Southern Theatre, Columbus, Ohio, November 21. The club introduced a thirteenth century folk-song by the famous troubadour, Adam de la Hale (1240), and three plantation melodies harmonized for four parts. The club had the honor to present Mrs. Frank T. Chapman, mezzo-soprano, at this first concert, which was Mrs. Chapman's first concert appearance in Columbus.

A good miscellaneous program was given by the Woman's Musical Club, of Burlington, Ia., in November to a large audience, notwithstanding a heavy rain fell only ten minutes before time for commencing the program. Master Charles Rouse, the boy soprano, was the out of town attraction of the afternoon. Others who appeared were Miss Floy Little, violinist; Mrs. Charles Suber, a pupil of Mrs. C. P. Funck, and Miss Krieg, a pupil of Miss Wyman. The first number on the program was a concerted piano number by the quartet which was heard frequently at last season's recitals. The ladies composing the quartet are Mrs. Wells, Mrs. Wilkinson, Miss Mathes and Mrs. Boesch, four accomplished musicians. Thomas' overture, "Raymond," was the work rendered.

Gerardy with Philharmonic Society.

THE celebrated 'cellist adds another triumph to the list already won this season. His playing was the event of the concert. The critics paid tribute to his genius in the following glowing terms:

After the symphony Jean Gérardy played Saint-Saëns' A minor Violoncello Concerto. Of this young artist nothing new can be said without falling into the troubled sea of superlatives. His intellectual sobriety is coupled with a lyric, poetic temperament that will save him from emotional shipwreck and safely convoy him to abiding artistic glory. His tone, like a rich, full throated contralto's; his phrasing, that of a great singer in cantalina and diabolically agile in gymnastics, are they not both unique? The concerto does not contain great music. It is sweet, polite, polished, graceful, well made; but the young man interpreting it sang meanings into its surface smoothness that would have astonished the composer. Gérardy is the Ysaye of the violoncello. He was recalled several times, but wisely refused an extra number.—New York Sun.

M. Gérardy's "large" singing tone and finished technic shone to admirable advantage in the Saint-Saëns Concerto, and he had numerous recalls.—New York Herald.

Jean Gérardy, the gifted 'cellist, was the solo artist. He played a concerto by Saint-Saëns in his most finished and musicianly manner.—New York World.

Gérardy's performance yesterday was that of a master of the first rank, rich and luxurious, yet noble in tone; lovely in gracefulness of phrasing and brimming with poetic feeling. The audience was well pleased with the playing.—New York Times.

The only ray of sunshine amid all this gloom was the dainty, charming, original and exquisitely musical concerto for violoncello by Saint-Saëns. This was played by Jean Gérardy with perfect technical skill and consummate art on the side of phrasing and expression in general. As a feat of interpretation it was worth all the rest of the concert.—Evening Post.

KREISLER TO ARRIVE.—The last of the visiting geniuses to arrive in this country is Kreisler, who will come to-morrow on the Kaiser Wilhelm from Bremen. The demand for his services has been such that Manager Henry Wolfsohn was compelled to cable him twice to change his European engagements so as to accept important engagements here. A third cable was necessary last week, when it was announced that Plançon would not come to this country to sing at the next Philharmonic concert. Then the society decided that the next concert should have Kreisler as the soloist, and Kreisler cancelled his Berlin recitals, which were announced for December 4 and 7, and sailed on the 5th. Kreisler has selected the Bach E major Concerto for his reintroduction to the New York musicians, and in the second part of the program will be the Caprice by Guiraud. His reappearance will be on December 20 and 21 in Carnegie Hall.

FLAVIE VAN DEN HENDE.—Flavie Van den Hende, the 'cellist, played on December 5 in Brooklyn; December 6, in Bridgeport, Algonquin Club; December 7, in New York, Ladies' Aid Society, Terrace Garden; December 8, in New York, Society l'Esperance.

She will play at two private musicales this week. December 12 at New York Knickerbocker Club.

"WORLD" CABLES.

(New York World, Sunday, December 8.)

MUSIC HATH CHARMS TO SOOTHE THE INVALID.

BERLIN, December 7.—Physicians of the great Charity Hospital in Berlin are convinced that music has power to solace and helps patients toward recovery. They have arranged concerts for the whole of the coming winter. Solo players on the harp, the violin and the piano will alternate with quartets and orchestral music. Every patient well enough to attend will be asked to do so. Many of the musicians are selected from among the patients. Others are professionals, who will give their services gratis.

WAGNER'S "FORBIDDEN LOVE" TO BE REVIVED AT MUNICH.

MUNICH, Bavaria, December 7.—"Forbidden Love," an opera by Richard Wagner, which has not been sung since 1836—when it was at Magdeburg before the then youthful composer himself—is to be revived shortly at the Court Theatre here. The composer's son, Siegfried Wagner, is modernizing some passages in the opera and elaborating others. There are some strikingly beautiful airs in the opera, which deals with the German renaissance period.

PADEREWSKI CONQUERS THE DOUBTING VIENNESE.

VIENNA, December 7.—Paderewski has excited more enthusiasm on his first performance in Vienna than any pianist has done since Rubinstein. Paderewski's two concerts were treated as social functions of the first magnitude. The Viennese had the conceit to think that because his reputation was mainly American made it was unmerited.

MCCALL LANHAM.—McCall Lanham, the baritone, recently gave a number of recitals in Tennessee, with great success. The papers spoke of them as follows:

The program rendered by Mr. Lanham, with Mrs. Henry Lupton at the piano, was one of the choicest ever enjoyed by a Clarksville audience. Mr. Lanham has a baritone voice of rare excellence, full, sweet and true, and the appreciation of the audience was evidenced by frequent recalls.—Daily Times-Journal, Clarksville, Tenn.

The musical portion of Pulaski enjoyed a rare treat in the recital given at the Opera House by McCall Lanham last Friday evening. Mr. Lanham, who has been called the coming rival of Campanari, possesses a voice phenomenal both in range and quality, and his interpretation is superb. In the Toreador's Song, from "Carmen," his singing was magnificent; but in his rendition of that gem of Granier's, "Aurore," he surpasses himself in the beauty and brilliancy of his tones.—The Giles County Record, Pulaski, Tenn.

An exepectant, music loving audience was assembled last evening at the Court House to greet Mr. Lanham. After the first number of the program, it was a wildly enthusiastic audience which listened with intensest interest and pleasure to the artist's magnificent singing, and bestowed the most vociferous applause, calling him out again and again. Of the program every number was a gem, rendered with the most finished art. Especially beautiful was the artist's rendering of the diminuendo and pianissimo. Nothing like Mr. Lanham's voice, wonderful in range, sympathetic, resonant and cultivated to the highest degree, has ever been heard here.—Daily Leaf-Chronicle, Clarksville, Tenn.

HENRY XANDER.—The concert by the Washington Saengerbund, conducted by Henry Xander, will be reported in the next number of THE MUSICAL COURIER. The soloists will be Miss Estelle Liebling, soprano, and Max Bendix, violinist.

WHITNEY TEW

The London Press says of Mr. Tew's singing:

The Stage—"Mr. Whitney Tew proved himself a singer of excellent capabilities. His voice, which is a bass of great compass, is delightfully sympathetic—now full of tenderness, now instinct with passion and joy. He could not have been surpassed in his rendering of Schumann's 'Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn' and Liza Lehmann's curiously weird 'Myself when Young.'"—July 4, 1901

London Musical Courier—"Mr. Whitney Tew's singing was marked by a high order of intelligence. He is one of the few singers now before the public who possesses the many qualifications that mean success. Besides a voice powerful and sympathetic he has a remarkable memory, and he never fails to display an intuitive knowledge of the poetic and dramatic significance of the text. In four songs by Bach, Brahms, Schubert and Schumann he exhibited great powers of vocalization and expression, and a style in singing German so thoroughly Teutonic that it was hard at times to realize his American origin . . . Three songs in English were equally impressive."—July 5, 1901.

Ladies' Field—"That fine bass singer, Mr. Whitney Tew, gave the first of his recitals in Steinway Hall. Madame Lehmann's 'In Memoriam' was a great test of Mr. Tew's manner and inflection, and he sustained the interest of his audience well throughout it; and it is a supremely hard work for a single voice—fragmentary, passionate, moody, with its pedal note of acute sorrow. . . . Mr. Tew is fortunate in possessing a powerful voice of fine quality, and he has both the voice and brains for success."—May 25, 1901.

Daily Telegraph—"Mr. Tew is an artist who commands attention and deserves praise. Especially has he the gift of feeling and the power of conveying it to others, while in point of intelligence he leaves but little to desire. Mr. Tew essayed last evening songs of widely contrasting kinds and of various countries, but the manner and spirit proper to each were easily revealed, and the result was a conspicuous success."—May 23 1901

ZELDENRUST'S DEBUT.

Sensational Success in Cincinnati.

THE sensational success of Eduard Zeldenrust on the occasion of his American début with the Symphony Orchestra, at Cincinnati, was recorded in this paper last week.

Much had been written of the European reputation of the celebrated Holland pianist; of his repeated and brilliant triumphs in England, in his own country, in Paris—where he lives—and elsewhere on the Continent. Much was therefore expected of him.

It is too often the case, however, that the most flattering European endorsement of a stranger is not corroborated by the American press and public, for the judgment on this side of the water is nothing if not independent.

It is all the more impressive and convincing evidence of the Dutch pianist's greatness and sterling qualities, both as artist and musician, therefore, that in his initial performance in this country Zeldenrust at once realized all that had been said and written in his favor.

The superb technic, the masterly intellectuality of his interpretation, his sympathetic temperamental qualities, the vigor and breadth of his style—all and more were frankly, enthusiastically conceded to him in Cincinnati, and his appearance in New York at an early date will be awaited with the keenest interest.

Here is what the Cincinnati critics had to say of him:

GREAT PIANIST DELIGHTS A SPLENDID AUDIENCE AT MUSIC HALL.

Zeldenrust was something better than a sensation yesterday afternoon at Music Hall. He was a pianist to whom all things else were subordinate to the one great point of picturing to his audience the central meaning of the Grieg Concerto. Dealing with the portrayal of fundamental principles, placed in the setting of a land where great mountains and wild winds, low vales and gentlest zephyrs, produce greatest elemental extremes and elemental passions, the pianist flung himself tempestuously into the work.

One crisp, incisive chord opened the allegro, followed by clear, purling runs; then the orchestra entered. Again, in another tone color, he struck the next theme giving chords. It was clear cut, vividly outlined, but always as if something in his thought urged him to more and more passionate expression. The orchestra felt this and responded. But there were surprises, for, when the tensity was greatest, suddenly, without a break, the massive harmonies melted into pulsing tones of gentleness, as if the moment of strife had passed suddenly and completely.

The effect, as a whole, was broad and sweeping, and this was especially true in the cadenza in the first movement.

Zeldenrust himself portrays his thought best and describes his performance, for he said:

"I feel as if I am in the midst of a most terrible storm; that everything is going to pieces and something dreadful is just ready to fall upon me. I believe this is what Grieg meant to portray. I may be wrong, but he is of Norway, as you know, and there everything in nature is on a great scale and of greatest extremes. This piece to me represents the strife of nature, with victory as the close."

One who watches the pianist go crashing through the chords here written with ever greater force and emotion, until he fairly is lifted off the stool as he strikes the thundrous bass, realizes that, whether or not this was the original idea of the composer, the player has fully expressed what he feels.

Yet moments of tenderness are by no means lacking, and in the very midst of the greatest climaxes these appear. One of these, in the first part, portrays to Herr Zeldenrust a love story, from the structure of the part. Another character appearing in two of the movements is the dance form of the northern lands, brusque, almost uncouth, yet filled with buoyancy and at times delicacy.

In the third movement the themes were merged into a stately rhythm, and it is here that Zeldenrust feels that he is brought into an august presence and broadens accordingly.

Summing up his playing, one would say that he apparently cares little how he creates an effect, so it is what he feels will impress the hearer with the meaning of the work. It is characteristic that in this concerto, when one feels that the limit of climax has been reached, and more force would develop into rant, there will come a chord or a note so clear, gentle and peaceful that it is as if a small voice had said "Peace!" and the fury of the elements obeyed. His runs often glide over the keys with crystal clearness, then become wrapped in a mist as they ascend, and end with a crisp snap, which, according to Liszt, is as if one said "Bravo!" In addition, he has the strongest rhythmic feeling, and accents and phrases sharply.

The close of the first movement showed that the pianist had won his audience, for there was an outburst of applause from all parts of the well filled hall. As the crashing chords brought the work to a close a veritable storm broke loose. Twice he bowed his acknowledgments, and the third time he gave an encore by playing Liszt's arrangement for the piano of the music of Isolde's Death, from the Wagner opera. This is a piano work not given here before and but little known as yet to musicians.

Over and over again he was recalled, the applause rising wavelike, until in all he had returned eight times. Only the reappearance of Mr. Van der Stucken with his baton closed the ovation.

Said Mr. Zeldenrust afterward:

"I am so delighted with the audience. I never received a greater reception, unless it was in London. I had heard that the English could not get warm, but they do; and I also heard that Cincinnatians are cold, but I do not think so. And the accompaniment—was it not fine? I never had an orchestra play it better."—Commercial Tribune, November 30, 1901.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

From going to and from upon the earth, and from walking up and down in it, the orchestral forces of Cincinnati yesterday came together to discourse of Beethoven and his followers. The orchestra, by giving subdued support, yesterday showed that Mr. Zeldenrust is not a quantity lightly to be "whistled down the wind." Possessed of all technical brilliancy, he impressed one as a musician of ideas both original and forceful. His playing was virile, noticeable for a certain fiery stress and keen appreciation of rhythmic effect.—Cincinnati Times-Star, November 30, 1901.

FIRST APPEARANCE OF PIANIST ZELDENRUST IN AMERICA.

Eduard Zeldenrust was the soloist, and it was his American première. He left the impression of being a giant of the keyboard, and, withal, a great musician. If there is anything that is imposing in his playing more than another it is his virility and sense of rhythm. His dynamic force is more than astounding—it is colossal. The first impact of his fingers sent a feeling of the virility of his touch through the hall. His playing of the first cadenza led the way to a better realization of his force in the brilliant and elaborate cadenza at the close of the movement, which was played with passionate vehemence and tonal grandeur. But this tremendous force was not more admirable than the tender poetic expression which he imparted to the adagio, and which he invested with an exquisite contrast of color. His runs in the final allegro exhibited colossal strength, and through it all there was an absolutely clean technic. The cadenza of the finale was a climax of pianistic power and played with great brilliancy.

Mr. Zeldenrust was called out several times and played as an encore Liszt's arrangements of "Der Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde." It was a marvelous reading from beginning to end of closely woven texture and orchestral in effect. In fact, the Dutch pianist takes his readings from an orchestral standpoint—in color, expression and dynamic effects. It may be safely said that the Grieg Concerto was never given so dramatic and orchestral an interpretation in this city before.—Cincinnati Enquirer, November 30, 1901.

NORDICA'S SEASON.

MADAME NORDICA'S season of song recital is more than realizing the most optimistic hope or desire either of herself or of Manager Charlton for her Opening in Scranton, November 14, to an audience of nearly 6,000, she sang next in Cleveland, where people were turned away by the hundreds. Then came Toronto, with the same result, and next Chicago, when the capacity of the huge auditorium was taxed to the utmost. Since then it has been but a repetition of the brilliant beginning. Here is the itinerary complete as far as the Pacific Coast, where Madame Nordica will sing between fifteen and twenty recitals late in January and early in February. The last week of that month and the first half of March will be consumed for the return journey through the North and Middle West. Four appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and other Eastern bookings will use every available date until early in April, when she will sail for Europe to fill engagements at Covent Garden during the coronation celebration, in Paris for a season there of German opera, when she will present Brünnhilde and Isolde; and later, in September, she will fill her engagement at the Prince Regent Theatre, Munich.

Here is the itinerary following the Scranton, Toronto and Cleveland dates: November 25, Chicago Ill.; 26th, Terre Haute, Ind.; 29th, Fort Wayne, Ind.; 30th, Milwaukee, Wis. December 2, Minneapolis, Minn.; 3d, St. Paul, Minn.; 4th, Des Moines, Ia.; 5th, Sioux Falls, S. February 4, 6, 8, San Francisco, Cal.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S ASSOCIATION.—The Young People's Association of Holy Trinity Church, Harlem, presented "The Chimes of Normandy" at Carnegie Lyceum last week. The opera was quite elaborately staged, and the performances were given with a smoothness and finish seldom seen in amateur theatricals. The affair was such a success that a number of performances will be given in nearby towns.

KUBELIK.—Jan Kubelik will give his next violin recital with an entirely new and interesting program at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday afternoon, December 18. This will be followed by Sunday concerts and other recitals during December and January.

SCHERHEY PUPILS' CONCERT.

NOTWITHSTANDING the storm Tuesday night (December 3) a large audience attended the concert which M. J. Scherhey and his pupils gave at Knabe Hall. There were nineteen numbers upon the program. Three pupils were prevented from singing on account of illness. Miss Elsa Green, who sang first, has a good soprano voice, and in her aria, from "Elijah," showed that she had been well trained. Miss Daisy Klinger, who possesses a large, warm voice, sang to advantage "The Sweetness of Love," by Homer Bartlett. Next to be mentioned is Miss Mary Jordan-Baker, a petite and charming young singer. Her selections were "Soupir," by Bemberg, and "Mignon," by Guy d'Hardelot. Miss Baker's soprano is very sympathetic in quality and her taste and style are excellent. Goetze's duet, "Still wie die Nacht," was sung by Mrs. Paula Herzig, mezzo-soprano, and Adolf Stiefel, baritone, and in this the voices of the singers blended well together. Later Mr. Stiefel sang as a solo "Das Herz am Rhine." His voice is rich and vibrant, and moreover he sings with much warmth and sincerity. Carl Schlegel, Mr. Scherhey's professional pupil, aroused the audience to great enthusiasm by his splendid singing of the Prologue from "Pagliacci." Mr. Schlegel is a singer of temperament and one of the best German baritones in New York to-day.

Mrs. Gertrude Albrecht, soprano, and Mrs. Louise Scherhey, contralto, and wife of Mr. Scherhey, also caused unusual enthusiasm with their duet, "The Unfortunate," by Saint-Saëns. Their voices harmonized beautifully, and the artistic side of their singing, too, called forth much comment. Mesdames Albrecht and Scherhey were recalled three times. The second part of the concert was opened by Miss Dorothy Reisenburger, a young girl with a good mezzo-soprano voice. Considering that this was her first appearance at a public concert she did very well indeed. Miss Riesenburger sang an "Ave Maria" by Luigi Luzzi, to a noble organ accompaniment played by Hugo Troetschel. Mrs. Paula Herzig, a charming woman with a good stage presence, sang an aria from "Samson and Delilah," and in it showed breadth and a mezzo-soprano voice of agreeable quality. Mrs. Herzig is one of the pupils who are progressing in their art. John H. Holbrook, a young baritone, sang in good style an aria from Verdi's "Don Carlos." The voice of this singer has range and the timbre is good. With further practice his tones will become more sympathetic.

One of the best numbers of the evening was the aria from "Favorita," sung by Mrs. Scherhey. Her beautiful contralto, her fine stage presence and her vocal method, all went to establish her as an artist who should not want for engagements. Artistically, Mrs. Scherhey reflected most creditably upon her husband's vocal method. A young tenor, Charles Muendel, followed Mrs. Scherhey, in Allitsen's "A Song of Dawn." Mr. Muendel succeeded in showing that he is studying with the right teacher. Mrs. Albrecht, with her coloratura, sang delightfully the aria "Casta Diva," from "Norma." This singer's range is remarkable. She reaches high F, and sings it, too, which is more to the point. The quality of Mrs. Albrecht's voice is beautiful. Miss Elsa Green and Miss Daisy Klinger sang the closing duet, "Pearls of Love," by Pinsuti, and again charmed the audience.

Miss Carrie Friedman was the solo pianist of the evening. She played brilliantly the "Kermess" from "Faust," arranged by Saint-Saëns; the Chopin "Study on the Black Keys," and "L'Alouette," by Balakireff. The piano accompaniments for the singers were skillfully played by Miss A. zur Nieden.

Mary Louise Gehle.—Mary Louise Gehle, who is rapidly coming to the front as a contralto of importance, sang last Thursday evening at the New York Musical League. Her rendition of the scene and aria, "Ah! Quel Giorno," from "Semiramide," revealed a voice of much power and wonderful agility in the coloratura effects of this most difficult aria for the contralto voice. When Miss Gehle is able to give full scope to her remarkable powers she ought to find her way into grand opera. A larger tone under better training has seldom been heard here.

Miss Gehle will also sing at a special Christmas program to be given, December 23 at the new club house of the Professional Women's League.

Rebecca W. Holmes.—Miss Rebecca W. Holmes is an artist whose genuine gifts as a violinist are receiving substantial encouragement. She is having a busy season. Aside from single engagements, she is planning to fill a number of engagements for chamber music recitals to be given with Miss Mary L. Regal, pianist, of Springfield. These are especially adapted to music schools and conservatories, and in some cases are to be given with an accompanying analysis.

JOSEPHINE JACOBY.

THE front page picture of Mrs. Jacoby, the contralto, is published this week, after her decided success at the concert of the Apollo Club, at the Auditorium, Chicago. We refer our readers to the account and criticisms in the Chicago letter of this issue, from which it will be seen that this singer has again succeeded in rousing the enthusiasm of the Chicago musical community.

Baernstein the Cause of Much Discussion.

THE following article appeared in the Detroit News-Tribune on Sunday, November 3, 1901:

To the Music Editor:

Dear Sir—It seems a pity, with so large a field to choose from, the St. Cecilia Society could not have selected singers new to Detroit, and this with every recognition of the abilities of Messrs. Baernstein and Van Hoose. If ever there was accepted time and opportunity to make a reputation for presenting "novelties," the St. Cecilia had it in grasp the present season and lost.

On Sunday, November 10, 1901, the following answer appeared in the Detroit Free Press, written and signed by N. J. Corey, conductor of the St. Cecilia Society:

Although it is usually unnecessary to notice adverse criticisms of the type of the foregoing, which bear the stamp of injuring, yet, as in the present instance, it is founded upon a total lack of knowledge of what is necessary in a performance of Gounod's "Faust," and thereby may mislead the public, which has neither time nor opportunity for investigating the reasons for the choice of artists for particular occasions, therefore a few comments may be in order.

The directors of the St. Cecilia Society have never been behind in bringing novelties to Detroit, but, on the contrary, have shown a liberality far beyond that of most societies, and far out of proportion to the price of admission to the concerts.

In the intelligent selection of the artists for the performance of "Faust," the question is not what new singers can be secured but what artists can be found who are best fitted to give the proper interpretation. There are many fine singers before the public, but who, lacking the special gifts and experience requisite for the work, would be totally inadequate for the occasion. The part of Mephistopheles requires a singer with power that is sardonic; a fine voice will not answer, but dramatic gifts of an entirely special kind are necessary. I have in mind a novelty, with a splendid bass voice, and who the writer on the News-Tribune would have considered a fine choice, but, lacking the temperament and experience in such parts, would have turned the part into that of a church concert. The only available artist who has made any sort of a success in the role is Joseph Baernstein, and his success therein has been enormous. The directors spent six months considering the situation, but could find no other suited to the part as thoroughly as Baernstein. The public can, therefore, understand at once how absurd it would have been to have engaged another singer. An unreflecting and uninformed committee would have chosen a "novelty," and thus the Mephistophelian characteristics of the part would have been totally unpresented. It is true that there are artists of the Metropolitan Opera House that would have been capable, but Mr. Grau's terms are prohibitive, being from $800 to $2,000 a night. When the patrons of the society are willing to pay $5 a seat, as they do when they go to New York, instead of 65 cents, as at present, $2,000 artists may be engaged. It may be said, however, that these singers are not worth the prices asked for them, Mr. Grau making such figures so as to make it impossible for them to be absent from the Opera House.

What has been said of Baernstein is also true of Van Hoose; he is recognized as the leading tenor of America, and has had extensive experience in the part of Faust, especially in England, both on the stage and in concert form.

No other available singer has had an equally extensive practical experience in the part. What sort of a committee would it have been then that would have chosen an inferior singer for the part, when a superior one was at hand? The directors have had innumerable requests that these two artists be engaged, and therefore have no fear but that their patrons will be pleased. Furthermore, it may be said that it indicates a low order of musical intelligence that constantly seeks for novelties at the expense of proper artistic interpretations. One of the greatest incentives that an artist has is to please well enough to secure a return engagement. If an artist sees that there is no chance for this—but only novelties would come—he would not take half the pains to sing well.

The St. Cecilia Society has no desire to present novelties in the foolish manner suggested in the News-Tribune, and instead of having "lost," has most emphatically "won." Also, would it not be better for newspaper writers who are uninformed as to the requirements and reasons in certain situations, to seek the directors and gain information before appearing in print?

Conservatory of the "Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde" in Vienna.

The new conservatory established in Vienna by the "Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde" (Society of Music Lovers) will be opened on January 2, 1902, under the direction of Emil Sauer.

Application for admission should be made before December 15, 1901, at latest, to the "Direction des Conservatoriums," Vienna.

Applicants must produce a certificate of their musical training up to date, a baptismal (birth) certificate, and, on demand, a certificate of health.

The charge for entrance fee is 10 Austrian crowns, annual tuition fee 600 crowns, the latter to be paid in advance in three equal parts.

The committee's examinations for admission will take place from January 2 to January 5, 1902.

Candidates will be required to play from memory a prelude and fugue from J. S. Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavichord"; a self-selected classical piece of some length and a modern composition for the piano. The pupils accepted must bind themselves to at least one school year.

Further particulars will be found in the Statute to be obtained at the office of the Conservatory, where all other information relative to the courses is likewise given.

EUROPEAN NOTES.

A LIST of the greatest number of performances of operas in German from September, 1900, to August, 1901, has been published. "Lohengrin," 294; "Tannhäuser" only 273, being beaten by "Freischütz," 278, and "Carmen," 277 times. Then follow "Cavalleria," 209; "Trovatore," 225; "Mignon," 214; "Faust," 199; "Undine," 192; "Magic Flute," 185; "Martha," 182; "Pagliacci," 171; "Meistersinger," 171; "Czar und Zimmermann," 154; "Flying Dutchman," 155; "Fidelio," 145; "Waffenschmied," 145; "Barber of Seville," 139; "Merry Wives of Windsor," 137; "Walküre," 131; "Le Nozze di Figaro," 126; "Daughter of the Regiment," 122; "Trumpeter of Sakkingen," 120; "Aïda," 116; "Huguenots," 104; "La Juive," 100; "Oberon," 97; "Postillon de Longjumeau," 94; "Siegfried," 86; "Fra Diavolo," 84; "Don Giovanni," 83; "Traviata," 76; "Tristan und Isolde," 72; "Götterdämmerung," 76; "Rheingold," 77, &c.

In operetta "Fledermaus" comes first with 400 performances; then come "The Geisha," 387; "Puppe," 252; "Gipsy Baron," 184; "Beggar Student," 167; "Landstreicher," 144; "Vogelhändler," 107; "Mikado," 93; "Boccaccio," 85, and "La Belle Helene," 78. The small number of performances of "Don Giovanni," only 83, must not be attributed to any dislike to it by the public, but to the sad fact that the singers cannot do it.

The Philharmonic Society, of Vienna, opened its season November 3 with a concert under its new conductor, Josef Hellmesberger. The program comprised Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala"; Beethoven's C minor Symphony and Dvorák's "Golden Spinning Wheel." The new director was warmly received and conducted admirably. "It was a pleasure," one critic writes, "to see a conductor who did not think of himself, but of the subject; who did not produce himself, but the music. We have lately seen so many conductors with flying hair and flying batons that we are delighted to have a less 'interesting' one. It marks a return to the good traditions."

The second competition of sculptors for the design of the Wagner memorial in Berlin is over. Nineteen sketches were sent in. The first prize was awarded to Prof. Gustav Eberlein. The sketch represents the master seated with a statue of Art behind him. No decision has been come to regarding its acceptance.

Hugo Wolf, the composer of many popular lieder, who has been in an asylum for nervous patients, is reported to be failing rapidly. The medical men look for his death in a short time.

Among the papers left by the late Johann Strauss there has been found the manuscript of a fully orchestrated waltz, the last dance composition of the master.

The Spanish wonder child, the five year old Pepito Arriolo, is to be sent to Germany to complete his musical education. He began to play before he was three years old, and appeared in public in Madrid and Paris. Professor Nikisch prophesies a brilliant artistic future for the child.

The Opéra Comique, of Paris, is rehearsing "The Blue Room" and "The White Lady," and probably these may be followed by "Red Ridinghood" to make the tricolor. During the coming season at La Scala a new opera, "Germania," by Franchetti, written especially for the season, will be produced. Two other Italian operas, "Trovatore" and "Linda di Chamounix," will be given, and three German works, "Walküre," "Hänsel and Gretel," and Weber's "Euryanthe."

Raoul Koczalski is about completing his opera, "Rymond." The text, by Count Fedro, is in Polish, but has been translated into French, Italian and German. It is said to be highly dramatic. The hero is King Rymond, of Lithuania, who becomes a Christian, and finally, after many trials, offers his crown to his heathen friend Witenes.

The newly discovered tenor Von Barz has made his début as Lohengrin at Dresden, with great promise for his further development.

BIG CONCERT BY JUNGER MAENNERCHOR.—On February 22 the Junger Maennerchor, of Philadelphia, Pa., under the direction of Carl Samans, the well-known conductor and composer, will celebrate their fiftieth anniversary by giving two orchestral concerts at the Academy of Music.

Very elaborate arrangements have been made, and no expense has been spared in arranging the personnel of the orchestra.

Sara Anderson has been engaged as soloist, and will sing "Dich Theure Halle," Tannhäuser; "Senta's Ballad," from the "Flying Dutchman," with "Spring" chorus, and solo parts in a new work by Conductor Samans.

The Maennerchor was organized in 1852, and has an active membership of 100 males and sixty females, with an associated list of nearly 1,500. Arno Leonhart is president, Fred C. Rollman secretary, and Frederick Munch treasurer.

MADAME DOTTI'S SCHOOL.—Madame Dotti's vocal and operatic school will soon enlarge its scope of usefulness. Madame Dotti, who is well known as a former opera soprano, is devoting all her time to teaching.

"The Trend of Time" Song Cycle.

SONG cycles are more in vogue this season than ever before. American composers have hitherto kept out of the field, but publishers for the season of 1901-2 say that such forms of vocal composition have come to stay.

It is said the most novel one is "The Trend of Time," music by Victor Kemp, lyrics by William H. Gardner. The cycle has been heard in manuscript by prominent composers and critics, who speak in high praise of both the words and music.

It is written for quartet and piano, with solos for all of the voices, and will be given in Mendelssohn Hall Thursday afternoon, December 19, with Mrs. Seabury Ford, soprano; Miss Marguerite Hall, contralto; Mackenzie Gordon, tenor; Harry Girard, baritone, and Victor Harris, conductor.

"The Trend of Time" is styled a symphonic song cycle, the lyrics being descriptive of the year.

The January number, for baritone, deals with the arrival of the new year; February, a valentine love song for unaccompanied quartet; March is descriptive of the howling and shrieking winds, gradually dying away as the spring dawns, with intermezzo for piano; April, with its sunshine and showers, is a soprano recitative and aria; May is a rollicking boat song for baritone and quartet; June, the love song of the rose, a tenor aria, and July, a quartet of a martial theme; August, a contralto aria, suggestive of vacation and rest. In the September quartet the dreamers are awakened and bidden to work once more; October is a harvest song for baritone; November, a toast of the hunt, for tenor and quartet; December gives an aria for soprano of the Christmas-tide, followed by the dying of the year, for tenor and quartet.

W. A. HOWLAND IN THE WEST.—W. A. Howland, the baritone, formerly of New York, and who is now at the head of the vocal department of the University School of Music at Ann Arbor, Mich., has a large booking of notable concerts in the West. He will sing the bass part in "The Messiah," with the Apollo Club, December 25, in Chicago, and the same role with the Arion Club in Milwaukee on December 27. Among recent successes, Mr. Howland sang with the Germania Maennerchor, in Saginaw, Mich., and the following are gleanings from the comments of the press:

Mr. Howland surprised the German speaking people by his German articulation, rendering the difficult German music in all its beauty, and so pleased the audience that he was encored at the conclusion of every number. His voice is rich, full and strong, and the great volume filled every part of the auditorium with such melody that the audience was enraptured. The selections were sung so sweetly that when they were concluded Mr. Howland was given a great ovation.—Evening News.

Mr. Howland's work was invaluable, and he constantly gained in the favor of the audience, being compelled to respond to enthusiastic encores. * * * He has a voice of such compass as to easily carry a vastly comprehensive repertory, and his selections last evening were made with capital judgment. He was positively grand in the baritone solos of the "Normannenzug" (Bruch).—Courier-Herald.

MRS. ERNEST LACHMUND, a recent arrival from Berlin, where she studied with Fräulein Emma Koch, the eminent concert pianist, after spending several years in Leipsic under Bruno Zwintscher, is to give a recital in Sherman-Clay Hall to-night that promises to be of more than common interest. Mrs. Lachmund is not alone a pianist, but in Milan she studied singing under Signor Pozzo, and also with Sumner Salter, of New York. The program will be both vocal and instrumental, the numbers all being rendered by Mrs. Lachmund herself. The recital is invitational, and Mrs. Lachmund, after thus introducing herself to the public, will open a studio here.

A mistake occurred in my last week's letter. The account of the grand opera confused the opera of "Die Walküre," in which Reuss-Belce appeared, with that of "Tannhäuser, in which Eames carried off the honors and won the golden opinions of the house. In "Tannhäuser" Reuss-Belce took the role of Venus, and while she did the part acceptably, she did not have the opportunity that she had in the "Walküre," and in the latter consequently created a better impression.

"After the opera is over" we shall settle down to the old treadmill again, and there will be pupils' recitals and whatnot to enliven the dull tedium of affairs, not that recitals are without their value, but I fancy it will make the old round seem duller than usual. "Flat, stale and unprofitable," by contrast of what has so lately gone before.

Apropos of the grand opera, a reception was given by the Century Club at the club rooms on Wednesday afternoon, at which a quartet of Mrs. Marriner-Campbell's pupils, "The Colonials," sang with great success, winning the praise and compliments of the artists, who were greatly pleased with the work and were unsparing in their congratulations. The quartet is composed of the following young ladies: Mrs. Mary Carpaneto-Mead, the Misses Kerr, Roberts and Arden.

Homer Barnhart, one of our new acquisitions and a valuable one, yesterday favored the people of the First Presbyterian Church of Alameda with two bass solos during the Vesper service. Mr. Barnhart holds a position on this side of the Bay in one of our big churches, but the hour of the Vesper service in Alameda permitted him to arrange for the service there.

The last concert of the Oakland Orpheus Club takes place on Tuesday evening, December 10, with a fine program. The soloists are to be Miss Grace Davis, soprano; Lovell Langstroth, 'cellist, and Edwin Dunbar Crandall, director.

A new quartet has been formed with the following voices, which are in themselves a sufficient guarantee of the success of their work in the future: Carrie Brown Dexter, soprano; Mrs. Birmingham, contralto; Algernon Aspland, tenor, and Homer Barnhart, bass. Arthur Fickenscher will be the pianist and accompanist. The object is to make the nucleus of a society which shall in the future present operatic and classic works in a worthy and creditable manner.

At a concert given at the Presidio on November 27 for the benefit of the convalescing soldiers, Miss Ella McCloskey sang two very appropriate and highly enjoyable solos. The first was for the soldiers, "When I'm Big I'll Be a Soldier for the Army Men"; the second for the Jackies, "The Jolly Sailors." Others who assisted in the program were the Misses Darling, Koch, Montgomery and Roeder, and E. V. Maginty, Herbert Williams and Edward Montgomery. The affair was under the direction of Mrs. Girard, wife of Colonel Girard, and Mrs. Buckingham.

At Assembly Hall, Stanford University, on November 22, a concert was given in which operatic stars were the attraction. Madame Schumann-Heink and David Bispham were the two well-known singers who sang to the college students, and the hall was crowded to the doors and beyond. Arthur Fickenscher furnished two piano numbers which were as heartily encored as the singers, and the concert was voted a great success by all who were fortunate enough to secure admission.

Mrs. Phœbe Hearst has been bringing some of the operatic attractions to the California University in concert, and Schumann-Heink, Suzanne Adams, Fritzi Scheff, Bispham and others have made music for the students in the pretty college town across the bay.

Mrs. A. Wedmore Jones.

Anna E. Otten.—Miss Anna E. Otten, the gifted young violinist, will be one of the soloists at the concert at the Metropolitan Opera House next Sunday night. Since Miss Otten returned from her triumph in St. Louis, she appeared as one of the soloists at the concert of the New York Apollo Club given at the Waldorf-Astoria last Thursday evening.

Owing to some one's mistake, Miss Otten's name was incorrectly printed in the advanced program published in the house bill of the Metropolitan Opera House last Sunday. Instead of Miss Anna E. Otten, the printer had it Jennie von Otten.

Max Bendix's Recital.—Max Bendix, assisted by Louis Dannenberg, pianist, will give a violin recital in Mendelssohn Hall next Friday evening.

MR. CARL GIVES HIS CLOSING RECITAL.

WILLIAM C. CARL gave the fourth and last in the series of organ recitals at the "Old First" Presbyterian Church last Tuesday evening, December 3. The night was one of those awful ones, when humane men spare their horses. Hail followed a cold, pelting rain storm and when the recital was over it was snowing hard. The fact that a large congregation assembled for the recital only again proves the remarkable drawing power of Carl at the "Old First" Church. In the program for the evening, Mr. Carl had the assistance of Miss Maud Morgan, the harpist:

Toccata and Fugue in D minor.....Bach
Pastorale in G major (first time).....Coerne
Sonata for Organ in the style of Händel.....Wolstenholme
(First time at these recitals.)
Harp, Légende, op. 122.....Thome
Miss Maud Morgan.
Allegro Con Fuoco (Sonata VI.).....Guilmant
Gavotte de Louis XV.....Le
(First time at these recitals.)
Vision, D flat.....Rheinberge
Fantaisie on a Welsh Air (March of the Men of Harlech).....Car Harp—
Ave Maria.....Schuber
Loreley, op. 180.....Oberthü
Miss Maud Morgan.
March for a Church Festival.....Bes

Of the novelties the Pastorale by Coerne made the strongest appeal upon the tastes of the discriminating. The Sonata by Wolstenholm was listened to with pleasure by lovers of old time church music. Mr. Carl's industry was once more indicated by notes upon the printing program regarding the "Vision in D flat," by Rheinberger, and Best's "March for a Church Festival." The former is from "Masterpieces for Organ," edited by Mr. Carl, and published by Schirmer. The Best composition is from a collection of "Thirty Postludes for Organ," also edited by Mr. Carl and published by the Charles Ditson Company. Both numbers are worthy of the importance they occupied upon the program for the evening. The "Fantasie on a Welsh Air" is one of Mr. Carl's battle horses, and one that never fails to stir his listeners. Miss Morgan draws a full big tone from her harp, and her solos with organ accompaniments by Mr. Carl, were charmingly performed.

The recital was the eighty-sixth given at this church by Mr. Carl, who is, as is well known, the musical director of the church and the director also of the Guilmant Organ School. In both of these positions Mr. Carl has attracted to him a host of friends and admirers, and particularly in the Organ School, pupils that reflect credit upon him and the institution.

George W. Jenkins.—George W. Jenkins, the tenor has booked, among others, the following important engagements: In Brooklyn, December 9; Orange, N. J. December 11; New York city, with the Gounod Choral Society, on December 13, under the direction of Emilio Agramonte; Yonkers, N. Y., in "The Swan and Skylark," on December 17, under Frederick R. Burton; in Toronto, Ont., January 13; in Montreal, Canada, in "The Creation," on January 22 and 23; in Brooklyn. N. Y. a recital with Mary Louise Clary, under the auspices of the board of directors and Dr. Madison Peters, at his church on February 12, and a similar engagement in Baltimore, Md., later in February. Mr. Jenkins is also booked for a number of festivals and other engagements later in the season.

The New England Conservatory of Music School of Opera.—The management of the New England Conservatory of Music, Boston, Mass., takes pleasure in announcing the permanent establishment of a School of Opera to include all branches of vocal and dramatic art which will assist in the preparation of pupils for practical and artistic work in the operatic field. During each year public performances will be given, in which all the soloists, chorus and orchestra will be of the conservatory. Sig. Oreste Bimboni has been engaged to assume charge of this department. The School of Opera is open to all students, whether pupils of the conservatory or not.

THE engagement of Miss Aagot Lunde to Dr. Homer Wright is announced, and congratulations are being showered upon them. As arranged now it is expected the marriage will take place at Christmas time. Owing to her marriage, Miss Lunde will give up all thought of a concert tour abroad, as had previously been arranged for her, and will live in Boston permanently. On the 16th of the month Miss Lunde will give a concert at Steinert Hall, assisted by Miss d'Olloqui.

The program for Carl Faelten's third recital of the present season, which takes place at Steinert Hall on Tuesday evening, is:

Sonata, D major, op. 28 (known as Pastoral Sonata).....Beethoven
Miniatures, G major, op. 28.....Moszkowski
Three Romances, op. 28.....Schumann
Allegro de Concert, A major, op. 46.....Chopin

At Carl Sobeski's "At home" on Saturday afternoon several of his pupils took part, and the musical program was greatly enjoyed by those present. Miss Margaret Loveney, dramatic soprano; Miss Evelyn Kendall, lyric soprano; Gray King, baritone; Charles Turner, bass; Herman Lythgoe, violin, and Mrs. H. Lythgoe, piano, were among those who participated. Miss Worthly and Mr. Sobeski each sang a number.

To have or not to have a vested choir is the question that is now being discussed by those in authority at Trinity Church. If it is decided in the affirmative, the organ will be moved into the chancel, some changes will be made in the present choir and chorus. Dr. Stewart, the organist of this church, had a remarkably fine vested choir in the Trinity Church of San Francisco, from which he came to Boston, and the music was really a feature of the service, all that was best in church music being given. With the fine material in Trinity Church in this city much would be expected if so desirable a change is made.

Miss Edith E. Torrey will give a concert at Chickering Hall on Wednesday evening, assisted by Miss Gertrude Edmands and Ellis C. Hammann. The program is interesting and varied. Among the English songs are two by Mr. H. J. Stewart, "Out in the Open Meadow," and "Awake! Dear Heart," both of which will be sung for the first time, the accompaniments being played by the composer.

The Boston School of Church Music has been opened in connection with the Ruggles Street Church, with 250 voices in the chorus.

On Thursday Stephen Townsend sang at a recital given by James W. Hill at Haverhill. His numbers were four Brahms songs and an Aria from "Judith." On the 6th Mr. Townsend was the soloist at the concert of the Rubinstein Club, at North Attleboro. Mr. Cheeseborough is the conductor of this society. On the 13th Mr. Townsend sings with the Harvard Musical Society.

The December playing test for the fifth season of the Faelten Pianoforte School will be held December 14 to 21 inclusive, at Faelten Hall, Huntington Chambers. These semi-annual playing tests were established several years ago, and have stimulated the ambition of the pupils and increased their confidence. The tests take place in the presence of the director, Carl Faelten, members of the faculty, students and invited guests. Three hundred and fifty pupils are to take part in the test this year, and the occasion is one of the highest importance in the education of the students.

Hans Schneider, of Providence, R. I., has written an article for the Providence Sunday Journal on "Piano Playing, Old and New," in which he pays a high tribute to many of the pianists of the past and present.

Mrs. Carrie Corliss Friselle, who is well known in Manchester, N. H., as a teacher of music, has taken a course of kindergarten music with Mrs. Nina K. Darlington, of this city. Mrs. Friselle is the only authorized teacher of Mrs. Darlington's method in Manchester.

Recitals during the week at the New England Conservatory of Music were: On the 5th, an organ recital by Homer C. Humphrey and a recital by the orchestral class, G. W. Chadwick, conductor, and advanced students.

Miss Mabel Monaghan, of Ellsworth, Me., pupil of H. Carleton Slack, was the soloist at a recent concert at Lewiston. Miss Monaghan has a pure soprano voice of extreme clearness and purity and of excellent compass. "Her singing is marked by flexibility, purity and marked elegance of tone and splendid technical attainments," say the critics.

William Worth Bailey.

FOLLOWING are extracts from criticisms about the playing of the violinist William Worth Bailey, now making a tour of the country:

* * * His playing is phenomenal, and the applause which he received was well merited. He played three numbers, and was compelled to respond to an encore each time.—Daily Free Press, Ottawa, Can., November 18, 1901.

Mr. Bailey's performances on the violin were the star features of the program, and every number played by him as well as those who assisted him prompted encores.—Evening Repository, Canton, Ohio, November 26, 1901.

* * * But see the conquering hero comes. Listen to the enchanting strains of the violin in the hands of William Worth Bailey. What a revelation is his playing?—Herald, La Porte, Ind., November 27, 1901.

* * * But the star artist was William Worth Bailey, whose playing was simply superb, soul lifting and heart inspiring.—Argus Bulletin, La Porte, Ind., November 27, 1901.

Mr. Bailey is a marvel. He has delighted the most cultured audiences in this country and abroad.—Dispatch, Reading, Pa., November 21, 1901.

HEATHE GREGORY'S SUCCESS WITH NEVADA COMPANY.—The young basso has made most pronounced success with the Nevada concert company, and has been engaged for the entire eight months' tour. The Worcester Daily Telegram, the Boston Journal, Daily Globe, Worcester Evening Gazette, Providence Daily, Portland Daily Press, and other important popers give much valuable space chronicling his successes.

Luigi Von Kunits.

LUIGI VON KUNITS was the soloist at the Pittsburg (Pa.) Orchestra concert on November 30, and the critics of that city had only words of praise for the work done by this young violinist, who is concertmaster of the orchestra, as the following show:

As for Luigi von Kunits, his work was a revelation. It had always been known that Mr. Kunits had the technic of the violin thoroughly mastered, and the fact that he played the first movement of the Tschaikowsky Concerto, perhaps the most difficult violin work written, was evidence of his mastery of the acrobatics of that instrument.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Pittsburg Orchestra audiences have not yet recovered from the astonishment awakened by the splendid work of Concertmaster von Kunits at last week's concerts. The earnest face of this superior artist had been seen so often at the first violin desk that familiarity had bred a sort of forgetfulness of his real abilities, and nothing out of the ordinary was expected from him as solo performer. When, therefore, on Friday night he played his way through the supremely difficult Tschaikowsky and Paganini numbers with the ease, confidence and technical perfection of a consummate master, little wonder that the audience, forgetting for the moment that he was just plain "concertmeister," overwhelmed him with such enthusiastic approval as it generally reserves only for the finest of artists.—Pittsburg Post.

Our hats off to Luigi von Kunits, the Pittsburg Orchestra's brilliant concertmeister who was the soloist at last night's concert! * * * Luigi von Kunits is a brilliant and a wonder—mark that—and the magnitude of his work would stagger and appall the greatest performers on the solo violin whatever their name or reputation.—Pittsburg Post.

Von Kunits' matchless execution in the intricate Tschaikowsky composition cast all the other portions of the program into comparative shade. * * * Mr. Kunits has done much good work since his coming to Pittsburg, but that of last night surpassed any former effort and set a standard that will require great things in future performances.—Pittsburg Gazette.

The soloist of the occasion was Luigi von Kunits, concertmaster of the organization, who is a great favorite with the audiences. Never in previous seasons was he given such bountiful applause as last night, and it seemed as if his smooth, round and virile tones had even improved since last year. There was a maturity about his playing that seemed to come as a revelation to the audience, and the result was most gratifying applause for the performer.—Pittsburg Times.

FRIEDA STENDER'S CONTINUED SUCCESS.—Miss Frieda Stender's talent as a singer is more and more recognized, and those in musical circles who have heard her in public and on whose judgment a young artist may rely, predict for her a brilliant future. Everybody praises her artistic temperament, her good method, which enables her to sing with perfect ease and breath control, and to show her certainly extra ordinarily fine voice to the best advantage. Miss Stender returned to town last week from a short trip to neighboring cities, where she filled professional engagements and earned new laurels. Her recent city engagements were at the fair at the Waldorf-Astoria, for the benefit of the Hospital for Crippled Children, and last Sunday with the Quartet Club in Hoboken. The young artist has for December, January and February a large number of concerts and private musicales already booked, and several engagements of importance are now pending.

CONCERT AT THE METROPOLITAN.

THE concert at the Metropolitan Opera House last Sunday night drew a large audience, and the soloists of the evening were received with enthusiasm. An important announcement in connection with the concert was the reappearance of Miss Esther Palliser, the American prima donna who has won many triumphs in England. Miss Palliser is a handsome woman, and her opening number, "Dich Theure Halle," established her at once as a singer from whom great things are expected. The artist sang the Wagner aria brilliantly, and withal a better word might be used to describe her interpretation. In the second half of the concert Miss Palliser sang a group of songs, "Your Lips Have Said You Love Me," Hawley; "The Sweetest Flower that Blooms," Hawley, and "Penso," by Tosti, and with rare sweetness did she sing these simple songs. The audience applauded and applauded, but Miss Palliser wisely refrained from adding encores.

Josef Hofmann played the Saint-Saëns Concerto in C minor with masterly technic. Later the pianist played three solos, Moszkowski's Spanish Caprice, a Barcarolle by Rubinstein and a paraphrase on the "Blue Danube" waltz, by Schulz-Erler, to the delight of the army of pianists in the house. Hofmann's popularity is as great as ever, and it is popularity, too, that was honestly earned. The other soloist was Jean Gérardy, the 'cellist, and his playing was as beautiful as ever. With the orchestra Gérardy played first the Variations Symphoniques by Boellmann. His solos were the Bach air and "Am Springbrunnen," by Davidoff. The orchestra, which was conducted by Emil Paur, accompanied Hofmann in the concerto and Miss Palliser in the "Tannhäuser" aria. The orchestral numbers played were Tschaikowsky's "Marche Slav"; "Caprice Espagnol," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, and "Vltava," a symphonic poem by Smetana.

Max Liebling was the accompanist of the evening.

Grace Tonnies' Recital.

THIS soprano, a pupil of Madame Björksten, soprano of the First Congregational Church, of Montclair, gave a song recital in Brooklyn last Wednesday, and delighted her audience with her artistic singing of this program:

Deh Vieni non Tardar (Figaro).....Mozart
My Mother Bids Me Bind My Hair.....Haydn
Le Violette.....Scarlatti
Schlaflied.....Moszkowski
Ständchen.....Richard Strauss
Ich Möchte Schweben.....Sjögren
Der Nussbaum.....Schumann
Niemand Hat's Gesehen.....Löwe

Mrs. Tonnies.

Spring.....Henschel
The Rose Leans Over the Pool.....Chadwick
Violets.....Wright
Solvejg's lied.....Grieg
Ein Schwan.....Grieg
Guten Morgen.....Grieg
Villanelle.....Dell' Acqua

Mrs. Tonnies.

David Gould Proctor at the piano.

Mrs. Tonnies possesses an exceptionally pure and liquid soprano voice, full of sympathetic quality.

Another Björksten pupil is Miss Antoinette Huncke, who has been engaged by the New York Church Choir Company as leading soprano.

Nellie Wright is yet another artist pupil who has been having success in Maine, the following press excerpts showing this:

Miss Wright sang four selections, showing a very flexible and well trained voice. * * * In artistic finish she shows the results of careful instruction and excellent judgment, while the fact that this was her first apearance in concert singing may have prevented her doing her very best. * * * Her work should gain rapidly with more experience, when growing confidence adds the personal quality to her great technical skill and excellent voice.—North Adams Transcript.

Of Miss Nellie Linde Wright, who made her first appearance before a Bangor audience, it may be truly said that she fulfilled the glowing accounts which have preceded her; she scored a pronounced and distinct success. She is the possessor of a good voice, well trained and under sufficient control—a clear, high, flexible soprano voice, of great range and unusual power. As given by Miss Wright the "Bel Raggio" won the hearty approval of the most critical members of the big audience. The audience demanded an encore, to which the singer responded.—Bangor News.

Miss Wright was heard with uncommon pleasure. She has a soprano voice, clear, high and mellow, and in each of her numbers gave evidence of exceptional cultivation. She sang "Bel Raggio" beautifully, and it was this selection which made plain her unusual ability, and showed the decidedly superior qualities of her tone and the brilliancy of her technic. The audience demanded an encore, which gave equal pleasure.—Bangor Daily Commercial.

JOSEF HOFMANN IN BOSTON.

Soloist with the Symphony Orchestra.

HOFMANN added again to his laurels already won this season by his playing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week, and also in his two recitals there, which were given on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon last.

The following are excerpts from the criticisms in the daily papers:

Hofmann played the Rubinstein Concerto in this city three years ago. Since then the boy has become a man and his development has been marked, for his playing at the rehearsal and concert indicated a maturity which was lacking at his previous interpretation of this work. That he is a wonderful artist is evident. He is master of all difficulties of the keyboard, his pedaling is admirable and his runs in chords, single or double, are clear and rapid. In short, his finger work is as near perfection as one is likely to hear in a long time. The opening phrases were delivered splendidly. The cadenza and coda were brilliantly played, and in the second movement the young artist gave exquisite interpretations of the gentler passages. One great charm of Hofmann's playing is the modest and unassuming manner in which he conducts himself. There are no mannerisms, no affectations; just a thoughtful young artist performing his part without any stage trickery for winning plaudits. He was rapturously applauded at the close of his performance and recalled many times.—Boston Globe, December 1.

Mr. Hofmann as a pianist is an interesting study. He has strength, speed and as a rule a fine sense of rhythm and proportion. He surmounts technical difficulties with modest ease. He sings now with more serenity and grace. Mr. Hofmann's technic is a delight and a fascination. His performance of the Finale was an astonishing feat of bravura, which shone with elegance and brilliance.—Boston Herald.

Mr. Hofmann was evidently inclined to the side of reserve, but the slow movement was admirably played and the brilliant work of the first movement and the bravura of the finale was excellently performed, yet without a trace of effort. The recalls were many and they were thoroughly earned.—Boston Advertiser.

THE FIRST HOFMANN RECITAL IN BOSTON.

Mr. Hofmann often played superbly, and the general level of his performance was very high. To speak in detail of the many excellences displayed would be to criticise at length and after the manner of the piano teacher. It is enough to remember the exquisite clearness and delicacy of tone, the unostentatious display of marked technical proficiency.—Boston Journal.

The Haydn Variations in F minor was exquisitely played; the Beethoven Sonata, op. 31, also received a broad interpretation. The Liszt Rhapsodie, No. 2, was a fitting climax to a most interesting afternoon, and the unaffecting manner and modesty, so lacking in the modern artist, shone forth as a crown above all, to even heighten the accomplishments of the young man.—Boston Advertiser.

This recital was interesting, meritorious and highly commendable. It was distinguished by intellectuality, elegance and sincerity. The Beethoven Sonata was seriously and sensibly read throughout; the Chopin selections and the executive pieces had clear, beautiful tone, bright precision and stirring vitality, all kept within their due limits of control and discretion. The Impromptu was a fine example of limpidity, and most of the "Soirée de Vienne" was noticeable for the lightest and deftest of touches.—Boston Herald.

Buck-Babcock Musicale.

ON Sunday, December 1, at their charming studios at Carnegie Hall, Dudley Buck, Jr., and Mrs. Charlotte Babcock gave their first musical of this season. The people who are fortunate enough to be invited to these musicales have learned to expect a great deal, but the array of talent offered on Sunday was exceptional. It certainly was a brilliant affair, and Mrs. Babcock was a fitting hostess for the occasion. The program:

Junger Knabe der du gehest.....Von Fielitz

Creole Lovers' Song.....Buck

Dudley Buck, Jr.

Si mes vers avaient des ailes.....Hahn

C'est le vent.

Miss Gertrude Bennett.

Resurrection.....Henschel

Mrs. Hamlen-Ruland.

The Passing of the Soul.....Mewson Mark

Master Michael Shapiro.

Mr. Buck's good voice, artistic temperament and finish were fully demonstrated in his opening numbers, but in the "Erlkönig" he rose to a very high plane. Mr. Buck certainly has a fine conception of it. He was as usual accompanied by his sister, Mrs. Blossom.

Mrs. Hamlen-Ruland made a decided hit with her magnificent voice. We should hear more of this lady for she is certainly very gifted.

Francis Fischer Powers sang the two songs of Ries in a delightful manner, and his encore, "Love Is a Bubble," was exceptionally fine vocal art.

Miss Gertrude Bennett was as charming as ever in her recitations, and the audience would not let her go until she had given one of her inimitable French selections.

Percy Hemus called forth much applause by his beautiful Schumann numbers, while his encore, "Twilight," by Nevin, was very artistically sung.

Mrs. Hazard was heard to advantage in the Cornelius numbers.

Last but not least the young violinist Shapiro played. Although this boy is only twelve years of age he is a artist with a wonderful talent, and with proper care he should develop into a truly great player.

WILLIAM BAUER AT LOWELL.—William Bauer, the gifted German pianist, has appeared already in over fifty concerts with Leonora Jackson this season, and made a host of friends. The following reports from the Lowell, Mass. press, are in keeping with the praise he wins everywhere.

Miss Jackson was ably seconded by her accompanist, a pianist of unusual merit. His touch is extremely delicate and his technic and expression admirable. Both as a soloist and accompanist he was entirely satisfactory.—Lowell (Mass.) Morning Citizen.

Mr. Bauer impressed his audience as a pianist of high value and excellence. He plays with great individuality, with a powerful technic and expressive touch. He interprets with sincerity and with remarkable breadth of color.—Lowell (Mass.) Daily Mail.

DUSS.

"THE discoverer of genius" is the appellation which has been bestowed upon R. E. Johnston because of his discriminating managerial scent. If there is any new genius in the world of music Mr. Johnston is sure to find him, and he is credited with having introduced to the public a number of great artists.

Mr. Johnston's latest find is a notable one for many reasons. In the first place he did not have to cross the Atlantic, but made the find right here in America, not many hundred miles from New York. How he came to discover it is an interesting story.

Not many weeks ago one of Mr. Johnston's musician friends asked him if he had ever heard Duss and his concert band, of Economy, Pa. Mr. Johnston admitted that while this organization was known to him by reputation as a band of unique characteristics and merit, he had never had an opportunity to hear it play, and had never met Mr. Duss, its conductor.

Expressing a desire to enjoy this privilege, through the kindly intervention of this friend a conference was brought about between the impresario and the talented bandmaster, Mr. Johnston making a hasty pilgrimage to Economy.

A very picturesque little town, by the way, is Economy. It is located on the Ohio River not far from Pittsburg, and is owned and controlled by the Harmony Society, of which Mr. Duss is the head. The band is one of the chief institutions of the town, and every inhabitant is proud of it and its gifted conductor. Mr. Duss, although a man of affairs upon whom devolve arduous duties and great responsibilities, is not only a born musician, but a veritable musical enthusiast. His soul is attuned to harmony.

Entering deeply into the profound mysteries of the art, he is conscientious to a fault in his interpretations. To this must be added a charming personality, and he possesses a magnetism that is simply irresistible. Although a rigid disciplinarian of inflexible principles, he is nevertheless genial and easily approachable; full of the milk of human kindness. The band partakes of this good nature; in fact, so much is this the case that it has oft been remarked that his band seems like a band of brothers.

Mr. Duss exercises great care in the selection of musicians for his band. Only artists of rare excellence are admitted, and he has, therefore, gathered about him a body of exceptionally equipped performers. Mr. Duss easily controls these forces and inspires them to accomplish wonderful results. The band's repertory is very large, Mr. Duss having one of the finest libraries of band music in this country, embracing almost all standard works, both classic and popular in form.

Mr. Johnston, as has been stated, went all the way to Economy to meet Mr. Duss and to hear his band. An impromptu concert was quickly arranged for Mr. Johnston, who, with a friend, constituted the entire audience.

With regard to the performance, Mr. Johnston said: "Before the band had played half a dozen measures I was swept off my feet. It was a sensational surprise; in fact, a revelation. I have heard all the prominent bands in Europe and America, but I can truthfully say I was never so thrilled or delighted as I was by this wonderful organization. The accuracy, smoothness, balance of tone, spirit and refinement of this performance I never have heard equaled. And never have I sat under a more magnetic and forceful conductor than Mr. Duss. He controls his forces well and secures all the effects he desires, his magnetism influencing everyone within reach. Mr. Duss is a born leader. I predict that when he appears before a New York audience he will at once be proclaimed a genius."

On account of the position which Mr. Duss holds as the head of the Harmony Society it is not possible for him to leave home except at rare intervals. An obstacle so grave might have discouraged a less enterprising person than he. Mr. Johnston, after days and days of earnest entreating, was enabled to return to New York, having obtained Mr. Duss' promise to appear at a limited number of concert engagements.

Mr. Duss heretofore has never made a tour of the country. He has visited Pittsburg, Buffalo and a few other cities with his band. The success won on these occasions was phenomenal, developing at times into what might be called a sensational success.

It is definitely settled that this great concert band will be heard in New York early next spring. Mr. Johnston already has engaged the Metropolitan Opera House for the opening concert next May.

Below are some recent press notices:

John S. Duss and his musicians scored a triumph last night that Sousa might envy. The seats in the front of the stand hold 11,000, and except for a few in the extreme rear there were no vacant seats. It was a throng that established a record for concert crowds. In an excellent program there was nothing more popular than Duss' own "America Up to Date" and "Shot and Shell." Both had to be repeated three times.—Pittsburg Times.

The Duss Band, of Economy, is a crack band, and Professor Duss is a composer of reputation. His "America Up to Date" was a feature at President McKinley's reception Tuesday night.—Buffalo Express.

The appearance of President Duss before the audience at the Exposition last night was a signal for a storm of applause. Everyone was, of course, full of expectancy to hear the two latest compositions of this unique character, the musician and philanthropist. Mr. Duss certainly is an excellent conductor, being of fine form, commanding presence and having that prime requisite, musical grace. The "Limited Express" was rapturously received with two encores. "Life's Voyage" intermezzo is strikingly original and very pretty, having an introduction that would not be out of place in the works of the great masters.—Pittsburg Times.

The official attendance at the Duss concert at Schenley Park last night, as given by the traction company, is 25,000, but the actual attendance was much larger. Excepting the great crowd of the Fourth of July, last night's attendance was the largest this year. As soon as Bandmaster Duss began his program, the audience was delighted. A varied program was rendered, and during the short intermission Professor Duss kept up the good humor of the audience by pithy two-minute speeches.—Pittsburg Commercial Gazette.

The Duss' Band continues to be a big attraction, notwithstanding the fact that there are over 100 bands in the city. The band has made a big hit and is followed by immense crowds. Pennsylvania won her laurels and attracted much attention to herself by reason of the presence at the head of the department of the famous Duss' Band. The band alternately played and sang the song that Leader Duss had written, entitled, "The Great Northwest." Loud cheering followed, and great curiosity was manifested in the crowd regarding the noted leader.—St. Paul Paper.

The greatest feature of the parade (Knights Templars) was the collection of the finest bands in the country, and Mr. Duss with his band and twenty chorus boys easily carried off marked honors. He simply produced a sensation all along the line. Floral tributes were so plentiful that he had to ask assistance to carry the same. One of the most beautiful offerings was a cross and crown of honor of his new "Cross and Crown" march. This piece drew forth applause and cheers wherever it was played. The Duss' Band was gorgeous in new uniforms of the hussar style, and Professor Duss must have felt prouder than the Grand Master at the head of the column.—Pittsburg Press.

Duss' Band carried off the honors in Wednesday's parade. When Mr. Duss' three patriotic compositions, "Hail, Hail, Cincinnati, Hail!" "America Up to Date" and the "G. A. R. in Dixie" were played and sung by the band, the crowds that lined the streets threw bouquets at the musicians and cheered until everyone was hoarse. The last named piece especially created the most demonstrative enthusiasm. The band was engaged by the Sons of Veterans to play at the reception to Governor Bushnell, Senator John M. Thurston and other notables.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

ESTHER PALLISER IN DEMAND.—The young American soprano, who appeared last Sunday night at the Metropolitan concert for the first time, has every reason to feel proud at the reception accorded her by the vast audience, which filled every nook and corner of the Auditorium. Both in her aria and in her songs she triumphed and shared the honors with both Hofmann and Gérardy, who were the other soloists. Miss Palliser sang the soprano part in the special "Elijah" performance which was given in Carnegie Hall. On Tuesday evening she was the soloist with the Mendelssohn Glee Club. On Sunday evening next she will be the soloist at the second Arion concert. On the 18th she will sing "The Messiah" in Albany, and on the 27th and 28th she will sing "The Messiah" in Carnegie Hall with the New York Oratorio Society.

Julian Walker's Success.

JULIAN WALKER, the basso, gave a recital recently in Washington, D. C. The program and press comments are given below. It is needless to wonder that this musicianly singer should have advanced to the eminent position he now holds in the profession:

Who Is Sylvia?.....Schubert
Eyes of Blue.....Chaminade
The Angelus.....Sullivan
The Fountain Mingles with the River.....Gounod
Song Cycle, Selections from Maud (Tennyson).....Arthur Somervell
I Hate the Dreadful Hollow.
She Came to the Village Church.
Oh, Let the Solid Ground.
Birds in the High Hall Garden.
Go Not, Happy Day.
Come Into the Garden, Maud.
Dead, Long Dead.
Oh, That 'Twere Possible.
Die Mainacht.....Brahms
Ich Liebe Dich.....Grieg
Traum Durch Die Dammerung.....Richard Strauss
Der Tod und Das Madchen.....Schubert
Ungeduld.....Schubert
Why So Pale?.....Parry
Weep Ye No More.....Parry
My Love Is Like the Red, Red Rose.....Henschel
Folksong.....MacDowell
The Sea.....MacDowell
The Joyful Widower.....Wetzler

Julian Walker in his song recital was a success. His singing throughout a fine program was delightful. His luscious voice was in good condition and he lost no effects. The song cycle of Arthur Somervell's "Maud" (Tennyson) was interesting from first to last, and Mr. Walker executed it with intelligence, force and feeling. The other songs were selected with great taste, and it was difficult for Mr. Walker's hearers to decide which they liked best. The German songs were particularly beautiful. A large audience greeted Mr. Walker, and he left a splendid impression.—Washington Capital.

Julian Walker, of New York the well-known baritone, was greeted by an enthusiastic audience last evening at a song recital given at the Concordia Auditorium, corner of Eighth and E streets, Northwest. The recital proved one of the musical events of the season. Mr. Walker's program consisted of twenty-three songs by Schubert, Chaminade, Gounod, Somervell, Brahms, Grieg, Strauss, Parry, Henschel, MacDowell and Wetzler. The arrangement seemed almost perfect, for there were no two songs alike. Mr. Walker has sung here before on several occasions, and his audiences were numerous and enthusiastic. His enunciation, phrasing and tone production are strictly ratistic, and it is safe to count Mr. Walker among the leading song singers of the day. Above all, Mr. Walker is a musician; he accompanied himself in the last group of songs on the program. He will always be welcome among the musicians in Washington.—Washington Post.

BROOKLYN ARION MATINEE.

ARION Hall, Brooklyn, was decorated last Sunday afternoon with flags, the occasion being a special matinee arranged for the wives and daughters of the members of the Arion Singing Society, of Brooklyn. Three numbers by the New York composer, Bruno Oscar Klein, proved the drawing attractions on the program. The first played was a sonata for piano and violin, op. 10, and this was performed with sincerity and convincing musical style by the composer and Carl Venth. A group of three songs, which Mr. Klein dedicated to Miss Caroline Montefiore, the New York singer and vocal teacher, were beautifully sung by Mrs. Marie Rappold, the composer playing the piano accompaniments. The titles of these three songs are "Unter blühenden Bäumen," "Zwei Rosen" and "Versteckt." The third Klein number on the program were two (a and b) American dances arranged as piano duets—"In Old Kentucky" and "In the Cotton Fields." These characteristic pieces were played by the composer and Arthur Claassen with vim and in a manner thoroughly in accord with the themes. Another delightful musical number was offered by Carl Venth, the violinist, accompanied by his clever young wife. Mr. Venth played first a composition by himself, "Dolce Recuerdo," and then "Le Ménétrier," by Wieniawski. He added still another piece, a pretty cradle song. George Riddle, the dramatic reader, gave the program mental coloring by adding a recitation from Shakespeare's "Julius Cæsar" and New England sketches of a semi-humorous nature.

KATE STELLA BURR'S "Daisy Chain," consisting of Miss Estelle Harris, Mrs. Elizabeth Leonard, Carl Vigneron (tenor St. Thomas' Church), Robert Kent Parker, with Miss Burr as director, is preparing for exclusive drawing room work. A prominent society lady will introduce them at a large reception to be given early in January. Miss Burr is in her studio from 9:30 to 1:30 daily, coaching the largest and finest class of artists one could wish for, besides receiving socially from 5 until 6 every afternoon except Sunday. Her quartet at Grace M. E. Church is doing excellent work—the contralto, Mrs. Pearl Benham Kaighn, is a careful artist. Robert Kent Parker, the basso, is rapidly becoming known as a fine artist, and Miss Burr reports a wonderful tenor voice, which study will develop into a phenomenon; his name is Harry McCluskey.

Here are some of her engagements this week: The Sunday kindergarten concert at the Waldorf, December 12, under the patronage of Mrs. John Jacob Astor, Mrs. Oelrichs, Mrs. George Gould, &c.

Yamod Choral Society, December 13, under leadership of Mr. Agramonte, who will do the piano work, with Miss Burr at the organ. Soloists: Miss Effie Stewart, Mrs. Pearl Benham Kaighn, George W. Jenkins and Julian Walker.

Mrs. Babcock's musicale, Carnegie Hall, Saturday afternoon, December 14.

It will be seen Miss Burr is a busy woman, and she well deserves her success, for she is a brainy worker.

Carl G. Schmidt's organ recital at St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church, West End avenue and Eighty-sixth street, occurred on the worst night of last week, notwithstanding which a good sized audience assembled, among them Dr. Palmer, S. C. Bennett and others. Mr. Schmidt played with taste and refinement, the principal work of the evening being the Guilmant Sonata in D, with its graceful pastorale and brilliant finale. He received appreciative applause, and his "The Meistersingers" Quartet, four male voices, lent much charm to the recital. Gerrish's "Still With Thee" was most effective, the low D flat of Louis J. Geary being remarkable for depth and power, and the same singer's solo in "Annie Laurie" was fine. In this tenor Raymond W. Smith sang a high B flat which was pure and sweet. The next recital occurs Tuesday evening, January 7, 1902.

Mr. Schmidt gave a lecture recital at Miss Spence's school on Saturday, his subject being Chopin, with illustrations. He will also give a series of Wagner recitals at Miss Dana's school.

Katharine Pelton's first Tuesday in December musicale, despite the violent storm, found an unusual number of music lovers on hand, who were well rewarded by a program of fine music. Those who participated were Miss Bessie Bonsall, alto; Miss Henrietta Weber, pianist; Arthur Hofmann, violinist, and a baritone. There was especial interest in Mr. Hofmann, as he is a brother of the pianist, Josef. Miss Pelton is preparing her program for the concert at Flushing, Long Island, next week, at which some excellent artists will appear.

Charles Heinroth's second organ recital at the Church of the Ascension last Wednesday at 3:30 was attended by an interested audience. Of his program the writer heard the Widor Fifth Symphony entire, in which Heinroth played with dignity and beautiful registration. The surety and ease of his technic in the Toccata Finale are especially worth commendation. His mixing of tone colors in the Dubois "Paradisum" made the piece most effective, but the staccato of the Lemaigre Capriccio in F was lacking. Inasmuch as the acoustics of the stone church are defective, this may have sounded more as the composer intended in another part of the church.

Mme. Anita Lloyd was at home the first Saturday of this month, and between the charming vivacity of the hostess, the music and the bountiful hospitality the evening was much enjoyed. Madame Lloyd sang a Bolero by Mattei and a Valse by Delibes, displaying a brilliant soprano voice, coupled with winning grace in execution and appearance. This French-American woman has definite charm, and is full of chic. Her singing was much applauded.

At Dr. Henry M. Leipziger's, the supervisor of lectures of the Board of Education, a score or more of people gathered last week. The vast library, which completely covers the walls, interested many, while the music, which came later, was enjoyable. Miss Leipziger sang a little known sad Swedish song by Grieg in a contralto voice of pleasant quality, with excellent enunciation and perfect intonation. She could undoubtedly make much more out of her voice. Mrs. Burgdorf sang some folksongs, Tyrolean, Austrian, and a charming little syncopated thing by Harvey Worthington Loomis, accompanied by the composer, modest man and sterling musician. What he calls it I do not know, but it is of innate refinement, and will make its way. Later Loomis played some of his original piano pieces, also contributing accompanying music to recitations by Mr. Belknap. Percy Hemus, who is singing much nowadays, was heard in some quiet little songs, and these all showed his reserve power. As a climax he sang Schumann's "The Two Grenadiers" with dramatic power and intensity, accompanied by Loomis.

Pupils of J. W. Parson Price united in a studio musicale last Wednesday, and one who has attended them for some years says it was the "best musicale of all," and passed off without a hitch, with credit to the pupils, much enjoyed by the listeners, of whom there were all the spacious studio could hold. Mr. Price has many excellent voices under him. This was the program:

Mary Jordan Baker's bright and pretty countenance appeared in a recent issue of a leading daily, and as this marks the appearance in professional ranks of this petite and pleasing young singer, a pupil of Scherhey, a few words concerning her may be worth noting. She is a soprano, originally from Baltimore, and has sung at various social and charitable events, and is now ready to do drawing room engagements. The voice is sweet and sympathetic, and much to her advantage is her winsome manner. She has been singing in Rahway, New Brunswick and Philadelphia with success, and later she expects to sing in Washington, Philadelphia and Baltimore.

Arthur Farwell's "American Indian Melodies" has just been issued by the Wan-Wan Press, and contains many highly interesting things, gotten up in the printer's best art. The pieces are given the following titles: "Approach of the Thunder God," "The Old Man's Love Song," "Song of the Deathless Voice," "Ichibuzzhi," "The Mother's Vow," "Inketunga's Thunder Song," "Song of the Ghost Dance," "Song of the Spirit," "Song of the Leader" and "Choral." Musically, they vary from the most melancholy to the happy sounding, and each piece is accompanied by a sentence relating to the poetic content. In an advance circular the Wan-Wan Press says: "The melodies thus treated, ten in number, are short, as are all Indian songs; in some instances they are those sung at the Wan-Wan and other ceremonies of the Omahas. They present but little technical difficulty, many of them none whatsoever, but afford great opportunity for refinement and variety of expression."

The cover bears a reproduction of an original design by a Kiowa Indian. Mr. Farwell wishes it understood that in this work he appears not as a composer, but merely as a harmonic interpreter of the Indian melodies.

Oley Speaks was called West last week by the death of a brother. His friends extend condolence.

A charity concert was given last week at the studio of Nora Maynard Green. Several of her advanced pupils took part, Mrs. Geo. A. Smith, Miss Theo. Boone, Miss Cecilia Bradford, violin, and Miss Sibyl Worthington, pianist, assisting.

At the Hospital Guild concert, at 170 West Fifty-seventh street, last Tuesday evening, the Misses Hibbard were the principal soloists.

Mrs. Antonia Sawyer sang and Mr. Jarvis played at a recital which took place at Rev. Dr. and Mrs. Gardner's school, on Fifth avenue, last week. Mrs. Sawyer teaches at this school.

Mary Fidelia Burt gave a practical exposition of sight singing, ear training and musical stenography at her Carnegie Hall studio last Friday. People in the audience made the selections for the children to sing, which they did at sight. The coming Saturday afternoon the exhibition will be repeated.

Albert Gérard-Thiers told the story of "Eliland," from the German of Karl Stieler, including the song cycle of the same name composed by Alexander von Fielitz, at the home of Mrs. Esther Herrman, No. 59 West Fifty-sixth street, on Tuesday last.

Miss Virginia Bailie issued cards for a studio musicale last Friday, from 5:30 to 7, when some superior piano playing was heard in her artistic Carnegie Hall quarters.

Richard Carden is at home informally Sunday afternoons, 225 West Seventy-first street; the energetic and popular musical salon man is always sure of many callers and much good music.

Mme. Marie Cross Newhaus is having an exceptionally busy season, and will give a musicale at her Fifth avenue studio next Sunday evening. A special feature of her musicales is her own participation, whether as singer or story teller.

ANDERSON—BAERNSTEIN.—These two artists are now on a long Western tour, during which time they will sing in six performances of "The Messiah," besides recital and concert appearances.

This trip extends as far West as Minneapolis and St. Paul. In February they are West again, as far as St. Louis, and in April, as far as Chicago. On these trips they will appear in Chicago, Minneapolis, St. Paul, Indianapolis, St. Louis, Detroit, Toledo and Binghamton.

For January joint recitals are under way for New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Newark, and a return to Englewood, N. J.

At the Powers-Alexander Studios.

THE first of the winter series of Francis Fischer Powers' pupils' musicales occurred Saturday evening in Carnegie Hall. Mr. Powers threw open the entire suite of nine rooms, which, of course, were crowded with pupils and their friends. The program was a rare one, and beautifully presented, each pupil showing the careful training, tone coloring and placing for which Mr. Powers is fast becoming famous; while all sang with an artistic style with which all who have heard F. F. P. himself sing are familiar. It is impossible to particularize, though among the sopranos Miss Marguerite Palmiter, Mrs. Parkhurst and Mrs. Stanley stood out strongly, each having a remarkable voice and temperament as well. Their singing was greatly appreciated. Miss Mathilde Catron was a particular favorite—a wonderful contralto voice is hers; of beautiful quality and agility and great power. Better singing than hers in the "Page's Song" we have never heard in Mr. Powers' studio. Miss Catron is sure of a great future. Miss Nina Thomas, another new contralto, has a deep resonant voice of lovely quality. She sang her ballads with great feeling and skill. The audience was very enthusiastic. Miss Sylvia Elcock shows great improvement since her summer's work, and has made many friends by her beautiful singing. Of Mr. Hemus much has been said and more is expected; his gifts being of such an unusual type—every tone shows Powers through and through. There is a most satisfactoy development in his "mezzo voice." Mr. Powers asserts that never in his life has he seen a baritone more capable of such wonderful tone color as Mr. Hemus. His reading and interpretation of the "Erl King" and "Lotus Flower" will long be remembered. Tenor Epps and Bass Dailey were fine and each delighted his hearers.

The following was the program:

Romanza in F sharp.....Schumann

CLAVIER PIANO SCHOOL.

THE fifth recital of the Clavier Piano School season of 1901-1902 was given in Clavier Hall Tuesday evening, November 26, at 8:15 o'clock, by Miss Jennie Wells Chase, of Lyndon, Vt., assisted by Miss Mary Lansing, contralto. The program:

Prelude and Fugue, C sharp major.....Bach
Allegro Vivace, op. 31, No. 1.....Beethoven
Nachtstück.....Schumann
Sognai.....F. Schira
Miss Lansing.
Preludes, Nos. 23 and 21.....Chopin
Valse, op. 70, No. 3.....Chopin
Mazurka, op. 33, No. 4.....Chopin
Fantaisie Impromptu.....Chopin
I'm Wearing Awa' to the Land o' the Leal.....Arthur Foote
Niemand Hat's Gesehen.....Carl Loewe
Miss Lansing.
Moment Musical, No. 3.....Schubert
To the Sea.....MacDowell
Improvisation.....MacDowell
Rhapsodie, No. 6.....Liszt

This recital was a special one, differing from the regular Friday evenings in that one pupil played the entire program. Miss Chase showed much versatility in this rather conventional program, ranging as it does from the Prelude and Fugue of Bach to the compositions by the more modern composers. The climax was undoubtedly the Liszt Rhapsodie, which Miss Chase played with a dash and brilliancy that was remarkable. Special mention should also be made of the Chopin Fantaisie Impromptu.

Miss Chase repeated this program at the school founded by Mr. Moody at Northfield, Mass., on Thanksgiving evening, Thursday, November 28, to a large and enthusiastic audience.

At the recital in Clavier Hall Miss Chase was assisted by Miss Mary Lansing, contralto, who was heard with so much enjoyment at one or two of the school's recitals last season. Miss Lansing's rich, warm voice, together with her artistic phrasing and sympathetic rendering of the several numbers added greatly to the pleasure of the evening.

John R. Rebarer, another pupil of the school, is to play a recital in Lebanon, Pa., on Tuesday evening, December 3.

HERBERT WITHERSPOON.—Very few singers have been as busy this season as has Herbert Witherspoon, the basso cantante. His beautiful voice and artistic singing have made him one of the most popular singers now before the public. At St. Louis, Pittsburg and Atlanta, cities in which he has recently sung, he was immediately re-engaged, and the newspapers united in praising his work. Other engagements which he has filled or which he will fill in the near future are: Song recitals at Philadelphia, October 21; Stamford, Conn., October 24, and Brooklyn Amateur Musical Club, November 18; concert with Jean Gérardy, the 'cellist, Concert and Festival Association, Atlanta, Ga., November 26; recital St. Louis, December 2; soloist Union Musical Club, St. Louis, December 3; recital at Tuesday Musical Club, Denver, Col., December 5, and Boulder, Col., December 6; concert with Mrs. Ford, Cleveland, Ohio, December 11, and "The Messiah" at Oberlin, Ohio, December 12 and December 13; soloist at Women's String Orchestra concert, December 18, New York city; "The Creation," Montreal, January 22 and January 23; soloist Brooklyn Institute, February 6; Twentieth Century Club, Buffalo, N. Y., February 13, and Detroit, Mich., February 28. In January he will be heard with the Pittsburg Orchestra in Pittsburg. Of his last appearance in that city the papers spoke as follows:

The opening reception of the Art Society was given at Carnegie Hall last night to a genuinely musical audience. The program, arranged with a view to beginning the season auspiciously, consisted of a group of quartets from Brahms' "Liebeslieder Walzer," rendered then for the first time in Pittsburg, some miscellaneous songs and the ever-popular and always lovely "Daisy Chain Cycle," by Liza Lehmann. Mrs. S. C. Ford, Mrs. Morris Black, James Moore and Herbert Witherspoon made up the quartet of singers, a group worthy in every way of the fine program. The Brahms quartets from an artistic point of view were most important of the evening's numbers, and in these the four singers accomplished truly admirable work. The voices blended beautifully and the entire rendition was worthy of the highest praise. Mr. Witherspoon, the basso, proved himself an artist of unmistakable calibre. The emphasis and artistic conception with which he rendered the Hungarian song, "Had a Horse," was as satisfactory as it is, unfortunately, rare in concert work.—Pittsburg Commercial Gazette.

Herbert Witherspoon, the bass, got most of the applause of the quartet, and did the most delicate work. He sang a group of songs, but none of them reached the dramatic and artistic quality of Korbay's Hungarian ballad, "Had a Horse."—Pittsburg Times.

MENDELSSOHN CLUB OF ROCKFORD, ILL.

ROCKFORD, Ill., boasts one of the most prosperous musical clubs in the United States. It is the Mendelssohn Club, and being prosperous, it has been happily named. Both the active and associate membership lists are filled. Then the club owns its own pretty home well furnished, and equipped in addition with two concert grand pianos and a fine two manual vocalion organ, with seventeen stops, full pedal, six mechanical registers and six combination pedals. The Mendelssohn Ladies' Chorus of fifty-five voices is making progress, under the direction of John Ostengren, of Chicago. This chorus sang with pronounced success before the Amateur Club of Chicago at the Music Hall in the Fine Arts Building. The chorus was also one of the chief attractions at the Dedrickson testimonial concert given at Rockford recently.

The Mendelssohn Club gave what is termed a "study" program at a concert at the clubhouse on December 5. It was a program of children's music, and interpreted as follows:

The Mendelssohn Club during the season will give the usual number of artistic concerts. December 18 is the date of the first concert in this series. Goring Thomas' cantata, "The Swan and the Skylark," will be sung at the concert to be given January 2.

Mrs. Chandler Starr, an officer of this club, is one of the prominent leaders of musical matters in her section of the country.

GERARD-THIERS.—On Tuesday night, at the residence of Mrs. Esther Herrman, Albert Gérard-Thiers, the celebrated voice specialist, told the story of "Eliland," from the German of Karl Stieler and sang the beautiful song cycle of the same name composed by Alexander von Fielitz.

London Music.

HOTEL CECIL, LONDON,
November 23, 1901.

TWO interesting concerts have been arranged by Walter Ford in Bechstein Hall, of which the first took place on Monday afternoon. The concerts are designed to show, as far as is possible, the growth of German vocal music during the last six centuries, and though it is, of course, impossible to do full justice to so enormous a subject in two recitals, Mr. Ford is to be congratulated on the manner in which he has arranged his programs. On this occasion he gave three groups, consisting respectively of the Volkslied, the Volkstürmliches Lied and the Kunstlied, and he included among them some of Brahms' arrangements of Volkslieder and songs by Hassler, Heinrich Albert, Melchior Franck, Bach, Schubert and others. Mr. Ford's vocal powers are, perhaps, not very great, but he is an earnest and interesting singer and his performances are always well worth hearing.

On the same afternoon a violoncello recital was given at St. James' Hall by Henry Bramsen.

In the evening Bechstein Hall was the scene of yet another vocal recital, given by Leonhard Sickert, a young and promising singer with a good voice and unimpeachable taste. When first he appeared in London a couple of years or so ago his singing was unfinished, but since then he has made great progress and his interpretation of songs by Mendelssohn, Löwe, Schumann and Franz and of a number of old English songs had many good points. He was assisted by Miss Edie Reynolds, who played violin solos.

Much metaphorical blowing of trumpets heralded the first appearance of Miss Amy Castles, a young Australian soprano, at St. James' Hall on Tuesday evening. Miss Castles certainly has a voice of remarkable power and beauty, and there is every probability that she will turn into a great singer. Her present intention is to continue taking lessons in England, and the best advice that one can offer her is to persist in that intention and not to allow her head to be turned by the very enthusiastic reception which was given her on Tuesday. She has a very remarkable voice, but she does not make the most of it at present, and her singing of the "Air d'Ophélie," from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet," and of "O Dieu Brama," from Bizet's "Les Pêcheurs de Perles," was lacking in variety. When she added style to her accomplishments she should make a great hit. At this concert William Lavin made a successful first appearance in London, while among the other performers were Miss Ada Crossley, Reginald Davidson and Dr. Theo. Lierhammer.

On the same evening concerts were given by Miss Clara Blumenthal, a pianist, and Miss Lilian Foulis, a violinist, at Bechstein Hall, and by Miss Josephine Wood at the Salle Erard.

The second of the Queen's Hall organ recitals, at which E. H. Lemare, the organist of St. Margaret's, Westminster, is now acting as soloist, took place on Wednesday afternoon. These recitals are so much appreciated and attract such excellent audiences that one would like to see the standard of the programs raised. A single work by Bach, even if it is the great Toccata in F, is surely rather short measure, while organ arrangements of extracts from "Lohengrin" and Brahms' "Academical Festival" overture, clever though they be, are quite unnecessary when orchestral concerts are of such frequent occurrence. Mr. Lemare is a brilliant organist, and it is to be hoped that he will see his way to giving us rather more interesting programs.

In the evening Marie Brema gave a concert in Bechstein Hall, under the auspices of the Curtius Concert Club. Miss Brema's programs are always interesting, and she has a dramatic power that enables her to do full justice to them. On Wednesday she was suffering from a cold, and an apology was made for her. The apology, however, was hardly necessary, as the influence of the cold was almost inperceptible. She opened the concert with four old German songs, "Leichte Wahl," written in 1544; "Linde im Thal," of a year later; "Im Wald bei der Amvel," and Melchior Franck's "Kommt, ihr Gespielen," while later in the evening she sang a particularly fine song by Brückler, called "Gebet." These, together with songs by Schubert and Jensen, formed an interesting and uncommon selection, to which she did full justice. Francis Braun, a baritone, with a very pleasant voice, also sang, his best effort being Löwe's "Tour der Reimer," while he joined Miss Brema in a number of duets. Madame von Stosch was the violinist, and she played some selections from Bach's Second Sonata particularly well.

On the same evening the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society opened its season at Queen's Hall. Under the conductorship of Ernest Ford the orchestra gave excellent performances of Tschaikowsky's "Casse Noisette" Suite, the "Tannhäuser" Overture and Beethoven's C minor Symphony, the vocalists being Miss Margaret Macintyre and Richard Green.

On the same evening Miss Keevil gave a mandolin recital at Steinway Hall, while in the afternoon a ballad concert took place at St. James' Hall.

On Thursday afternoon the indefatigable pianist and composer, Donald Francis Tovey, gave the third of a series of chamber concerts. In both his capacities Mr. Tovey is a very serious man indeed, both in his aims and in his style. He is obviously a devoted admirer of Brahms, and his works reproduce that composer almost too faithfully, in that they have but little originality. His Piano Quartet in E minor, which he played on this occasion, is an excellent example of his work. It is undeniably clever, but as music it is uninteresting. A little more originality, and, be it said, a slight sense of humor, would make Mr. Tovey into an excellent composer. Madame Soldat joined him in a fine performance of Beethoven's Sonata, for violin and piano, in C minor, and Miss Cecilia Gates, Percy Such, W. Malsch and Miss Fillunger also appeared.

On the same afternoon the second of the Ysaye-Becker-Busoni concerts took place. The ensemble of the trio had much improved since last week, and the performances they gave of Beethoven's Trio in B flat and Saint-Saëns' in F were excellent. As solos Signor Busoni played Weber's Sonata in D minor, M. Ysaye gave Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor and Herr Becker gave a Sonata of Valentini.

The most important of the many concerts that took place in the evening was that given by Madame Patti in Albert Hall. Patti is still a name to conjure with and the huge hall was packed. Her voice is, of course, not what it was; that is hardly to be expected. But there is no denying that it is marvelously well preserved and her singing still retains the wonderful charm that made it so famous. In the program she was only announced to sing three songs, but that meant seven, with an encore to each of the first two and a double encore to the third. She confined herself principally to old favorites, such as "Batti Batti"; the Jewel Song, Tosti's "Serenata"; "Home, Sweet Home" and "Comin' Through the Rye," without which no Patti concert would be complete. She also, however, sang Wagner's "Traüme" and she sang it with really remarkable charm. At this concert Mme. Clara Butt and Kennerly Rumford also scored big successes and a number of other performers appeared.

At Bechstein Hall Mlle. Maria Pevy, an excellent pianist, gave a very successful recital from an artistic point of view. Her technic is good, her phrasing is original and very interesting, and she furthermore has a very real understanding of the poetry of music. Tausig's arrangement of Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor and Beethoven's Variations, op. 34, were her best performances.

On Friday afternoon the band of the Royal Artillery, conducted by Cav. Zavertal, gave a first-rate program at Queen's Hall. This orchestra is a remarkably good one, and its performance of Mendelssohn's "Reformation" Symphony left nothing to be desired.

At Bechstein Hall Miss Hope Morgan gave her second song recital.

NEW XMAS SONGS

MARY'S SLUMBER SONG
John Spencer Camp
High Voice in C Low Voice in G
.50
One of the most attractive numbers from Mr. Camp's very successful Christmas Cantata, "The Prince of Peace," issued in sheet-music form. It is a charming song, and yet the word "charming" is not of itself enough to describe the worth of the song. It is charming and more; it is musicianly without pedantry, and its vocal quality will appeal to singers.

BABE DIVINE
(Violin Obbligato)
Louis R. Dressler
High Voice in G .60 Low Voice in E♭
A song of vocal quality, easy to sing, and of pleasing melody. The violin obbligato adds to its interest.

BABE IN MANGER LOWLY
Op. 50, No. 2
E. R. Kroeger
High Voice in D♭ .50 Low Voice in B♭
An unpretentious song, which, nevertheless, presents possibilities to the singer. It is simply written, but a singer of temperament will find it responsive.

NORDICA IN ST. LOUIS.

[By Wire.]

St. Louis, Mo., December 9, 1901.

"NORDICA'S recital at the Odeon here to-night an immense success. Many people turned away. Capacity of the hall 2,000. CHARLTON."

La Sourdine Musicale.

MR. and Mrs. Ludwig Breitner, piano and violin, and Leo Schulz, 'cello, played at the meeting of La Sourdine last Monday afternoon. One interesting number of the program was Otto Floersheim's "Gesang," for the G string of the violin. This was charmingly played by Mrs. Breitner, accompanied by Mr. Breitner. The Breitners, with Mr. Schulz, played the Schütt Trio; Mr. Breitner and Mr. Schulz the Brahms Sonata for piano and 'cello. Beethoven's Trio, op. 70, No. 1, was also played by the three artists of the afternoon. As piano solos, Mr. Breitner performed an Aria by Schumann, a Barcarolle by Rubinstein, and a study by Chopin. The afternoon's program was closed with César Franck's Sonata for piano and violin, played by Mr. and Mrs. Breitner.

LE GRAND HOWLAND.—Le Grand Howland's opera class was heard at Carnegie Lyceum last Friday evening before a large audience.

The "Garden Scene," from "Faust," and Mr. Howland's own opera "Sarrona," were given, the latter having its first production. Among his pupils who made their début were Harry Warren, Sybra Glykera, Edith Longford and Duryea Bensel; also two pupils of Miss Thursby, Josephine Aleene and Miss Summers. The works were sung in English. The performance was highly creditable, and showed careful training both in acting and singing. Notable was the excellent diction of all the débutants.

"Nita," another opera by the same composer, will be repeated during Easter week. Mr. Howland ought to be encouraged.

JOSEF RHEINBERGER.

JOSEF RHEINBERGER died in Munich November 25 of lung and nerve troubles. He was born March 17, 1839. Rheinberger was well known in this country, principally because of his American pupils—Horatio Parker, Henry Holden Huss, Louis V. Saar and many other prominent composers and organists. The dead man was a fertile producer of choral, instrumental and organ works. At the age of seven he was playing the organ regularly in church, and after eight years' study at the Royal School of Music, Munich, he became teacher of theory there in 1859, Royal professor in 1865 and Hof-Capellmeister in 1877. As head of the Royal Chapel he made the choir celebrated for revivals of ancient church music, and he was forty years a busy teacher. His wife, the poetess Franziska von Hoffnas, a lady seventeen years his senior, died in 1892.

JOSEF RHEINBERGER.

Rheinberger's organ works figure frequently on the programs of recitals, and his Piano Quartet in E flat and Piano Concerto in A flat were at one time fairly popular. He has written operas, oratorios, masses and cantatas. His "Stabat Mater" and Requiem for the dead of the Franco-Prussian war are heard occasionally in Germany. He wrote scholarly, never great music, though his melody is agreeable. "The Chase" is the best known of his smaller piano pieces. After all, it is as a great pedagogue that Rheinberger will be remembered.

MISS COTTLE'S PROGRAM.—Miss P. Ethelwyne Cottle played the following program at the Conservatory of Music, 2105 Seventh avenue, on Tuesday evening:

Faschingsschwank, op. 26	Schumann
Sonata, for violin and piano, op. 18	Niemann
Mazurka, op. 68, No. 2, in D	Chopin
Valse, in E minor	Chopin
Revolutionary Etude, op. 10, No. 12	Chopin
At the Spring	Joseffy
Nocturne in F, from op. 23	Schumann
Valse de Concert, A flat	Rubinstein

RIEGER SOUTH.—William H. Rieger, the tenor, is now on his way to the South. He will sing in Atlanta, Ga., on December 16, and he is booked for an extensive tour previous to his Northern appearances.

The Musical Event to Come

Major J. B. Pond announces a Concert Tour by

FLORIZEL

The Nine-Year-Old Violinist

The Marvel of the Age, whom European critics call "The New Paganini," and who not only plays all the twenty-four Paganini caprices by heart, but also plays the music of Vieuxtemps, Bach, Wieniawski, Mendelssohn, and Mozart, as easily as other children amuse themselves at tennis or marbles.

Florizel's recent tour of fifteen concerts in Switzerland, Norway, and Sweden has created a furore the like of which has not been known in the memory of man or in the annals of music.

Florizel will be assisted on his American tour by the charming young soprano, Miss Lucy Gates, of Utah, this being her first appearance on the American concert stage.

Mr. Adolph Glose, the favorite American pianist and famous accompanist, has also been engaged for the tour.

Major Pond is now booking Florizel's time. Appplications should be made at once to

J. B. POND, Everett House, New York

LUCY GATES

WETZLER'S MUSICAL SERVICE.

HERMANN HANS WETZLER gave a musical service last Monday night in the Collegiate Church, Fifth avenue and Forty-eighth street. He was assisted by the quartet of the church—Mrs. Marie Kunkel Zimmerman, soprano; Mrs. Gertrude Stein-Bailey, alto; Dr. Ion Jackson, tenor, and Julian Walker, basso. The vocal numbers of the program comprised Mozart's "Ave Verum"; three excerpts from the Bach cantata "O, Ewigkeit, Du Donnerwort," and the terzetto from Saint-Saëns' Christmas oratorio. Mr. Wetzler played Liszt's "Evocation à la Chapelle Sixtine"; "Benediction Nuptiale," Saint-Saëns; Prelude, Fugue and Variation, César Franck, and Prelude and Fugue in A minor [Book 2, Peters edition], J. S. Bach.

Despite his virtuosity, and it is considerable, Mr. Wetzler always suggests the musician first, the organist afterward. His control of his instrument is unmarred by the too familiar mannerisms of many organists. There is no sense of pedantic interpretation, and his phrasing, crisp accentuation give a plastic quality to his play. His registration for each number was apt and illustrative of this musician's individuality. Eschewing violent, so-called orchestral effects, he made his organ speak its own idiom, yet with much richness of color and tonal fullness. The Saint-Saëns is a happy piece of writing, in texture melodic and thoroughly idiomatic. Of more interest, because more original, were the Franck selections. Full of the shimmering mysticism, saturated with churchly atmosphere, Franck always appears at his best in his organ compositions. The Prelude was like a Gothic arch and the Fugue free from the dusty formalism that makes most organ fugues things of horror. It need hardly be said that on pedals and manuals Mr. Wetzler's work was clear, effective, musical. His Bach playing deserves separate praise. It was vital and full of power.

CAMILLE BIRNBOHM.—A large and fashionable audience greeted Camille Birnbohm on the occasion of her début last Wednesday evening in the Myrtle Room of the Waldorf-Astoria. Mrs. Birnbohm adds to a soprano voice of agreeable quality an attractive personality. She made a successful début. Notable among her assistants was Hans Kronold, the 'cellist, who was heard in several numbers, which were thoroughly appreciated, judging from the applause.

Breitner Pronounced as Teacher.

NEW YORK, December 9, 1901.

Editors The Musical Courier:

"IN order to discontinue any controversy, I wish to state that my teacher is Ludovic Breitner, to whom I owe whatever I may have accomplished as a pianist. I did state to you that I intend visiting my relatives this summer in Germany, and incidentally to study with various masters while abroad. Thanking you in advance for making this correction, ANNA JEWELL."

Mendelssohn Trio Club Concerts.

THE Mendelssohn Trio Club organized this autumn will give a series of five afternoon concerts at the Hotel Majestic. The dates are December 17, January 7 and 28, February 11 and March 4, all Tuesday afternoons at 3 o'clock. The members of the club are Alexander Saslavsky, violin; Victor Sörlin, 'cello, and Charles Gilbert Spross, piano. The program for the first concert next Tuesday afternoon will include the Mendelssohn Trio in C minor and the Gade Trio, op. 42. M. Saslavsky will play Wieniawski's Concerto No. 2, and Albert Quesnel, tenor, will sing two groups of songs.

MRS. PENNINGTON HAUGHEY.—Townsend H. Fellows has taken the sole management of Mrs. Pennington Haughey, the sweet voiced singer, who has taken the soprano position at the West Presbyterian Church (Dr. Paxton's).

She is already booked for a large number of affairs this season, including an engagement at Chicago to sing "The Messiah" on December 18, as well as a number of private affairs during the month of December. At Huntington Woodman's recital at Greenwich, Conn., she scored a big success, and was several times recalled. Mrs. Haughey will be heard at the Lotus Club "Ladies Day," in January.

MADAME LIPPA'S MUSICALE.—Mme. Ockeston Lippa and her pupils gave a musicale on December 4 at her residence in Ellsworth avenue, East End, Pittsburg. A large audience applauded the distinguished pianist and several of her pupils. The vocal numbers were contributed by Miss Henrietta Keil. A social hour followed the musicale.

HOCHMAN PLAYS SCHARWENKA'S CONCERTO.—The important novelty of the concert given by the Brooklyn Saengerbund at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last Monday night was the Scharwenka Piano Concerto. The work was performed by Arthur Hochman with rare skill. Mme. Louise Scherhey, contralto, was the other soloist. An extended criticism of the concert will appear in the next number of THE MUSICAL COURIER.

VOORHIS AND THE KALTENBORNS.—Arthur Voorhis, the pianist, assisted by the Kaltenborn Quartet, will give three concerts at the Jersey City Club on December 17, February 11 and April 15.

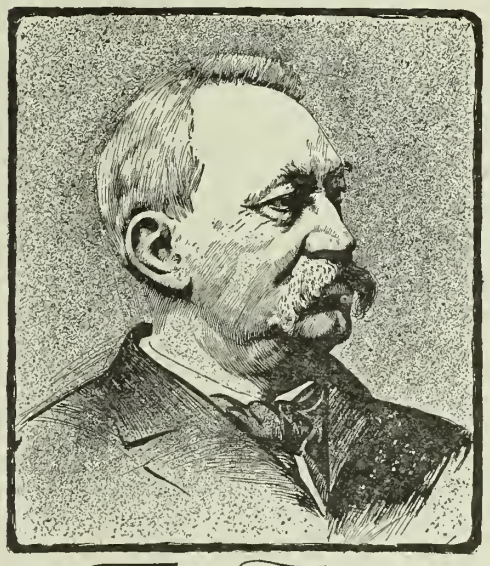
A $68 Library of Musical Knowledge and Sheet Music—16 Volumes—sent complete on receipt of $1 and your acceptance as a Club Member

This one Edition only at HALF PRICE



Theodore Thomas.

This Musical Library is the 1901 edition of Famous Composers and Their Music, edited by Theodore Thomas, John Knowles Paine and Karl Klauser. Musical instructors and the foremost musicians universally recognize it as the best of all musical libraries. It is the standard of the world and over 50,000 sets of the earlier (six volume) edition have been sold at more than double our price per volume. There are sixteen Imperial Octavo volumes measuring about 9 x 12 inches—six of reading matter and illustration, and ten of music. The text volumes contain all you want to know about the history of music itself—the different schools of music, Italian, French, German, and so forth; the complete stories of all the great composers, their private lives and their public careers; clear and full accounts of the special peculiarities of every composer's work, and how each of them differed in essential points from all his fellow-craftsmen, yet made important contributions to the total. In short, they really form a complete encyclopedia of all musical knowledge, not written like an encyclopedia but like simple history or biography.

FAMOUS COMPOSERS AND THEIR MUSIC
6 Encyclopedia Volumes—10 Music Volumes

The entire content of these text volumes consists of articles specially written for this work by such men as Oscar Comettant, Director of the Paris Conservatoire; Edward Dannreuther, the distinguished musical critic of London; the late John Fiske, Philip Hale, Adolphe Jullien, who stands at the very head of the Parisian critics; Dr. Louis Kelterborn, Dr. Philipp Spitta, of Berlin; Henry E. Krehbiel, of New York, and many others equally famous. Each subject has been written about by the one particular person in the whole musical world who is best qualified to deal with it, and the cost to the publisher of all these special articles was enormous.

The 10 Music Volumes contain nearly 1700 pages of sheet music chosen by Theodore Thomas and Karl Klauser. The pieces are neither too easy nor too difficult. Plenty of them can easily be mastered by pupils of a year or two's experience. Yet Paderewski bought five sets of the first edition—one for his own use and four for gifts to his friends.

For Young Musicians this work is invaluable. It does not preach; it is not full of "Dont's"; it does not attempt to teach how to play or sing; it does not try to take the place of a musical instructor. But after one has owned the Library a while, dipped into its reading volumes and wandered through its hundreds of music pages, there grows up insensibly a love for what is really good and an aversion to what is bad in the great world of melody and harmony.

Beautiful Illustrations to the number of over 500 are scattered through the volumes. Many are magnificent color plates of rare and interesting musical instruments, 234 of them are portraits of the great composers, while others are facsimiles of their music manuscripts, views of the towns they lived in, their birthplaces, and notable scenes in their careers.

Half Price { LITTLE PAYMENTS [IF YOU PREFER]

The set consists of sixteen Imperial Octavo volumes, measuring about 9 x 12 inches—almost sheet music size—bound in classic vellum, with rolled gold tops and gold-lettered and decorated backs, and the music volumes will lie open perfectly flat on a music rack, with no bothersome tendency on the part of the leaves to turn over of themselves.

The publisher's price of the set is $68.00. Our club price is just one-half of that, with the Club fee ($1) added. The payments are $1 (Club fee) down and $2 per month for 17 months.

The full Set is sent you when you join the club and pay the first Dollar.

CORSO VENEZIA 65, MILAN, ITALY,
November 16, 1901.

NOW that the famous Italian brigand Musolino has been captured, and every detail of his arrest is being read with the greatest avidity by the public, it seemed quite natural for me to think of other celebrities of his kind, and so was attracted one evening to the Teatro Fossati, where Auber's "Fra Diavolo" was being given. While wanting to hear the bold robber sing, I really went there, I think, to witness the doing of one Beppo by the impresario of the company, Tommaso Barberis, who is well known for his buffo performances, and I was not disappointed.

But, not having seen a hand bill or program, I knew not who would sing the other characters, and was therefore most agreeably surprised to behold a vision of loveliness in the part of Zerlina. Signorina Clotilde Orlandi, a new Zerlina to the rest of the company, was much handicapped in her solo singing by the orchestra's very poor accompaniment; proof of insufficient rehearsal, and which it is to be hoped may go better a second time; yet, in spite of this, the lady, knowing her music thoroughly, sang with considerable ease and abandon.

As Zerlina, Signorina Orlandi looked "as pretty as a picture," eliciting from the gods in the Olympian gallery heights admiring exclamations of "Ah! ah! che bellezza!" which were easily heard in the parquet, and there the verdict found sympathetic echo all around me.

La Orlandi is a beauty of the petite brunette type; very shapely of figure, a bright, cheerful, happy expression of countenance with laughing eyes, and has a well formed head crowned with an abundance of beautiful hair. She certainly looked charmingly natural and most attractive, a much more tempting prize for Fra Diavolo to carry off than "my lady" with all her jewels. Signorina Orlandi, as Zerlina, really looked very pretty and altogether lovable. All her actions upon the stage were graceful and decidedly easy and unaffected; she appeared to be quite at home in her role and accustomed to the environment of the theatre. Her voice is a soprano of excellent timbre, color and quality, with a good range of round, full tones, free from that detestable tremolo so prevalent among Italian singers. Her tone placing (impostazione) is high and forward, causing the ringing and carrying ability of the singer's voice, and producing at times a fullness, a largeness of tone rarely expected of a cantatrice so daintily fashioned, or from a soprano of her kind. The schooling or musical education of Signorina Orlandi is undoubtedly good, and her voice training, I venture to say, deserves and should be pursued to a still higher finish technically. She sings very intelligently and with much expression musically, fully meriting the generous and genuine applause bestowed upon her performance in "Fra Diavolo." Shall gladly welcome an opportunity of hearing Signorina Orlandi sing again.

Signor Tommaso Barberis, the impresario who is engineering this two months season of nightly opera performances at the Fossati Theatre, is more of an artist than a manager of business. As Beppo, the vagabond robber, he was as natural and mirth provoking as when seen among a lot of chatting and laughing friends in the Galleria in the Piazza del Duomo.

Barberis is famous for his make-up and acting of buffo characters. And, as for what he knows about singing he might become, if he wanted to and were not so plain spoken and unbiased in his opinions, as successful a maestro di canto as are some others in Milan.

In "Fra Diavolo" he had a struggling, straggling, but most eloquent wig upon his head, and succeeded in greatly amusing and delighting the audience. His falsetto singing is simply wonderful; he was encored and re-encored, each time varying the embellishments with which he adorned his soprano imitations.

The operas thus far produced at the Fossati, under the management of Signor Barberis, are Marchetti's "Ruy Blas," "Lucia di Lammermoor," "Norma," "Fra Diavolo," "La Favorita" and Petrella's "Ione."

By the way, in conversation one evening with Barberis, that gentleman told me he would be willing and ready to form and engage a company to produce opera in the different cities of the United States—with past and present repertory, complete in every detail—against a fixed, a stipulated sum, per week, month or whole season. He to be the sole artistic manager and responsible for the entire production; the performance and conduct of each and every member of the company, &c. The entire personnel of the organization he would select or secure here in Italy, with the exception of some members of the orchestra and a part of the chorus, which, he thought, could be engaged in New York.

The total expense of such an undertaking and the amount for which he would be willing to embark in the enterprise were extremely modest and moderate—were indeed low beyond belief and my understanding of such ventures.

Tommaso Barberis is known here, not as a presumptuous or venturous impresario, but as a very modest, good natured, honest and deserving fellow—a most unpretending manager-artist.

The new opera, "Chopin," by Giacomo Orefici, has not yet been produced at the Lirico; but it is known that the four acts will be as follows: I., Chopin in Poland, age 17-18, studying music very diligently and with intensity; II., in Paris, youth and love affairs; III., on the isle of Majorca, in a "certosa abbandonata," seeking health; IV., again in Paris—moment of death. All the music is that of Chopin, adapted and arranged.

Orefici, the composer of "Chopin," six years ago wrote "Consuelo," an opera, for the Comunale Theatre at Bologna. His "Il Gladiatore," in one act, was produced three years ago at the Teatro Reale, in Madrid, but owing to the Spanish-American war at that time the opera was not so successful as would otherwise have been the case.

The composer of this new opera is an excellent pianist, and naturally an enthusiastic, passionate lover of Chopin's piano music, which he has now orchestrated and used entirely in the opera.

Chopin's music he is said to hold or consider more exquisite than that of Bach; yet more vigorous than Beethoven; still more dramatic than Weber.

The writer of the libretto, Angiolo Orvieto, is known favorably as a poet, and is the author of "La sposa mistica," "Velo di Maya," and a few other works.

If the poem of Perosi's "Mosè" is said to tend toward the theatrical, the libretto of "Chopin," being theatrical, has a tendency toward the poetic. The one is in four parts, the other in four acts.

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt, the celebrated actress, continues to be as indefatigable as ever, and has just given another proof of her inexhaustible energy by announcing a series of Thursday matinees, commencing this week, in which she will revive the creations that have made her famous.

During the winter, therefore, she will mount "Phedre," with Massenet's music; "La Samaritaine," "L'Aiglon" and "La Princesse Lointaine," all three by Rostand; "Hamlet," "Theodora" and "La Tosca," by Sardou; "La Dame aux Camélias," "Magda," "Lorenzaccio," "Tartuffe" and "Le Médecin Malgré Lui"; "La Ville Morte," by D'Annunzio; and a new comedy, "La Défense du Bonheur," by Garnier.

While visiting Milan the other day on business connected with the forthcoming production of his new play, "Francesca da Rimini," D'Annunzio is said to have confided to friends that he had begun another tragedy, the title being no other than "Nero," and the play to be brought out next autumn—a year hence; the principal interpreters would naturally be la Duse and Zacconi (?).

Antonio Scontrino's music to the D'Annunzio play, "Francesca da Rimini," will be found to bear a considerable part in the performance.

In the overture the themes belonging to the story are duly set forth; while the succeeding entr'actes are entitled respectively, "Cavallcresca," "The Kiss," "The Denunciation" and "Death."

The musical interludes are intended to form a commentary upon the tragedy's action somewhat after the ancient Greek chorus.

His Holiness the Pope, after hearing a report from Monsignor Chapelle on the position of the Catholic Church in the Philippines, expressed the opinion that Christians of all creeds and nationalities ought to aid the Americans in the pacification of the islands.

"Mosè," the new oratorio of Don Lorenzo Perosi, which he terms a vocal symphonic poem, is to be given for the first time to-night (irrevocably, it is announced). The work will be heard at the Salone Perosi, which is the old church of Santa Maria della Pace, now adapted to the purposes of such performances.

The orchestra will number ninety performers; the chorus will have 130 singers, besides a boys' choir of thirty voices. Arturo Toscanini, of the Scala, will be the conductor—the composer on this occasion resisting the temptation to direct his own work. Maestro Perosi will, however, be present. For the text of "Mosè," which is in verse, two Milanese journalists, A. Cameroni and P. Croci, are responsible.

DELMA-HEIDE.

DON PEROSI'S "MOSE."

MILAN, NOVEMBER 17, 1901.

OUR theatrical season may be said to be now almost in full swing, as pretty well all the theatres have begun regular performances; the Dal Verme with the "Tosca," of Puccini; the Lirico with "Sansone e Dalila," Saint-Saëns; the Mansoni with the best prose representations, &c., and the Scala also has officially declared its "cartellone," which, however, has undergone some modification since I wrote you in regard to it some time ago.

As my colleague, Mr. Delma-Heide, will undoubtedly have chronicled in all their fullness the representations which have taken place at the two principal theatres now open for opera, it would be inopportune to weary your readers with anything further on the same subject, which might even differ from those that will have already appeared.

Consequently I will speak of a novelty which especially interests Milan, and perhaps also all Italy as well, naturally, as the whole musical world, viz., the new oratorio "Mosè," by the Maestro Perosi, presented yesterday at the Perosi Hall. The young priest Don Perosi is already known to Americans, thanks to the repeated news published respecting him in THE MUSICAL COURIER.

Less known, however, will probably be the news in regard to this Perosi Hall, which was yesterday "inaugurated" for the second time. When Perosi by his "Resurrection of Lazarus" made his name known in both hemispheres in less time than that yet taken by any genius to reap half the same glory, a cry of joy burst forth from the breasts of uncompromising Catholics, happy and hopeful in having found something, if only an oratorio, by which to make known unto men that they were in existence. It was a revolution, artistically, theatrically and, let one say, politically.

There was a moment in which theatrical managers thrust aside all other authors, both old and new, in order to run after the oratorios of Perosi and give them everywhere, and Ricordi, editor and proprietor also of these, was only too ready to fan the flame of popular enthusiasm, happy in having found a new California or a Transvaal mine to profit by.

Then came the time of the Perosian artists, who knew only how to execute that particular music; churches reduced to theatres, and theatres to churches. Everyone became possessed of this musical fever. Not everyone, however, realized that under this Perosian enthusiasm lay hidden a political party—a flag. It was this enthusiasm that gave birth to the present Perosi Hall! Milan, priding herself on having held at baptism, as it were, this rising Italian genius, could not allow that his music should only be heard in any or every church, and the idea, artfully set afloat, of building a special hall for the purpose met with an admirably hearty response. Great part of the press, although seeing the false step, had not the courage to speak up for fear of being thought ridiculous or perhaps accused of want of patriotism, and so the company was at once formed and the shares immediately subscribed for.

I was one of the, perhaps, very few who, although admitting Perosi's undeniably great merit, yet disapproved of that exaggerated enthusiasm which could not otherwise than cool.

In the Corriere dei Teatri, of March 10, 1900, in an article entitled "Bayreuth in Italia," I wrote among other things as follows:

According to what the best informed papers say, the Perosi Hall may be said to be financially an accomplished fact, and soon also it will be materially so, as the work of adapting the Church of Santa Maria della Pace is being pushed forward with all alacrity. The dream of the young Maestro Perosi is therefore about to be realized, thanks to the activity of Cav. Cabella and the promptitude of the subscribers. We shall have therefore by next May a Bayreuth also in Italy; with this difference, however, that it will be ecclesiastical instead of being theatrical!

* * * * * * * * *

But the strange part of the business begins with their intention of giving only Perosian sacred music in the new hall, and with the emission of shares which, to the mind of the holders, should pay a dividend.

No one questions Perosi's high musical genius, the marvelous facility with which he writes, his inexhaustible vein of melody; but that these gifts justify the building of a hall expressly for a composer of four oratorios seems to me an exaggeration. It is true that Perosi promises much, and why should he not? He may keep his promise and write several others. He may set to music perhaps the whole history of both the Old and the New Testament, but the fact remains that as yet he has not done it.

Setting aside the rather presumptuous idea of founding a temple of art, and dedicating it to one who has no other merit than that of having written a few oratorios and some messe, let us see what is being prepared for the public with this new temple of sacred art. The principal attraction will be the "premières" of such new oratorios as the Maestro Perosi may write expressly for his new hall. This, indeed, should be so great as to draw not only the Milanese public, but that also of other Italian cities, and of foreign cities besides. I do not know, and have no wish to discuss, what Perosi may be preparing, but we may form some idea of the interest a new work of his may arouse, if we look at the relatively small concourse of visitors to his "Natale del Redentore" at Como, for which there were such great expectations, and this at a time when foreigners were already attracted to Como by the Exhibition. The press wrote in terms of sincere praise—Perosi had progressed, his new work was more ponderated, and ever so many other pretty things—but the public did not respond very fully to the invitation. The "Natale del Redentore" has remained since then almost * * * in the cradle; perhaps with the idea of not making it too cheap, but anyhow, the greater part of the public has, you may say, forgotten it.

The Perosi Hall will certainly have, we are assured, the monopoly of the new works of the young composer. We are assured? But who will take the trouble to come as far as Milan to hear an oratorio, when they can enjoy one, perhaps better executed, in their own country without any such trouble? Besides, it will be necessary to rely almost entirely on the Italian public, because it is improbable that foreigners will come as far as here for the express purpose of hearing an oratorio of Perosi, accustomed as they are to the grand performances of Händel, Bach and Mendelssohn; and, is it likely that the Italians, after a surfeit of sacred music—and probably Perosi's—will come journeying to Milan in order to be present at a concert?

And then, again, concerts and sacred music at Milan! One must be very ignorant of Milan, or very much deluded by the momentary enthusiasm for Perosi to believe in any such thing. Ask the management at the Scala what it was that led to their enormous deficit last season. And to think that they, too, should have sought to diminish their then small deficit by giving concerts!

But the execution of oratorios in the Perosi Hall, they say, will be such as would not be possible in any other city. But why? The orchestra and chorus will be always the same, because they will arrange to salary them, only weakening them thereby. And the salaries—where are they to come from? From the takings of just a few concerts a year? No! one must be as ingenuous as some of the shareholders who subscribed with such Christian ardor, strong in their faith that by the time the Perosi Hall would be opened the public belief would have advanced a good century.

And I was a prophet long before the time! Before the hall had begun to serve its purpose came the news of a really disastrous reception given to Perosi in Germany, whither he had been led by his party in the hope of gaining fresh laurels. This was followed almost immediately by a similarly hostile reception in France and in England, when here, too, they opened their eyes, and the Perosi Hall, which was to be the clou of Milan, was found to be simply a mistake.

In fact, at the end of the first series of concerts, the company found themselves out of pocket by an amount exceeding their paid up capital, but the shareholders, good devout Christians, contented themselves with the triumph of their faith in lieu of dividend!

Now the new Perosi Hall, although still retaining the name of the maestro, is an entirely different thing to what it was before; in the first place it is no longer a church, but a real and proper concert hall, of which Milan was feeling the want, and besides this it will be available, no longer for Perosi's music alone, but for any sort of concert that anyone may wish to give.

The restoration and adaptation, which have been a work of patient and intelligent study, unite in admirable harmony a scrupulous reproduction of the ancient and venerable temple with a strict practical consideration of the new use to which it is to be put. As the eye wanders round the ample hall objects of extreme artistic value meet its view: a beautiful fresco of Bernardino Luini, which decorates one of the walls; the wrought iron lamps, reproduced from examples of that same period; the loggia, with the columns that formed part of the ancient Coperto dei Figini; all its church-like appearance has disappeared, a new apse has been constructed and a spacious flight of raised steps for the chorus, a convenient orchestra placed below the level of the hall pavement; all the services of buffet, cloak room, medical assistance, heating, illumination, &c., excellently provided for—in short, a real concert hall, which will compare favorably with the best in Europe.

Anyhow, the inauguration of yesterday took place with the quite new oratorio of Perosi entitled, as before said, "Mosè."

The poem, which is divided into a prologue and three parts, is the work of two esteemed colleagues, Agostino Cameroni, music critic of the Lega Lombarda, and Pietro Croci, London correspondent of the Corriere della Sera.

They have evidently not sought to create a strictly literary work, a biblical poem, but simply to put before the maestro the plot for a musical work of notable proportions, and of a character no longer strictly sacred, such as were the first oratorios, but a mixture of the mystic and the heroic in a free and frank dramatic form without being theatrical. Therefore their care has been to furnish a rapid succession of pictures of the life of Moses, comprising also that of the Hebrew people and their liberation from the yoke of the Pharaohs.

The prologue, taken from the eleventh to the twenty-fifth verses of the Second Chapter of Exodus, tells of Moses among the Midian shepherds. It is evening; Reuel is before his tent; from afar are heard the songs of the shepherds and of the women who are tending their flocks. But suddenly Reuel sees his daughters hastening to him; they tell how the shepherds came and drove them away when they were drawing water, and how they were delivered out of the hands of the shepherds by a stranger—Moses—who at that moment approaches; Reuel calls him that he may eat bread, but Moses, declaring himself only defender of the oppressed, sighs and remains absorbed in meditation; Zipporah timidly questions him, and Moses tells of the bondage of his people, his flight, his need of peace; and peace Zipporah offers him in her home, whereat Moses, overcome and abandoning himself to the sweet vision of happiness opened up to him, accompanies Reuel into his tent.

It is an Oriental afternoon; we are among the tents of Reuel, at the foot of the mountain of God, Horeb. Moses is returned with the caravan from the distant oases, to which he had driven his father-in-law's flocks. His tale is interrupted by shepherds, who relate how the bush burned with fire on Mount Horeb and yet was not consumed. Moses runs to see the miracle, and the voice of God called unto him out of the midst of the bush, and said: "Moses, Moses!" And he said: "Here am I."

To the doubts of Moses, Jehovah promises to smite Egypt with all His wonders, so that the Hebrews shall be allowed to go.

Moses communicates to Zipporah the command of Jehovah and departs; but Zipporah determines to follow him with her children. Reuel and the others, blessing them, salute the parting Elect.

The fifth and twelfth chapters of Exodus furnish the argument for the second part, entitled "The Exodus." Moses tells Pharaoh the command of God; the king laughs at him, while the courtiers urge him to acts of severity; Aaron threatens him with the anger of God, and, with Moses, prophesies the plagues; but still Pharaoh does not relent.

And here in a special intermezzo the orchestra portrays the desolation of Egypt under the afflictions poured on them by Jehovah, while the people raise heartrending cries. With the termination of the interlude the dialogue is renewed.

It is the night of the Passover before the Exodus. In the land of Goshen a family is gathered together, as Moses commanded, to partake of the lamb. The song of the head of the family alternates with the chorus of the children, which becomes afterward confused with that of the Egyptian people, who in the streets are lamenting the loss of their first born.

The last part is the crossing of the Red Sea. We are in the Israelite camp before Baal-zephon, between the desert and the sea. It is early morn. The people are sleeping in their tents. Moses is contemplating the rising sun, thinking of the peace in the land of Midian, when from afar arises the din of the Egyptians, who are advancing. In a subdued chorus they are whispering their design: to fall on the Israelites and destroy them. But the voice of Jehovah arouses Moses and commands him to stretch out his hand over the waters. The noise of the advancing Egyptians increases, and the people of God awake, upbraiding Moses. He encourages them; stretches out his hand over the waters and divides them, and the people pass over in safety. The Egyptians arriving, stand astounded on the shore; but Pharaoh orders the advance. The army rushes forward and is swallowed up by the falling walls of returning waters. Meantime, from the opposite shore, which the children of Israel have reached, Mary, sister of Aaron, chants the final hymn to the Omnipotent.

The tone of the poem is lofty, strong, incisive, and its pleasing variety of verse, rhythm and strophe gives the composer opportunity for investing his symphonic and vocal comments with ever new features.

And the music?

First of all we must remember one quality or defect (according to the different opinions) of the oratorios already written by the Maestro Perosi, and that is, that they had rather too dramatic a flavor, almost theatrical, and consequently not at all adapted to the scholastic form of oratorio. Now the subject is changed; it is not an opera in its true sense, but something very near it; the libretto would admit perfectly well of being staged. It is clear, therefore, that Perosi would have progressed, even remaining faithful to his old style. And, in fact, he has not changed much. The melody is richly transfused with artistic sentiment and most loving passion. The orchestral part, on the other hand, is greatly improved; it is much more accurate, more studied, with descriptive intention after the manner of Wagner—indeed, the school, style and system of this great master are apparent And in certain brani of his new "Mosè" Perosi has orchestrally revealed real and undeniable power of extraordinary richness. Perhaps, by keeping to his new path, and studying carefully what he produces before giving it to the public, he may come back to the point to which, on a not too solid basis, his party had raised him.

It is almost superfluous to say that the audience on this first night was composed of the best of Milan; that the concourse of people was extraordinarily large; that the applause was unstinted, and that the artists and the orchestra, led by Toscanini, conductor of the Scala, gave a rendering throughout that may justly be described as a marvel.

ELIZABETH HAZARD'S MUSICALE.

MRS. ELIZABETH HAZARD is planning to give a series of musicales in the assembly room of Ardsley Hall, where the singer herself occupies one of the handsomest apartments. During the autumn Mrs. Hazard added a number of cycles to her repertory, and her singing, particularly of the lieder by Schumann, Schubert and Cornelius, shows marked artistic advancement. This, however, does not mean that she is neglecting the English ballads and songs by budding American composers. Mrs. Hazard has studied with the best teachers in the country, but she is an artist who is not content with past achievements, but works right on, mindful of the future. At several of the musicales at which Mrs. Hazard sang this season she was accompanied on the harp by Charles Schuetze, whom Mr. Pauer has engaged to take Cheshire's place at the Philharmonic concerts. Assisted by Mr. Schuetze, Mrs. Hazard has several dates to fill after the New Year. Her own musicales will be given between January 1 and Lent. Mrs. Hazard's voice, a pure lyric soprano, is admirably suited to the unique character of the recitals with harp accompaniments. That form of accompanying reveals the purity of a voice, and Mrs. Hazard has again and again illustrated that fact.

CLIFFORD ALEXANDER WILEY.—Clifford Alexander Wiley, the baritone singer, who recently returned from Europe, will sing here this winter. Mr. Wiley is a singer who has received many favorable criticisms. We add a few:

I heard a baritone the other day who will create something of a sensation, I believe, when he begins to be heard. He is Clifford Alexander Wiley, from New York. Mr. Wiley's voice is beautifully cultivated; he has tenderness, dramatic force and a beautiful method. He is not afflicted with any airs or mannerisms, and his voice seems never to tire. It is magnetic.—Washington Capital.

Mr. Wiley is the possessor of a baritone voice of beautiful quality, which has been cultivated to a high degree of excellence.—Baltimore News.

While every one of the participants acquitted themselves in a most creditable manner, particular mention must be made of Clifford Alexander Wiley, the famous baritone, whose rendition of Gounod's "Ever Bravest Hearts" was the masterwork of the evening.—Alexandria, Va., Gazette, January 24, 1900.

During the World's Fair in Paris, Mr. Wiley sang with success at several important functions. Later he sang with equal success in London. Since his return to this country. Mr. Wiley has sung at concerts in New England with other leading artists.

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN.

Hochman Plays the Scharwenka Concerto.

IT was eight years ago at a musicale given in the ballroom of the Hotel St. George in which the writer was interested that a gifted boy pianist played. The boy was very modest, and his parents, who came over to Brooklyn from their New York home, were equally retiring. The boy's Brooklyn début on this informal occasion was without the fuss that usually accompanies the first appearance of a prodigy. It was, however, in the performance of a group of short pieces that the boy stirred his hearers. Subsequently the young pianist played at a Seidl concert at the Academy of Music. Then no more was heard of the remarkable boy until this winter, when he returned a young man, after a long sojourn in Berlin. His wise parents put an end to the "prodigy business" in time, and their son, Arthur Hochman, now is entitled to enroll his name among the pianists of the day whom we describe as great. Mr. Hochman, a worthy pupil of Xaver Scharwenka, Eugen d'Albert and Dr. Ernst Jedliczka, played at the concert of the Brooklyn Saengerbund the third piano concerto by his former master. The concert was given at the Academy of Music, December 9, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Mrs. Louise Scherhey, contralto, was the other soloist. There was an orchestra of forty musicians, and Louis Koemmenich, the regular conductor of the Saengerbund, conducted the concert. Now, these are the facts. Regarding the program, there was no end of favorable comment.

Of the six novelties heard at the concert, the most important was the Scharwenka Concerto. When this composer published his first piano Concerto in B flat minor the work found great favor, and musicians expected even greater achievements in the future, but the expectations were somewhat disappointed in the second concerto, the one in C, which technically did not prove nearly so strong a work as No. 1. No. 3, in C sharp minor, the one which Hochman played, is a most harmonious work. The three movements are built upon the same thematic material, and are treated with skill. The orchestration is modern and sonorous. The piano is brilliant, even rhapsodical, and is reminiscent of Chopin, Schumann and Liszt. Three years ago, at Steinway Hall, New York, the composer, with a local pianist playing the orchestral part at a second piano, gave a private performance of the work before several critics and guests.

At the Brooklyn concert young Hochman gave a wonderful performance of his former master's work. If it is true that music begins where technic ends, then young Hochman may be proclaimed an artist of supreme attainments. A most beautiful touch and technic that seems fully equal to all demands characterize his playing. But there is something more than touch and technic in his playing. He is an artist endowed with the talents that come from spheres unknown to most men. Although the program was very long, young Hochman was recalled many times, and finally added an extra number, the Tschaikowsky Berceuse, and he played it in a way that compelled the tears to flow.

Madame Scherhey sang to orchestral accompaniment the Penelope aria from Bruch's "Odysseus," and her sympathetic voice, taste, intelligence and convincing vocal style established her as an artist. Her success was all the more remarkable because there were no advance "puffs" about what she could do, and, being recommended by Mr. Koemmenich, she was spared the foolish "trials" at Association Hall. A singer like Mrs. Scherhey should be heard oftener in Brooklyn, and elsewhere for that matter. Good contraltos are rare. Later in the evening Mrs. Scherhey sang two songs. "O, lass dich Halten!" by Jensen, and "Mignon," by d'Hardelot. The piano accompaniments were artistically played by Alexander Rihm. Both in the piano concerto and in the Bruch aria the orchestra, conducted by Mr. Koemmenich, did better than most of the orchestras which for the want of a better word are described as "scratch."

The Maennerchor of the Saengerbund sang better in the last half of the concert than in the opening numbers. Rheinberger's "Hunting Song," poem by Sir Walter Scott, translated into uncommonly good German, was the first choral number. The German composers knew their Shakespeare, Scott and other poets of Great Britain as well as they did those of the Fatherland. Schubert especially showed that he was fond of the "foreign" poets. His "Hark, Hark, the Lark!" is a setting to Shakespeare, and Scott wrote the verses for the "Ave Maria." One of the finely dramatic numbers was the singing of Hagar's "Todtenvolk" (Spectres of Tydal), by the male chorus. "An Hour Ere Break of Day," by Thuille, the Munich composer; "Old Black Joe," arranged by Van der Stucken, and sung in English, and "Elfin Whisp'rings in the Forest," by Bünte, were beautifully sung by the men. Here it was plain to see the work of a conductor like Koemmenich. The Ladies' Chorus sang Sucher's setting of Heine's "Visions," and this writer never heard the Saengerbund Ladies' Chorus sing so well. Mr. Koemmenich was proud of the young women, and he had a right to be. Unfortunately, much cannot be said for the orchestral numbers, an overture to d'Albert's musical comedy, "The Departure," and Smetana's symphonic poem, "From Bohemian Fields and Forests."

Tuesday night, December 10, there were many concerts in Brooklyn, and the word many is used here without exaggeration. By dint of running and the trolley the writer managed to hear parts of three of the concerts. First came the concert of the Brooklyn Apollo Club, at the Academy of Music, where Miss Estelle Liebling, soprano, and Miss Augusta Cottlow, pianist, made their first Brooklyn appearance since the artists returned from Europe. Miss Liebling proved a winsome young woman with a rarely beautiful voice. It seems rather unnecessary to exploit her as a coloratura singer. She does sing florid music beautifully, but she has a rich, medium register, and with further development she is going to have noble chest tones, and that means that some day she is going to be a dramatic soprano. The young artist must be forgiven for singing that wearisome air, "Thou Charming Bird," from David's "La Perle du Brésil." The concerts of the Apollo Club are social rather than musical affairs. Years ago the artistic aims were higher. When Dudley Buck was in his prime the program at each concert contained at least one pièce de résistance. But musically the club has no future. There may be some people who will resent this statement, but, if you please, it was an active member of the club and not the writer who separated the "sheep from the goats" in declaring that the concerts are just social assemblies and nothing more. If any persons do resent this, they will be quite justified. The writer, who lived in Brooklyn over ten years, knows that the best people in the borough are musical, and this applies especially to the women of Brooklyn. There is no use hiding facts, but the Apollo concerts are not what they were socially. As Dr. Holmes would put it, "The two-story people are having their innings now," and there is a lot of "two story" people in Brooklyn.

Since last season there have been many changes in the personnel of the active membership. Whether on account of the Brooklyn climate or to Mr. Brewer, as the acting conductor, the leading tenors and bassos have withdrawn, and in numerous cases their places have not been filled. Mr. Brewer, however, proved equal to the emergency by having the club sing the most trivial songs—songs that the same number of men anywhere might have sung as well. But to return again to the soloists, Miss Liebling was recalled enthusiastically after her "bird" solo, and as an encore sang Liza Lehmann's "You and I." Her father, Max Liebling, played her accompaniments in that musicianly style for which he is noted. After the intermission Miss Liebling sang again "Bergerette," an eighteenth century song; "At Parting," by Rogers, and "The Nightingale," by Alabieff. Miss Cottlow opened the second part of the concert with three piano soli, the Brahms Rhapsodie in B minor, Liszt's "Waldesrauchen" and "Marche Militaire," Schubert-Liszt. Her playing proved the musical feature of the concert. She is a rarely gifted young woman, and in her playing reveals a fine balance of the emotional with the intellectual. When Miss Cottlow finished the military march, the writer was obliged to leave, but later we heard that the pianist was compelled to respond with another solo. Miss Bertha Bucklin, who has played often in Brooklyn, was the other soloist. The numbers sung by the club were "Serenade to Juanita," Jouberti, arranged by Max Spicker; "On the Rhine," by Beschnitt; "Within a Mile of Edinboro Town," arranged by Homer Bartlett; "The Fir Tree and the Palm," by Sokolow; "The Folksong," by Edward Kremser, and "The Viking's Farewell," by John H. Knowles. Hugh Elmer Williams, a basso with a good voice, sang the incidental solo to "On the Rhine," and Miss Liebling sang the solo to the Scotch melody, "Within a Mile of Edinboro Town," and again astonished the audience with her high notes. Herbert S. Sammond played excellent accompaniments.

Assisted by Mme. Berta Grosse-Thomason, pianist, the Venth-Kronold String Quartet gave their second concert at Wissner Hall last Tuesday night, and the writer reached the hall in time to hear the Rheinberger Quintet in C major, for piano and strings. The performance by the five artists was a most musical one, and, moreover, a musical audience applauded them at the close. The writer regretted very much missing Mr. Venth's Sonata, for violin and piano, which was played earlier in the evening by the composer and Madame Thomason. One who did hear declares it is very poetic, and yet withal is healthful and modern in construction. Grieg's Quartet in G minor completed the program for the evening offered by Messrs Venth and Kronold.

Sometimes it happens that late concerts have their advantages. The meetings of the Tonkünstler Society, held at the Argyle, begin late, and therefore the writer on last Tuesday night arrived in time to hear another quintet, the Brahms, in F minor, played by Alexander Lambert, piano; Ludwig Marum, first violin; David Mannes, second violin; Jacob Altschuler, viola, and Leo Schulz, 'cello. The names of the artist bespeak the quality of the performance. At the close the artists were greeted with prolonged applause. A quartet by Louis V. Saar was played as the first number of the meeting by Messrs. Mannes, Marum, Altschuler and Schulz, and while the writer did not hear, one who did proclaims it one of Mr. Saar's strongest compositions. Miss Dorothy Moller, contralto, sang songs by Franz and Cornelius, accompanied at the piano by Mrs. Florence Brown Sheppard, and this completed the interesting program presented by the Tonkünstler.

Mrs. Minne Humphryes, the soprano soloist of the Greenwood Baptist Church, gave a concert also on last Tuesday night at the church in aid of the Building Fund. She was assisted by Miss Henriette Weber, pianist; McCall Lanham, baritone, and Charles Russell, 'cellist. As a rule, church concerts do not attract musical audiences, but the people who assembled to hear Mrs. Humphryes and the other artists proved an exception to the rule. The character of the program was enough to convince that artists and not amateurs were to appear. The compositions played and sung follow:

Fruhlingsrauschen ..... Sinding
Marche Grotesque ..... Sinding
Miss Henriette Weber.
Aria, Qui la Voce, I Puritani ..... Bellini
Mrs. Minne Humphryes.
Nina ..... Pergolesi
Caprice Slav ..... P. Scharwenka
Charles Russell.
Arioso, Benvenuto ..... Eugene Diaz
McCall Lanham.
Abendlied ..... Schumann
Tarantelle ..... Popper
Mr. Russell.
Die Soldatenbraut ..... Schumann
Dein ist Mein Herz ..... Schubert
Mrs. Humphryes.
Valse Caprice ..... Rubinstein
Miss Weber.
Thou'rt Like Unto a Flower ..... Ludwig
Because She Kissed It ..... Gaynor
Mighty Lak' a Rose ..... Nevin
Mr. Lanham.
Violets ..... Ellen Wright
Come to Me, Sweetheart ..... J. C. Bartlett
Mrs. Humphryes.

Mrs. Humphryes' beautifully trained voice made the very most of the Bellini aria, and in the lieder of Schumann and Schubert she evinced still greater possibilities. As one of the professional pupils of Miss Caroline Montefiore, Mrs. Humphryes is making fine progress, both as a singer and a teacher. Both as a soloist and as an accompanist Miss Weber is a delightful artist, and it was evident that the Greenwood audience heard her with pleasure. Mr. Lanham is an artist who seems altogether modest. His voice and style should bring him more prominently before the public. Mr. Russell, the 'cellist, also proved an agreeable surprise at the concert. He is a thorough musician, drawing from his instrument a rich, full tone, and his legato playing is particularly fine.

The Chaminade Club and the Midwood Club also gave concerts last Tuesday night. The concert at the Midwood Club was for the benefit of St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church, Flatbush. The same evening, Mrs. Lucie Boice Wood, soprano, assisted Mrs. Stuart Close at a musicale which the latter gave at her home, 209 Hancock street. Mrs. Close is a professional pupil of Dr. Henry G. Hanchett, and on the night of her musicale she played a Fantaisie by Saran; "Woodlawn Sketches," by MacDowell, and Liszt's transcription of the "Liebestod."

As the program of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last Friday night is almost the same as that performed in Manhattan Saturday afternoon, there is no need here of extended criticism. Josef Hofmann played the same concerto at both concerts, the Chopin in E minor. The orchestra played Mozart's C major Symphony and the new overture, "In London Town," by Edward Elgar. The review of the Manhattan concert will be found on another page of this issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER.

Last evening (Tuesday) the Handley Musical Society gave a public rehearsal at Crosby Hall.

To-night (Wednesday) at Association Hall, George Riddle will read Milton's "Comas," and the original music by Henry Lawes will be played on old-time instruments. Arthur Claassen, the musical director of the evening, will assist at the spinet, and the stringed instruments, to be led by Carl Venth, will be tuned down one-third and otherwise "doctored" to resemble the instruments of former centuries.

The pupils of Alexander Rihm and Henry Schradieck will give their second joint recital to-night at Wissner Hall.

The Kaltenborn String Quartet will give a concert to-night at the Bay Ridge Presbyterian Church. The series of concerts Sunday afternoons, at the Crescent Athletic Club on Clinton street, began last Sunday.

To-morrow evening (Thursday) "The Messiah" will be sung at the Academy of Music by the Brooklyn Oratorio Society. Four fine soloists are announced, Miss Estelle Liebling, Mrs. Marian van Duyn, Ellison van Hoose and Whitney Tew. The oratorio will be presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. Walter Henry Hall will conduct. The program of the Christmas concert by the Institute was published last week. The artists to appear at this Saturday next in Association Hall are Mrs Katharine Fisk, Gwilym Miles and Avice Boxall.

Friday evening, December 27, Mme. Schumann-Heink and Emil Fischer will give the recital postponed from October 17.

THE RISE OF THE WESTERN CHURCH SINGER.—Year by year the displacement in church choirs of long standing favorites, and the introduction of new Western singers into their places, is becoming more apparent. Their fresh young voices, together with marked ability for application and hard work, is slowly accomplishing the inevitable end. What elixir the Western air breathes on the native born—infusing both vigor and the determined application to labor of study—is a mystery yet to be solved. But it is becoming more and more evident that in the coming spring, when, as Mr. Fellows, of the Townsend H. Fellows Choir Exchange, said in a recent interview, all indications point to a most remarkable coincidence of purpose among musical committees, to secure entirely new choirs for the year beginning next May. It becomes increasingly apparent that the coveted posts will many of them be filled by the young Western singers, who possess all the requisites—voice, temperament and repertory.

DRESDEN, FRANKLINSTRASSE 20,
December 1, 1901.

RICHARD STRAUSS, whose musicianship has revealed itself in his symphonic dictions and songs, was given a first hearing here November 21, as an operatic composer of a one act work entitled "Feuersnoth." The composer calls it "a Sing-gedicht" (a song poem), though it has but little in common with this title, for it is, truly speaking, musical philosophy—"overmusic"—altogether an immensely interesting creation of demoniacal virtuosity, a stunning proof of the composer's contrapuntal genius, his orchestration, his abnormal harmonization and his brilliant coloring.

Charged with sardonic humor, free and large in its patterns, it is perhaps the biggest music, not dramatic but symphonic, penned of late in the form of opera, which in Von Schuch found a congenial interpreter. His grasp, his intelligence and his spirited conducting elated the listeners, even those unable to fathom the depth of the composition, to the heights of the author's lofty fantasies and feelings, which later, by the by, are always strictly controlled by intelligence and thought.

If one does not believe in Richard Strauss' impulse nor in his sentiment, one has an unshakable belief in his brains, his broad mind, his wit and his "rabbiates Können," as one of our critics had it. "Feuersnoth" should be called a subjective epic, a rhapsody on love's old story and all the fuss of it.

The scenes are laid in Munich in the time of fabulous antiquity, "fabelhafter Unzeit," which in German has a double meaning, covering a multitude of anachronisms, such as are actually contained in Wolzogen's libretto. As for the latter, so much has been written against it, that I, truth to tell, expected it to be worse. I should therefore state here that whoever is able to digest the second act of "Tristan," or the plain language of Shakespeare as used in his plays, will not feel offended by Strauss-Wolzogen's distinct mode of expressing things with their proper names. To me the all encompassing, beautiful, spiritual idea of the diction, that of love's triumph (without love, nothing but darkness), stood out too prominently to lose itself in petty criticism of the antiquated language of the book, such as is probably used in fabulous antiquity.

The title "Feuersnoth" is hard to translate; "want of fire"? or "distress caused by want of fire"? as you like.

The tale is founded on an old Netherlandish myth, according to which a maiden once upon a time insulted her lover so severely that he in his turn, as a sorcerer, took revenge upon her by conjuring absolute darkness over the town in which she lived, no fire burning there anywhere. This darkness, causing great distress, lasted until the moment when the maiden, full of repentence, opened the door to her lover to enjoy love's happiness and he united with her. In this very hour the extinguished fires suddenly glowed anew, and light, comfort and luck came back again to the distressed inhabitants of the town. Musically this is the climax of the opera, worked up in a dazzling fashion, the soaring grandeur of which recalls the most glorious parts of the author's "Zarathustra" music.

That Strauss has studied his Wagner to good account nobody will deny. Though he has not, however, been able to impregnate his "Feuersnoth" with equal dramatic vitality as his great namesake, Richard (of Bayreuth), and though it contains some painfully long monologues and symphonic interludes, the work will not glide unnoticed down the stream of oblivion. Who knows, perhaps motifs from it will be added some day to the chapter, "the hero and his works," from the composer's "Heldenleben" score, to live there for longer time to come than on the stage, for popular Strauss' "Feuersnoth" is not. It is caviar to the people, and it remains to be seen how long it will hold the boards.

The performance under von Schuch's conductorship was beautiful and artistic in every detail. Tributes of thanks were paid to Count Seebach for having taken the initiative in the production of this remarkable work. The orchestra was marvelous, the choruses—particularly those of the children—likewise. Of the vocal numbers Kunrad (Scheidemantel) and Diemut's (Fräulein Krull) love duet, their monologues (very long!) and the terzett of Diemut's playmates are beautiful. The leading roles could hardly find better interpreters than they did in Scheidemantel and Krull, the minor parts being equally well sung by Nast, von Chavanne, Staudigl, Schäfer, Erl, Wachter, Pelter, &c. The artists, the composer, the librettist, the stage manager (Herr Moris) and von Schuch were called at least a dozen times at the conclusion. The house was crowded. The King and the Queen attended.

The evening was brought to a close with a revival of the ballet, "Coppelia," by Delibes, artistically conducted by Dr. Rabl. Fräulein Zanini appeared as a guest in the solo part.

Needless to say, the second symphony concert by the Royal Orchestra was an equally enjoyable occurrence as the preceding first recital some weeks ago. Alberto Geloso, the Parisian violinist, as soloist, captivated the audience by the beauty of his tone production, the fire and temperament of his execution. He is a sterling virtuoso. Saint-Saëns' Concerto, a paraphrase on an Arabic theme, by Lenormand, and a Habanera of his own were his numbers. The novelty of the evening was an orchestral Legend by Jean Sibelius, of Finland, "The Swan of Tuonela," which last summer at the Heidelberg Tonkünstler meeting—when produced under the composer's own baton—was very favorably criticised by Mr. Floersheim in the columns of this paper. The proof given here of the composer's quite remarkable talent is originally a part from a Symphonic Diction in four movements, called "Lemminkäinen," the subject being an episode from "Kalewala," treating of the fate and the adventures of Lemminkäinen, the Achilleus of the Finnish mythology. The parts of the symphony, produced first in Helsingfors some years ago, are entitled: (1) Lemminkäinen and the maidens; (2) His stay in Tuonela; (3) Tuonela's swan; (4) Lemminkäinen fares homeward. Tuonela, according to the myths, is the realm of death, surrounded by a broad river of black, turbulent water upon which a swan swims about singing in lonesome majesty solemn and melancholy tunes. Those interested in the subject will find it in cantos 26 to 31 of "Kalewala," the national epos of the Finns.

Cut out (like as is this program) from the frame of the composition in its entirety, the beautiful musical legend of the swan cannot, of course, impress the hearers in equal degree as when heard contrasted by the preceding and the adjoining movements. Nevertheless, even in this shape it does not fail to call attention to Sibelius' strong creative powers, his bent being the deep, melancholy style, expressing the unutterable, intense, passionate plaint such as is characteristic of his nation. As to form, content, orchestration and harmonization the composition is original. Divided violins form the background for the principal theme, played on the English horn. It is a sad tune running through the whole movement, the climax of which is beautifully worked up, until finally the song ceases, ending gradually in a fleeting, evanescent pianissimo of a rare and desolate effect.

Among the hearers there certainly was none who did not deeply regret that the items of this program were not conducted by Schuch. Herr Hagen took his place. Borodin's "Steppenskizze" followed. It is a most interesting composition, which (like Sibelius'), sad to say, was too short to make the effect effective when heard as a part of the work to which it belongs. Both compositions were warmly received.

HANCHETT.—Dr. Henry G. Hanchett has planned his season so as to allow of a maximum of activity, giving attention in turn to the interests with which his name has become associated. He has already played fourteen recitals or concerts since the opening of the season in October, all of them in this city. Of these the most important was his first series before the Brooklyn Institute. Although he has now given ninety-seven recitals before this one body in seven consecutive years, his audiences at his latest series have been much the largest in the entire history of his courses. From the beginning he has steadfastly adhered to the one purpose of making the thought of the composer and the true value of his writing apparent to the audience. He has treated his hearers as students and has tried to teach them something that should be of permanent educational value. A similar aim, but worked out on somewhat different lines, may be discovered in his recitals before the New York city Board of Education, which now number up to thirty-four. It is surely noteworthy that an artist can make a record of such extensive courses in this metropolis with constantly growing audiences.

Dr. Hanchett now begins his work at a distance from the city, but he has so arranged it as to interfere as little as possible with his private teaching. After playing before the Pennsylvania State Music Teachers' Association and at Wilson College in the same State, he goes West to Chicago and Galesburg, Ill., and South as far as New Orleans, resuming his recitals in this city and vicinity March 1.

Dr. Hanchett announces an interpretation and analysis class, which he is to conduct in his studio in this city for advanced students and young artists (pupils of any teacher), beginning in January and meeting twice a month. This class will study the interpretation of standard and classical works for the piano, and the best practical means of expressing their significance, the playing being chiefly that of the members of the class. The class is now organizing.

KUBELIK THIS AFTERNOON.—Jan Kubelik, the violinist, will give his second recital this afternoon in Carnegie Hall, assisted by Mrs. Jessie Shay, pianist, and Rudolf Friml, accompanist. Here is the program:

An Overture by Mozart Heard in Paris for the First Time!

AN unpublished work by Mozart heard for the first time surely merits attention. This is what is said to have happened at the first concert of the season given at the Paris Conservatory last Sunday. In going through a quantity of manuscript music, G. Marby, the conductor of the Conservatory concerts, discovered a number of orchestral parts of the eighteenth century covered with dust, which seemed to have accumulated since the founding of the institution. Some of these parts bore the following inscription in French:

"Overture for grand orchestra, by Mozart, Paris. Printed and published by the Conservatory Press, 152 Faubourg Poissonière." No score was found, but from the orchestral parts, and which apparently had never been used, Mr. Marby was enabled to reconstruct one. It is perfectly true that this overture is quite unknown. It forms no introduction to any of Mozart's operas, and does not appear on the published list of any of his works, symphonies, serenades or divertissements. The style of the work is distinctly Mozart's. It begins by a short solo for the oboe andante, followed by an Allegro Spirituoso, the principal movement of the overture.

Tierrot, the French critic, in speaking of the authenticity of this work, says: "It is to be noticed that this composition was published at the Conservatory Press, which, at that period, under the control of the institution, brought out many didactic and artistic works of the most serious character. But how came this overture to have rested so long in the library of the Paris Conservatory and to be quite unknown to the German publishers? It must be remembered that Mozart was in Paris in 1778. The future composer of 'Don Giovanni' came to the capital of France to seek his fortune at the very worst moment for him, as it was the very year when the dispute between the Gluckists and the Piccinists was at its height, and attracted the attention of musical amateurs to the exclusion of the claims of any other composer. Mozart had asked for an opera libretto, but as this was not furnished immediately, he occupied himself with composition for concerts. On October 3, 1778, in writing to his father, he says: 'Le Gros, director of the Concerts Spirituels, has bought from me the two overtures (symphonies), and the Concertante Symphony.' Now it is one of these two overtures (the other one having been rewritten and published in Germany) that has just been brought to light." The style is Mozart's, but tempered a little by the French school, and the fact that it was written for a French public; the orchestration is that of Mozart's other works written for grand orchestra, and so a work presumably composed by this illustrious composer has been heard perhaps for the first time in Paris after a lapse of 123 years. Better late than never!

The first concert given by the new Philharmonic Society was a great success. The Rosé Quartet, of Vienna, appeared for the first time in Paris, and made a most favorable impression. The program was very long—three quartets, in this order: Haydn, Brahms and Beethoven, with songs by Liszt, Schumann and Schubert, sung by Mme. Félia Litvinne, some in French and others in German. I cannot tell why. These were accompanied in a marvelous manner by the pianist, Alfred Cortôt. By the way, they were announced on the program: Voice, Madame Litvinne; piano, A. Cortôt, thus giving due recognition to what is a most difficult and often thankless office. In acknowledging the recalls the vocalist appeared always in conjunction with the pianist.

The report on the budget of fine arts has just been published. It proposed the augmentation of the grant to the Opéra from $16,000 to $240,000, and a new concert hall for the Conservatory, the present one being quite unfit for its purpose. The budget also advised that the course of teaching of musical composition shall be thoroughly investigated.

Alexandre Guilmant has just handed in his resignation of the post of organist at La Trinité, an appointment he has held for the last thirty years.

I spoke a little while ago on the fact that among composers and performers in Paris it was the thing to be a foreigner, but surely for an eclectic program the one given by Colonne at the Nouveau Théâtre on Thursday cannot be surpassed. It begins with Henry Purcell and ends with Richard Wagner, and includes Chopin, Liszt, Cherubini, Bach, Lulli, Vivaldi, Grieg. The only native composer on the list is Gabriel Pierné. The vocalist is Hildur Fjord, in Norwegian songs. A performance of "Peer Gynt" is shortly to be given under the direction of Lugné-Poe, on December 10. Grieg's music to the play will be performed by the Lamoureux Orchestra, under the direction of Chevillard.

I notice the journals publish the approaching marriage of Mlle. G. Leblanc to Maurice Maeterlinck. Mlle. Leblanc is a singer who created the role of Charlotte Corday in an opera by Alexandre Georges, when it was produced last season at the Opéra Populaire, of Paris. The work is shortly to be mounted at Lille.

At the last concert of Colonne was produced "Adonis," symphonic poem, by Th. Dubois. The work seemed to me scholarly, but somewhat uninteresting, the second movement being heavy and dull.

Harold Bauer with the Philharmonic.

DECEMBER 5, 1901.

The second concert of the New Philharmonic Society was a decided success. The artists were Harold Bauer, pianist; Eugene Ysaye, violinist, and Thérèse Behr, vocalist. One can say nothing new about the surety of technic or the magnetic charm and imagination of Harold Bauer as displayed in the "Carnival" of Schumann. Criticism has already been exhausted on his superb performance. He was recalled again and again with the utmost enthusiasm. Mlle. Behr gave a number of lieder with great purity of diction, which greatly pleased the auditors. I should say at least 400 or 500 people were unable to gain admittance to the concert, the hall being quite inadequate for its present purpose.

To those unfamiliar with Paris it will be somewhat of a surprise to learn that there is no real concert hall where can be given symphonic or choral concerts. Of course halls for chamber music or recitals are numerous, but no place such as is possessed by the larger cities of the States—New York, Boston, Philadelphia, designed and built originally for concert purposes. Why we have no such building it would be hard to say. The great symphonic concerts, such as those of Lamoureux, Colonne, &c., are given in theatres. But a theatre and concert hall can never be successfully combined. The construction of a first-class theatre for opera or drama renders it unsuitable for purely musical performances only. In case of symphonic concerts so much of the sonority and brilliance is lost by the orchestra being placed on the stage, the back and sides of which are closed by a canvas scene. A well constructed concert hall of suitable dimensions in a suitable and accessible locality is needed in Paris.

This brings up the question as to whether the majority of halls built for large concerts are not entirely too extravagant in size. Of course I am aware that a hall must hold a sufficient number of people to make the enterprise a profitable one. The Mormon Temple in Salt Lake City is, I believe, the solitary exception—at least so far as I am aware—of an immense auditorium combined with perfect distinctness of sound. Dion Boucicault, writing over ten years ago on the tendency to build halls of such huge dimensions that all artistic efforts had to be forced and exaggerated, gave a conversation that he had with Balfe on the subject, and as many of the remarks they made have become really prophetic, it may be interesting to reproduce it. Said Boucicault: "When monster concerts were beginning to become popular, Balfe, the composer, and I visited one of them, given I forget where. In the orchestra were upward of 150 executants. Of these, of course, two-thirds were strings. Mario came forward and sang. After his pure, rich, tenor voice rose like a lark in the first bars of the recitative, down came a hundred strings in a thumping chord. It was out of all proportion with the voice. It was an outrage on the ear.

"Balfe," I said, "What do you call that? To me it sounds awful."

"C'est magnifique," he replied; "Mais ce n'est pas la guerre! But we are monstrefying everything, as if size and extremity were elements of art. We are tearing the throats of our singers to get one note higher in the compass, to arrive at which we spoil all the rest of the voice. Listen!"

Mario was singing the tenor solo from the "Borgia."

"In twenty years hence," continued Balfe, "there will be no such voices heard. Quality will yield to quantity It will be all yell and roar."

"In an orchestra of those gigantic dimensions is it easy to hold all together in perfect unison?"

"You may ask, 'Is it possible?'" remarked the musician. "Precision in time suffers when the orchestra and chorus are too wide for the scope of the conductor. I doubt if perfect execution can be obtained by an orchestra of more than eighty pieces; that is, eighteen in the brass, fifteen wood and fifty strings, excluding the batterie de cuisine. The best execution I ever heard was from an orchestra of these dimensions. But you will see that monstrosity of art will characterize the coming age."

Certainly the remarks on the fatal results to the singing voice by augmenting the size of the orchestra into all disproportion to the vocal instrument have become so apparent that the prophecy has been remarkably fulfilled.

It is also a pressing question of altering the Opéra Comique, which is found to be most dangerous in case of fire during a performance, and perfectly inadequate, from an artistic point of view, for the proper staging of the works produced there. This house, it will be remembered, was burned down in 1887 during a performance of Thomas' "Mignon." Nearly thirty people lost their lives, and, the theatre being a subventioned one, the Director Carvalho was cited to appear before the tribunal. It appears from the report issued by the Minister of Fine Arts that if the safety of the public is so little more assured in the present building, that of the artists is not any more so, combined with which is the smallness of the stage for the production of the pieces at present produced at the Opéra Comique, necessitating, frequently, a very exacting and elaborate mise en scène.

The beautiful symphony in D minor, by César Franck, which was given at the last Colonne concert, with the excellent reception accorded to it, caused one to wonder why it did not appear more frequently on our programs. There is in this work such a fusion of beautiful, flowing melody, with a complete knowledge of the most abstruse resources of harmony known to modern science. The prelude to "Les Barbares," Saint-Saëns' last opera, was also performed. As I have already said in my notice of the production of the work at the Opéra, it is a sort of symphonic movement, in which most of the principal themes appear, and are treated, and developed with the skill and ingenuity for which Saint-Saëns is noted. Mme. Rose Caron was the vocalist and gave "Elsa's Dream" from "Lohengrin" and the romance of "Marguerite" from "La Damnation de Faust," Berlioz.

At the Lamoureux concerts the performance of Beethoven's symphonies in their order have brought us to No. 5 (C minor). The concert ended by a really admirable reading of Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," which provoked the utmost enthusiasm. A novelty was produced in "The Vision of Dante," by Raoul Brunel, who is, I believe, a Prix de Rome for composition. This is a really interesting and original work, and met with a very warm and encouraging reception.

DE VALMOUR.

THE LAST ITALIAN SINGER.

HE is called Baldelli. I do not know much about his life or career. They tell me that he has sung during the greater part of his life on the lyric stages of St. Petersburg and Madrid, singing such roles as Pandolphe in the "Serva Padrona," and Beckmesser in the "Meistersinger," and Figaro in Mozart's "Nozze." There is versatility for you! Baldelli at the present time must be about fifty-five years of age. He has just come to Paris, and to the great joy not only of our ears but of our hearts he still consents to sing from time to time in public.

I heard this great artist a few days ago. On his program were works of Scarlatti, Caldara, Cimarosa, Pergolesi. A single modern: Rossini. I will say at once and quite frankly that I was never so delighted before. Perhaps my early musical education has made me a too passionate admirer of the old Italian method of singing, of the "bel canto." But since a great virtuoso, and believe me that I am not using this word in any contemptuous sense, is teaching us something of which the tradition seems to have been entirely lost; since an exquisite singer in whom, as by a miracle, all the qualities of Italian lyricism are centred, has just moved us by his gifts of expression and beautiful tone, surely such a lesson should be taken to heart? Would it not be ridiculous to remain inattentive because we are so accustomed to modern methods? We are too often the victims of fashion. In Parisian artistic circles Bach, Rameau, Gluck are in turn à la mode. All Italian music, unless it belongs to the seventeenth century, is looked upon with suspicion. Pergolesi and Cimarosa are considered as belonging to the "basse époque." It is exactly as if Watteau and Fragonard, on the pretext that they were born 100 years too late, and that they have sometimes done painted frivolous work, should be entirely sacrificed for the benefit of Poussin. As for myself, I confess without shame I have an instinctive love for these Italian masters of the eighteenth century, and I love them still more since their genius has been made familiar to me through the talent of M. Baldelli.

"What is there so extraordinary about your M. Baldelli?" you ask. "If he is so astonishing as you say, everybody would know his name."

M. Baldelli has not a very big voice; think of his age and his long career! He has not, then—or rather he has no longer—the qualities which please the multitude. "The resources of his art should attract the attention of the critics," ou say. But critics in general are people who say what others say, and as it is agreed that the art of singing is dead, they will no longer give themselves the trouble to be sure that there is no one still living who is an exponent of what they believe to be a lost art.

M. Baldelli at his concert at the Bodinière commenced with a mournful Cantilène of Caldara, which he gave with a grand severity of style, exquisite limpidity of tone, and the most profound expression. After that he gave us the famous bass airs of "Il Matrimonio Segreto" and the "Cenerentola," with a volubility of diction, a wit, a fantasy and a gaiety of the most delightful character. We noticed that, even in these bouffonneries, the art of M. Baldelli always remains distinguished and eminently musical. After that the singer gave us a dramatic scena from the "Povero Tracollo" of Pergolesi, with intense pathos. Whether the work is comic or pathetic, the melody lively or glad, the tone always remains pure and of beautiful quality; whether the note be insisted upon, or merely whispered, it always preserves its intrinsic beauty. The "grand art italien" lies wholly in the secret of this technical perfection. "If the voice were stronger and deeper," said one of my neighbors, who had in former days applauded the famous singers of the Salle Ventadour, "I should think I was listening to Lablache."

I am not in the least exaggerating the merit of M. Baldelli. I am anxious to attract the attention to him of young artists, and not only singers but also composers. One knows in what esteem Wagner held the Italian singers. The public are right in requiring from our lyric artists a complete understanding of poetical and musical language, and this need of living declamation has developed since the works of the Bayreuth master are so universally performed. But why are these legitimate requirements so meagrely satisfied? Why are the interpreters nearly always incapable of translating the beauty of a classical or modern work? Because the voices are badly or insufficiently trained, because the organ, without which one can do nothing, is always imperfect and will not do the work that it is required to do.

I will return one day to this capital question, with which the future of drama and lyric comedy is bound up. In the meantime my readers should try and hear Baldelli and hasten to profit by his teaching. His present address is 6 Rue Euler, Paris.—H. Fièrens-Gevaert, in the Guide Musical.

GOLTZ STR. 26, BERLIN, W.
November 30, 1901.

IF the quality were equal to the quantity, violinists would have no reason to complain about new compositions for their instrument this season in Berlin. Since last writing three more new works for violin have been performed here for the first time.

Arrigo Serato introduced a violin concerto by Leone Sinigaglia, an Italian who received his musical education in Germany. The work, which is still in manuscript, is dedicated to Serato, otherwise he probably would not have played it. It is a stilted "Machwerk," crude in structure, superficial in contents. Now and then a theme takes a promising start, but it soon lags and disappoints.

Serato's performance of the work was mediocre, and did not show it off in the best light. He redeemed himself, however, in the Wieniawski Concerto later. He played this with technicical finish, good tone and rousing temperament. It was some five or six years ago that Serato made a successful début here. He has improved greatly since then. He has lost his former crudeness; he has gained much in finish and repose, without losing his natural warmth. He always succeeds with the public, and this is due to his temperament, for he is by no means a great violinist. His greatest fault is his small tone, which was often entirely smothered by the orchestra.

This consumptive tone is no doubt due in large part to his manner of holding the violin. He has acquired the bad habit of playing with his head turned over so that the left ear almost rests on the violin. He undoubtedly thinks, with the vibrations so near his ear, that he is drawing a big tone. So it sounds with the head in that position.

Serato is a talented young violinist, and if he could learn to draw a tone twice as large, and to play his passages a trifle slower, giving here also more tone, he would have three times the success he now has.

Another young Italian gave a recital about the time of Serato's appearance, Aldo Antonietti, who has been heard in Berlin several times before. Antonietti, too, is a very talented violinist. He has a smooth, sweet tone, a clear technic, almost perfect intonation. He plays with warmth, though he has not Serato's fire. What Antonietti most lacks is color contrasts. He plays everything mezzo-forte. He never brings out a good fortissimo nor a real pianissimo. Then, too, there is no energy in his attack. Rapid passages that should be played forte and with tone and energy, he goes over smoothly and softly, always with a beautiful tone quality, but not in a satisfying manner. Moreover, he drags the tempi often; his allegro is a moderato. Antonietti with his talent ought to play much better. Since last year I see no progress at all.

Carl Halir gave a concert on the 16th with the Philharmonic Orchestra. He played the Mozart A major Concerto, the Brahms Concerto and his own Concerto in D major, which he played here for the first time.

So Halir, like his teacher, Joachim, at times feels the desire to compose. This concerto will not, I trust, injure his reputation as a violinist. At least, Joachim has composed during the last fifty years, more or less, without having in any way hurt his reputation as a performer. Why, then, should Halir not compose?

This concerto is not new. Halir composed it in Weimar some years ago. I heard him play it there for the first time. So I have heard the first and last performance of this work.

Halir played the Mozart Concerto exquisitely. What beautiful music it is! And how refreshing after the striving and straining of some of the modern impotents. Halir has just the tone, the canary-like trills, the phrasing and repose for this classic jem. Really, the best cure for the hyper-modern critics who are tired and sick of the old in music is to let them hear a concerto of the Sinigaglia stamp every night for a month. Then let them hear a finished performance of this Mozart Concerto, and say Amen!

Halir gave a broad and virile reading of the Brahms Concerto, for which he received a storm of applause.

The artist couple, Alexander and Lilli Petschnikoff, gave a well attended popular concert in the Philharmonie on the 18th. They played together the Spohr double Concerto in B minor, a rarely heard work. It is a pity, for it is beautiful music, bright and fresh as a summer morning in the first movement, and noble and dignified in the slow movement. True it is old-fashioned; you see grandfather's old beaver hat and grandmother's hoop skirts, but nevertheless it is good music. The finale is weak.

The two Petschnikoffs played the work beautifully. I was surprised at the amount of technic Mrs. Petschnikoff displayed. She worthily held her ground with her husband, except in tone volume. His tone was larger, but then what a difference in their fiddles.

Petschnikoff plays Ferdinand Laub's famous Strad., one of the best violins that ever came from old Antonius' workshop. I met an old musician here the other day, Dr. Pohl, who lived thirty years in Moscow. He knew Laub well, and often heard him. He said the tone Laub drew from this violin was marvelous. He remembered distinctly hearing the Bruch G minor Concerto for the first time as played by Laub. The work was then new, and in Laub's hands it made a wonderful impression on him. He considered Laub a much greater violinist than Joachim ever was.

There is something very peculiar about Joachim's reputation. I have read criticisms and biographical sketches of thirty years ago, when Laub, Vieuxtemps and Wieniawski were still living. It is always: "Joachim, the greatest living violinist." Yet, in every instance when I have talked with musicians who heard them all, the verdict has been that Laub, Vieuxtemps and Wieniawski were all much greater than Joachim. This was invariably the verdict unless it was someone connected with the Berlin Hochscule. Isn't this strange?

To-day it is still the same thing. Read about violinists. It is always: "Joachim is still the greatest." People seem to be afraid to write and say what they think, or, in other words, the truth.

Or are we all deaf, and is it true that Joachim, who is seventy years old, and who cannot, twice out of ten times, play even the Beethoven F major Romance in tune and without scratching—is it true that he is still the greatest living violinist?

On the same evening of the Petschnikoff concert Halir played, for the first time in Berlin, C. M. Löffler's Divertimento for violin and orchestra. It was in the second of the new Symphony concerts, under Richard Strauss, in Kroll's Theatre. It is an interesting work, one of the best of the six novelties for violin that have been played here thus far this season.

I liked especially the variations on the theme from the "Dies Iræ." Also the "Fête des morts," which is very characteristic. The elegance and polish of the work, as a whole, the discreet orchestral background, the characteristic and effective treatment of the solo violin, all reveal the composer-violinist.

Halir's playing was not quite up to his usual standard. He evidently had not practiced the work much, either, as he played from notes. Yet it was heartily applauded.

Z. Alex. Birnbaum, the young Polish violinist, who made a very successful début in Berlin three years ago, is, I am told, having great success on a concert tour of France. He recently played in Paris at a charity concert gotten up by the Figaro with rousing success. He is a violinist of unusual talent. He draws a tone from his instrument, warm, rich and throbbing with life. He has the genuine Polish fire, which never fails to rouse the audience. Birnbaum is concertmaster of the new orchestra that has been founded in Paris, which is directed by "guesting" conductors, Mottl, Strauss, Weingartner, and others.

Another gifted young Polish violinist is Arthur Argiewicz, the protégé of Mr. Landecker, owner of the Philharmonie. After several years of study he is to come out of his seclusion. He will give a concert with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Beethoven Hall toward the end of January, playing as his principal work the Brahms Concerto.

FLETCHER MUSIC METHOD.—An interesting letter just received from Evelyn A. Fletcher-Copp, who left for Europe early in November, is dated from Brussels, in which city she was en route to Leipsic. She had just given a lecture in Brussels on the Fletcher Music Method which was well attended and well received. Mrs. Fletcher-Copp says: "I find the music methods for children in Brussels away behind the general American methods, but in many ways the Belgians are ahead of us—I mean in the way of giving free advantages in music to the poor children. * * * What seemed to interest my audience this afternoon more than anything else was the Fletcher Method idea of drawing out the individuality of the child in musical composition so that he would express himself in music as readily as he would express his thoughts in words. After the lecture I had to give them instance after instance of my own personal experience of this natural result when the child is dealt with from the new musical standpoint."

CHARLES W. CLARK.

THE eminent baritone, Charles W. Clark, whose picture adorns the front page of THE MUSICAL COURIER this week, appeared with much success in the Chicago Orchestra's first historical program at the Auditorium on December 13 and 14. A detailed account of his singing on this occasion will be found in this paper's Chicago department.

Among American artists Mr. Clark occupies a prominent and influential position. Glowing tributes paid to him by the press of the country would fill a book of liberal dimensions. And these estimates are just. For exceptional musical gifts, an artistic temperament, unrelenting study of the great masters, intellectual qualifications which embrace the ability to interpret sympathetically and dramatically, and the cherishing of high ideals, constitute a number of the excellent causes which have resulted in this vocal achievement and general musicianship.

As previously announced in THE MUSICAL COURIER, Mr. Clark will spend the next two seasons in Europe, making Paris his headquarters. The advisability of his entering grand opera, for which he is admirably adapted, has been discussed by his many friends and associates. But Mr. Clark as yet has made no statement to the effect that he will devote himself exclusively to operatic roles. Nor are able exponents of oratorio and song so multitudinous that such an announcement would prove wholly welcome to the musical world at large.

Under the direction of the Hamlin Company, Kimball Hall, Chicago, Mr. Clark will be called upon to fill many important engagements in the United States during the remainder of the season 1901-2. It has been proposed that before leaving America he should be heard in several of the large musical centres of Canada.

ONTARIO LADIES' COLLEGE.—The Ontario Ladies' College, at Whitby, Ont., Canada, has been giving a series of musical recitals that have reflected great credit upon the students and the teaching staff. HAROLD BAUER IN ENGLAND.

HAROLD BAUER'S playing at the Hallé concerts in Manchester, England, recently caused a sensation. t was his first appearance there, and seldom has the press of that great city been so enthusiastic over the work of an artist. Here are some of the opinions:

HAROLD BAUER AT THE MANCHESTER HALLE CONCERTS.

Last evening the first appearance took place in Manchester of Harold Bauer, whose name adds another to the list of excellent pianists. The first piece was Brahms' Concerto in D minor, which has been heard here several times, but why artists choose it is not very clear. The first movement is very tame and uninteresting, but here is some improvement in the second and the third is quite tolerable. His second effort was Gluck's beautiful "Air de Ballet," arranged by Saint-Saëns. It was most daintily played. He then gave Chopin's well-known Polonaise in A flat, one of those pieces written for the display of virtuosity. He was heartily recalled after each piece, and was no doubt well pleased with his reception.—Manchester Evening Mail, November 15.

Notwithstanding the grumblings of a few people who crave for lighter fare, the Hallé programs maintain their high standard, consisting of large scale works only. The Concerto for piano in D minor was the first work given to the world by Brahms beyond the scale of chamber music. In it there is the obvious intention to restore the classical traditions in music which had seriously suffered at the hands of the romantic school. The work was coldly received on its first performance at Leipsic, but warmly welcomed at Hamburg. Afterward it was produced in Vienna, and by the London Philharmonic Society in 1871. Its character is distinctly academic, grave and reflective, and although it was magnificently played by Harold Bauer, we must confess to finding it dry. The rendering of the piece showed that Harold Bauer is a player of the first rank, with great executive powers, original conception and individuality.—Manchester Evening News, November 15, 1901.

Harold Bauer, who was the chief star at Hallé's on Thursday, is a pianist of the first rank, absolutely without affectation. He possesses the highest gifts, and his performances stamped him as the true artist. Moreover, it is so refreshing to find an artist who does not seek the adventitious aid of theatricalism.—Sunday Chronicle, November 17, 1901.

The fifth concert of the series, like the first and second, was wholly instrumental and not a whit less attractive. Harold Bauer is a pianist of the highest ability, already known by repute, though previously a stranger to Manchester. Had he played nothing yesterday except the "Air de Ballet" in G, which Saint-Saëns has arranged in most delightful fashion, he would have stood revealed as the possessor of a fairy-like touch and the average professional command of the keyboard. But in Chopin's Polonaise in A flat he showed true artistic feeling, giving the proper emphasis to the many thrilling passages in that work, and allowing no tinge of exaggeration to mar the value of the performance. Thus the defiant opening, a kind of challenge to all comers, led up in most natural fashion to the principal theme, which is symbolic of the determination to overcome by valor whatever may stand in opposition. In the famous passage in octaves for the left hand Mr. Bauer avoided the mistake of overwhelming the march tune, which is intended to be heard above it, and his treatment of the graceful theme which announces relief from the storm and stress just undergone was worthy of all praise. A determined effort to secure an encore was made, but in vain. In Brahms' Concerto in D minor (op. 15), Mr. Bauer had opportunities of showing that in association with an orchestra he can vary the tones of his instrument so as to claim at one time the principal share of attention, and at another to let them blend in harmonious symmetry with the rest. The first movement opens with an introduction of some length, in which a portion of the scheme is set forth by the strings and wood-wind to a rumbling drum accompaniment, in a novel and characteristic manner, after which the pianist executes a cadenza, introducing new material, and gradually the old, the relations between the sections being very precise and requiring accurate adjustment. There is a reposefulness in the second movement which in Brahms is not associated with indolence or dreaminess, but suggests a merely temporary cessation of activity. The piano is here favored with a delicious solo, one of the most excellent portions of the whole work. Of all three movements the rondo is that which the memory most easily retains, the principal theme being marked by a kind of angularity which makes it conspicuous. Between the several appearances of this theme are episodes of great interest, the second being captivating in the highest degree. In Mr. Bauer's hands all these were admirably brought out, and his success was warmly acknowledged.—Manchester Courier, November 15, 1901.

Among the very small number of really significant piano concertos Brahms' early work in D minor (op. 15) may be just as unhesitatingly reckoned as his later in B flat major (op. 83). The prancing "Don Quixote" theme is of astonishingly happy invention. The orchestral part, which, of course, has symphonic importance, was played yesterday, as on various former occasions, under Dr. Richter, with exquisite taste and with the solo part Harold Bauer made a very remarkable first impression on the Manchester public. Mr. Bauer pleases us much more thoroughly than any other pianist of the younger generation. There are a good many young players at the present day with fine technical mastery of the instrument, and in that respect Mr. Bauer has no shortcomings that we could discover. His passage playing is clear and incisive, the wrist being as well developed as the fingers, and, wonderful to relate, his pedaling is so artistic that no confusion of harmonies seems ever to occur in his playing. Such results can only be achieved by a player who is entirely free from affectation. If he is busy posing he will inevitably forget some of those subtleties upon which continuously beautiful tone production depends, and will lapse into vulgarity or, at least, into commonplace. There is also a certain extremely remarkable equipoise in Mr. Bauer's art. Vigilant as he is, no frowning concentration appears in his manner. He plays like a man who has his task very thoroughly in hand, exercising a legitimate way, and not making a furious effort to do something extraordinary. The consequence is that under his hands a composition comes out in clear outline and true proportion. The extremely clever Caprice by Saint-Saëns on an air from Gluck's "Alceste" he rendered with wonderful subtlety, and his A flat Polonaise was very satisfactory.—Manchester Guardian, November 12, 1901.

Although a stranger to Manchester, and Manchester is occasionally, if not very often, coldly critical to its musical newcomers, Mr. Bauer could not complain of the warmth of his reception Thursday. This is all the more to be wondered at, inasmuch that the Concerto—Brahms' No. 1 in D minor—with the exception of a beautiful, wistful adagio movement, is distinctly a dry work, and very much caviare to the general public. Of course, the Chopin Polonaise in A flat was rapturously received, and Mr. Bauer had to be very firm and merely content himself with repeated bows.—Umpire, November 17, 1901.

METROPOLITAN SUNDAY NIGHT CONCERT.

A FAIR audience was present at the Metropolitan Opera House on Sunday night to hear Josef Hofmann play the piano and Miss Anna Otten the violin. Mr. Hofmann was in excellent condition, and Miss Otten played with a splendid tone, which was produced by a beautiful bow movement, and she exhibited a remarkably smooth left hand technic. This young lady is one of the formidable female violinists before the public to-day, and should be more frequently heard.

Madame Lehmann did the best she could considering that her voice has no longer the facility or quality necessary to penetrate through large space and do justice to the music. It is a sad fact, but it must be touched upon constantly, in order to remind the people of it, that singers will come to this country long after their vocal usefulness is gone, merely for the purpose of utilizing their past experience to secure engagements. They are really not worthy of any attention in the columns of a music paper.

Metropolitan Independent Church.

AT the services of the Metropolitan Independent Church, Carnegie Lyceum, last Sunday forenoon Miss Josephine E. Naudin, soprano, sang Gounod's "No Night Shall Be There" and Roma's "At Parting," exhibing a powerful, sympathetic and intensely musical voice, and singing with tenderness, passion and temperament. Miss Naudin is a pupil of Miss Montefiore, of this city. She was accompanied by Miss Paula Semnacher, a pianist of intelligence, who has gauged the nature and the qualifications of the art of accompaniment.

The services at the Metropolitan Independent Church are conducted by the speaker, Henry Frank, whose discourse was an appeal to the very highest and noblest intellectual attributes and pregnant with truths that should permeate society as quickly as possible.

Mary Gardner, of Chicago.

THE Sunday Journal published a cablegram from Paris giving an account of the disappearance of Mary Gardner, of Chicago, an American, it says, who is a member of the Opéra Comique and who has been ill from overstudy and hazardous exertion. She disappeared immediately after singing at the Opéra, "leaving no trace." Her place at the Opéra is left open for her in case of her return. She has probably entered a sanatorium.

EFFIE STEWART.—Miss Effie Stewart, the soprano, has been engaged by the Handel and Haydn Society, of Boston, for the performance of "The Messiah" December 25. Her January engagements include the concert by the Troy (N. Y.) Choral Club.

Following are some of Miss Stewart's recent press notices:

CONCERT, ARION CLUB, PROVIDENCE, R. I.

In Miss Effie Stewart the soprano role found a most capable and satisfactory representative. She has a voice eminently fitted for the presentation of dramatic roles, a pure soprano, large, of fine timbre, and guided by ripe experience and musical instinct. In her singing is to be found no trace of self-assertion, but the composer's thought is seized with unerring insight and translated with artistic fidelity.—Providence Journal.

ORATORIO CONCERT, WORCESTER, MASS.

In the duet, "I Seek Thee, My Life," between Miss Effie Stewart, soprano, of New York, and Leverett B. Merrill, basso, of Boston, the audience had the first intimation in a musical way of what they were capable of performing, and the fine work done by Miss Stewart and Mr. Merrill was well seconded by the tenors when they took up the chorale, "Zion Hears Her Watchmen's Voices."

Miss Stewart is a finished singer of the dramatic order. She is endowed with a rich, melodious and powerful voice, and capable of sustaining the highest notes in a remarkable degree, while her enunciation is perfect. Miss Stewart's first notes at once inspire her audience with confidence. * * *

Miss Stewart again electrified the audience when she sang Massenet's aria, "Brightest and Best," from "Mary Magdalene," her singing of the high notes being a splendid performance.

A most delightful addition to the program of the evening was the introduction of Miss Stewart in the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria," to organ, piano and violin accompaniment, in which she again demonstrated her superiority as a singer.—Worcester Spy.

Miss Stewart sang her role of Santuzza from memory, and was, of course, the hit of the evening. She showed the result of operatic training. She sang with a great deal of expression, which made her singing more telling.—Newark (N. J.) Advertiser.

MUSIC IN BALTIMORE.

BALTIMORE, December 15, 1901.

THE first concert since my last budget was given by three well-known local musicians—Dr. B. Merrill Hopkinson, baritone; Natorp Blumenfeld, violin, and Frederick Weber, tenor—at Lehmann's Hall, on December 3.

Dr. Hopkinson opened the program by introducing to Baltimore Liza Lehmann's "In Memoriam," which he gave a thoughtful and expressive rendition. He sang also Del Riego's "Love Is a Bird," Nevin's "Rosary" and "Mighty Lak' a Rose" and Sullivan's "Oh, Swallow, Swallow!" with his wonted success.

Mr. Blumenfeld has never played better here. He gave a reverent reading of Beethoven's Romance, No. 2, in F major, and a masterful and convincing performance of Bach's "Allemanda," from the unaccompanied Sonata, No. 2. The De Beriot Concerto in D was unworthy a place among its associates.

Vieuxtemps' "Reverie" displayed the player's noble tone and sincerity of expression, and the Popper-Halir "Dance of the Elves" was impeccably executed.

Mr. Weber has advanced decidedly in his art since last year, and he fully merited the enthusiastic approval accorded him. His voice was pure and even, and he sang with taste and authority ten songs from Schubert's "Müllerlieder."

Miss Clara Ascherfeld was the admirable accompanist.

A very large audience attended the fourth Peabody recital given December 6 by Emanuel Wad, of the piano staff of the Conservatory.

By his performance of the following program Mr. Wad proved that he is still what all players should hope for many years of their career to be, a growing artist, for his success excelled that of all previous appearances:

Fantaisie in D minor.....Mozart
Sonata Appassionata, op. 57.....Beethoven
Minuetto in B minor, from op. 78.....Schubert
Song Without Words, in A flat (duetto).....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Etude in B flat minor.....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Nocturne, F sharp.....Chopin
Etude, B flat, op. 25, No. 9.....Chopin
Etude, A flat.....Chopin
Etude, A minor, op. 25, No. 11.....Chopin
Improvisation on Siegmund's Love Song, from Wagner's Die Walküre.....Schütt
Caprice in G.....Paderewski
Three pieces from op. 11.....Serge Liapounow
Rondo des Fantomes.
Berceuse.
Tempete.

In the execution of this varied program, the pianist displayed individuality of conception and a highly developed technic. He was repeatedly recalled after each group, but the most successful of his renditions were those of the Chopin Nocturne and the G flat Etude. A dainty little piece of his own was given as an encore after this group.

At the second Boston Symphony concert of the season, Mr. Gericke presented Schumann's overture, "Manfred"; Liszt's Symphonic Poem, No. 7, "Festklaenge"; Vieuxtemps' Concerto for Violin, No. 5, in A minor, op. 37, and Beethoven's Symphony, No. 7. Charles Gregorowitsch was the soloist.

A more delightful program could scarcely have been arranged, nor could its execution have been excelled.

Mr. Gregorowitsch's exquisite tone, musical style and brilliant execution were thoroughly appreciated by the large audience, which recalled him numberless times.

The Kneisel Quartet and Harold Randolph presented at their second concert Beethoven's String Quartet in G, op. 18, No. 2, Bach's Sonata for piano and violin in A and Alexander Borodin's String Quartet in D.

The Bach sonata was a grateful substitute for the usual piano and string quartet or quintet. The classic was given a scholarly reading and flawlessly clean execution by Mr. Randolph and Mr. Kneisel.

Mme. Emma Nevada and her company of assisting artists gave an excellent concert at the Academy of Music Friday afternoon. Madame Nevada is one of the most remarkable coloratura sopranos ever heard here. Her voice is of light, birdlike quality, pure, but lacking color, especially in the medium register. She has consummate breath control and a masterly coloratura. Her staccato is extraordinary in clearness and brilliancy, and she is mistress of an exquisite pianissimo. In her program she devoted herself exclusively to the florid style of music, of which she is so distinguished an exponent. She sang the "Chanson du Mysoli," from F. David's "La Perle du Brésil"; the "Bell Song" from Delibes' "Lakmé"; andante from "La Sonnambula"; Taubert's "Vogel im Walde," and the "Shadow Song" from "Dinorah," in which she displayed a wonderfully facile execution, flawless intonation and charming style. She gave as encores "Shall I Wear a White Rose?" and Liza Lehmann's "You and I."

The attendant artists, all admirable, were Pablo Casals, 'cellist; Leon Moreau, pianist; Daniel Maquarre, flutist, and Heathe Gregory, basso.

Ernest Hutcheson gave another of his unique and delightful lecture recitals in the East Hall of the Peabody Institute yesterday. In an informal and happy manner he gave a most instructive sketch of his subject, "The Older Dance Forms and the Suite." He told us the old suite was composed chiefly of movements derived from dances, excepting two movements, the opening prelude occasionally met with and the air sometimes introduced.

The order of the movements was invariable as regards the first three (always allowing for the optional introductory prelude), being the Allemande, Courant and Sarabande. The last movement was always a Gigue.

Between the Saraband and the Gigue the composer was at liberty to exercise a good deal of choice, writing a minuet or bourrée, occasionally a passepied or loure, or he might select two or more of these forms, so that a suite varied between five to a possible eight movements. Mr. Hutcheson's plan was to play a whole suite by an old composer, for which he chose Bach's Partita in B flat; then to illustrate the separate dance forms by some varied examples. For these he chose this formidable list: Gavotte, D minor, Bourrée, A minor, Bach; Tambourin, E minor, Rameau; Tambourin, B flat, Raff; Minuet, E flat, Beethoven; Menuetto scherzando, Stavenhagen; Gigue in G, Bach; Gigue, G minor, Lully; Gigue, G, Scarlatti; Rigaudon, D, Raff.

Then to illustrate an entire suite by a modern composer, D'Albert's in D minor was given.

The performance of the entire taxing program was such as to leave nothing to be desired. EUTERPE.

Baernstein in St. Paul.

ST. PAUL, Minn., December 11, 1901.

BAERNSTEIN was billed as the special attraction for "The Messiah." The 2,200 seats in our hall were sold, and 300 people paid admission and stood or found seats on the steps; 200 were turned away. This is the first instance in the annals of St. Paul that such a condition came to pass.

After his "Why Do the Nations," the audience rose in their seats, calls of "Bravo, bravo," were shouted from every side; the vast auditorium was a scene of great wildness.

THE SPIERING QUARTET.—The Spiering Quartet, of which the eminent violinist Theodore Spiering is director, has entered upon a brilliant season. Among the quartet's many important engagements is a series of concerts now in progress in Chicago. The organization continues to make its headquarters at Chicago's Fine Arts Building.

PEOPLE'S SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

GOOD, staid, old Cooper Union was crowded to overflowing last Friday night for the opening of the second season of the People's Symphony concerts. Several coats of fresh paint gave a festive appearance to the large Assembly Hall, and when Conductor Franz X. Arens walked out upon the stage, baton in hand, he was received with tumultuous applause. Indeed the enthusiasm over music was something worth going miles to see and hear. The People's Symphony concerts began last winter under favorable auspices. There is no charity in the scheme. The prices of admission are small, but those who go pay their way. Apparently there is a public that wants these concerts and means to support, too, as far as it can. In the meantime the philanthropic men and women who are interested in the work purpose to raise an endowment fund in order that the concerts may be established on a permanent basis.

At the five concerts last year programs in chronological order were given. Mr. Arens began with the composers of the pre-classical period. Then came the classic writers and these were followed by the romantic and the modern schools. From the advanced programs for this season the concerts will come under the title of "Popular," or rather the popular classical. Familiar works were played by the orchestra at the first concert, but it was a program admirably arranged. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, two movements of Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Händel's Largo and Wagner's "Kaiser Marsch." Miss Kathryn Hilke, the soloist of the evening, sang the Bach-Gounod "Ave Maria" and two art songs—"The Violet," by Mozart, and Schumann's "Widmung." Mr. Arens played the piano accompaniments for the songs. Ernest Bauer, the concertmaster of the orchestra, played a violin obligato to the "Ave Maria," and both he and the singer were obliged to acknowledge several hearty recalls. It would be interesting to know how many times Miss Hilke has sung the popular "Ave Maria." She probably never sung it better than she did last Friday night. Schumann's "Widmung" she, too, sang especially well.

Mr. Arens prefaced all of the works but Händel's "Largo" and the art songs with brief analytical comment. This conductor is agreeable in his explanations, because he never says too much. Just an outline and then the orchestra plays. The orchestra, by the way, is an excellent one, numbering forty-eight men. The dampness last Friday night somewhat impaired the strings, but, on the whole, there was cause for congratulation.

A pleasant feature of the evening was the appearance on the stage of Charles Sprague Smith, of the People's Institute. The institute is interested in the concerts, and is co-operating in their advancement. In his remarks Mr. Smith referred to the endowment which is to be raised and he explained further the work and the aims of the workers. The officers of the People's Symphony concerts are: J. Hampden Robb, president; Hon. J. G. Carlisle, treasurer, and Lucien G. Chaffin, secretary. The executive committee includes S. Mallet-Prevost, chairman; Mrs. Richard W. Gilder, Miss Nora Godwin, Mrs. Gilbert E. Jones, Mrs. Edwin S. Mead, Albert Stettheimer and J. Eugene Whitney.

Heinrich Meyn, baritone, will be the soloist at the next concert, Friday evening, January 17. This will be the program for that night:

Overture, Egmont.....Beethoven
Count Almaviva's Aria from The Marriage of Figaro.....Mozart
Symphony (Oxford) in G major.....Haydn
Auf Flugeln des Gesanges.....Mendelssohn
Old English, False Phillis.....Mendelssohn
Andante Cantabile (string orchestra).....Tschaikowsky
Hungarian March.....Schubert-Liszt

PROBLEMS OF MUSICAL LIFE IN AMERICA.

CHICAGO, Ill., November 30, 1901.

IT is reported from Philadelphia that the conductor of the new Symphony Orchestra there, Fritz Scheel, has imported from Europe a surprisingly large percentage of the members of that orchestra. Involuntarily the question arises: Did there exist a necessity, a real cause to thus ignore the material within grasp and give to this new orchestra such a European character?

Musical affairs, as far as the writer of this article, during a great number of years in New York, Boston and Chicago, had a chance to make himself acquainted with, absolutely in no cases require wholesale importations for organizing an orchestra, save perhaps a few individual engagements of foreign woodwind instrument players and harpists. The abilities of a great number of the imported string instrumentalists are very moderate and modest, and only after a considerable length of time do these musicians acquire the external smoothness customary in the string departments of the few big American orchestras.

Now why should not an American born musician under similar circumstances and otherwise not lacking in ability succeed just as well under a conductor's severe training? Has not the time come now to give him hopes that his industry, his zeal and his technical acquirements will secure him a place in one of the large orchestras, where heretofore this ripe fruit has usually fallen into the lap of the foreign born?

Is it for an American altogether worth the while to seriously study an orchestral instrument when he knows in advance that the mere fact of having been born here acts against him? As far as the public is concerned, it is to be pitied that the proceedings of the managers of these orchestras are acquiesced in and generally approved, but that is perhaps quite natural when one considers that the press almost daily sounds the praise of the orchestra in superlative expressions. How can anyone dare under such circumstances to consider the possibility that equally good results might perhaps be achieved if there were more American blood among the performers? After all, the public plays usually only a passive part in its relation to the orchestra, and regards its performances very often in the same light as it does the purchase of any desirable mercantile article, giving little thought to its origin, whether foreign or home made. The manager believes it a bolder, financially more successful operation if he can call attention to the great number of "imported" musicians from Europe, whose work is perfection in brilliancy and refinement. And, on the other hand, where is the courageous conductor to be found who willingly would undertake to give first-class concerts with a—in the beginning—somewhat unevenly balanced orchestra? Oh, no, such an orchestra would necessitate more work all around, and might endanger the smoothness of the performance.

But even if such considerations were a good cause for ignoring and rejecting the less experienced American musician, is there not to be found in every metropolis in America a useful and partly much better material than the imported one? Must the American musician give up his hopes, one by one, of ever occupying a place according to his abilities in such orchestras? How miserably has many a one of this class to make a living, feeding himself and family from hand to mouth, and daily looking anxiously around whether or not the morrow will bring some earnings. And how sick must he feel at heart to notice that with the passing of his thirty-fifth year the first gray hair appears on his head, perhaps the natural consequence of his mental sufferings, and that with it comes the sad certainty that now no conductor or manager will deign to seriously consider him for a place in the orchestra with his sorrowful face and his gray hair. Let us be frank and state here that we may find a fair criterion for the qualifications of the average imported musician, who takes the righteous bread from the American struggler, if we recall to our minds the quality of the musicians of Mr. Winderstein's European Orchestra, traveling here for a short time last year, on whom an almost annihilating judgment was pronounced by the entire New York press; such, not better and not worse, are the average string instrumentalists who are imported under contract.

The great majority of them come to America to first learn, which favor, with more justice and generosity on the part of those powers which rule over the destinies of an orchestra, ought to be bestowed on those worthy but sadly neglected musicians who cannot help regarding themselves in the light of musical outcasts. As in the orchestra branch, so might a similar anomaly be noticed in regard to American soloists, who are likewise treated like stepchildren by the aforementioned powers, ruling here supremely. Whence shall come the enthusiasm and the inducement for perseverance in his art when a conscientious artist sees that the solo work for concerts of even smaller importance is mostly reserved for an artist from Europe? And when he has the audacity to ask the reason for such an action the mouthpieces of those musical powers have the heartlessness to tell him: "We do not want to make the reputation for an artist, we want the soloist to bring his reputation along with him." That the three or four soloistic members of the respective orchestras are yearly given a chance to play a solo does not contradict my statement.

It is a concession which has to be made, and which speedily and forever will be discarded as soon as the connection between the parties is severed. The public, in its longing for sensation, believes only too readily in the manager-prince's coarse exaggerations concerning the incomparable greatness and genius of every new artist, looming up on the musical horizon, and we now live to see even second-class institutions waiting for the price list from New York before they make their choice, thereby hoping to humor their patrons. Those agencies are in truth the musical department stores, which, with the same relentless power as in the purely commercial world, slowly undermine all individual life and ambition.

Our American musicians as a class have yet to learn the bitter lesson that selfishness, envy and insane competition, whenever these evil habits are allowed to grow, destroy all chances for materialistic improvement, and that only the principle of mutual esteem and mutual support will lend them a strength which eventually will restore to them the power and the position which by right ought to be theirs. As State laws will hardly be created to help and protect the less fortunate native musician, it follows that they themselves, by just and strict rules and by jointly and harmoniously working together, shoulder to shoulder, may gain some influence over those proud powers, diminish the existing evil and gradually push the menacing floods back into their legitimate channels.

BERNHARD LISTEMANN.

JESSIE SHAY.—The playing of Miss Jessie Shay, the piano soloist at the Kubelik concerts, has been commended by the leading critics. In addition to the press notices already published regarding her performances, we give the following:

"Miss Shay played Liszt's 'Twelfth Hungarian Rhapsody' with excellent color and with musical phrasing."—New York Times, December 8, 1901.

FLORIZEL'S LAST CONCERT IN STOCKHOLM.

THE celebrated music critic who writes under the pseudonym "Od" in the Stockholm Vaitland, in describing the second appearance there of the nine year old violin virtuoso, Florizel, writes in the issue of November 11, 1901:

"Truly very advanced in skill is this healthy and spirited mite, who is able to play the most difficult music on the violin with an energy and lightning-like rapidity which is astonishing. It is more like health giving play to him than fatigue. We see in Florizel the embodiment of an exceptional gift from nature. The most profound secrets of music are his—in his fingers, in his mind and in his astonishing capacity of memory. New selections are nothing to him, however difficult; he plays them as though he knew them from the beginning with their endless varieties and changes.

"A well-known Swedish violinist and musician has acknowledged with sincere admiration his wonderful faculties. Florizel can play by heart all of Paganini's caprices. You may hear people say that it is due to training and not to nature, but we think that it should be called supernatural.

"There is a difference in precocity in children. We have seen wonderful ones disappear like tiny flowers, but no one can prove that Wolfgang Mozart was injured by the concerts he gave as a clever virtuoso and composer when he was from seven to ten years of age. Nor was Sarasate's development retarded when, as a boy of ten years, he played the violin before admiring audiences. And so we believe that it is good and useful for Florizel to present his wondrous talents before the public."

KALTENBORN QUARTET.

THE Kaltenborn Quartet is meeting with much success this season. They have just finished four concerts in Tarrytown, and are booked for many other engagements. The following notices are from Yonkers and Cortland, N. Y.:

Last evening in the cosy hall of the Amackassin Club an appreciative audience listened to the second in a series of concerts by the Kaltenborn String Quartet, the members of which are Franz Kaltenborn, first violin; William Rowell, second violin; Gustave Bach, viola; Louis Heine, 'cello.

The program was a carefully selected one, and each number was splendidly played.

Mr. Kaltenborn's solo playing was, as usual, a delight to the ear This gifted violinist has become a great favorite with Yonkers audiences, and it is a matter of regret that he does not give his concerts wider publicity, so that the general public might become better acquainted with him and his playing.—The Yonkers Herald, December 7.

Lovers of fine string music anticipated a rich treat in the concert by the Kaltenborn String Quartet of New York city at Normal Hall last evening, and these anticipations were fully realized in the very excellent program which was rendered. Each number was enthusiastically encored and the large audience present would gladly have listened another hour could the concert have been prolonged. Individually and collectively the members of the organization are artists of a high order, and their masterful interpretation of the various numbers on the program was a revelation to many who heard them. Not in many a day has a more finished or artistic concert been given in Cortland than the one last evening, and a return of this quartet to Cortland would be welcomed by music lovers generally.—Cortland (N. Y.) Standard, December 12.

On December 15 the quartet played in Brooklyn; December 16, at Mrs. Charles D. Simons, Jr.'s (matinee), in honor of Mr. and Mrs. George Vanderbilt; December 17, Jersey City; 18th, Bay Ridge; 22d, Yonkers, Brooklyn and New York city; 29th, Brooklyn; January 5, Brooklyn; 12th, Brooklyn; 14th, South Norwalk; 18th, Staten Island; 19th, Brooklyn; 22d, Hackensack; 26th, Brooklyn; February 2d, Brooklyn; 5th, Ogontz School, Pa.; 6th, Philadelphia; 7th, Whitinsville, Mass.; 11th, Jersey City.

GRAU and his company have gone and again we take up "the common round, the daily task," as before. Queer enough it seems, too, after all the gaiety of the past three weeks. The season closed with "The Marriage of Figaro."

People from abroad are inclined to make sport of us 'Friscans for our demonstrations of enjoyment during the opera season, but they do not stop to think that to the stay at homes this is a rare opportunity and the enjoyment is genuine. Never mind! We are growing, and it will soon be found that we not only can walk alone but have cut our eye teeth as well. San Francisco is a city with a musical future, and the day is not far distant when her possibilities will be recognized and she will step forward to take her place as one of the first cities of the world, even for music.

A word should be said regarding the performance on Tuesday night of "Tristan and Isolde," which was given for the first time in this city. Notwithstanding all the wise ones to the contrary, it was an exceedingly good performance and went off well. Reuss-Belce as Isolde did the best work she gave us in anything; only when she tried to rise above the tremendous orchestration did her voice sound harsh, but she gets the spirit of the thing and gave us a very realistic peformance. Louise Horner was, as always, satisfactory as Brangäne.

Reuss-Belce is not nice to look at when singing, as she uses the muscles of her mouth too hard and produces something like contortion; or, as the children would say, "she makes faces," but her work is conscientious and good, and when she does not feel obliged to scream above the orchestra her voice is pleasant to listen to. That is one thing in Wagner's scheme of things that seems a mistake. The orchestral work is so independent of the stage appurtenances that the orchestration has the effect of a great symphonic poem, and the voice is sacrificed to the orchestra rather than have the orchestral effects spoiled to spare the voice. But how many voices sound well when using such a colossal effort to keep up against an orchestral fortissimo?—and how many voices can stand it at all?

The local work has begun with renewed interest, the opera season having put the spirit of progress into students and professionals alike. Last Monday night Mrs. Ernest Lachmund, who has but recently returned from Berlin, where she was studying under Fraulein Koch, gave a most interesting and enjoyable recital of her work, both vocal and instrumental. She gave a number of songs, in which she was accompanied by Roscoe Warren Lucy, and sang some delightful Schumann numbers, also Rubinstein's "Du Bist wie Eine Blume," which of all was the best, being rendered with great tenderness and depth of expression. In her piano work Mrs. Lachmund shows splendid training and great personal ability. She has wrists of steel, and her playing has a certainty about it that gives one a feeling of uncommon pleasure in listening to her. She has an unusually fine technic, and phrases with an intelligence that shows the true artistic temperament. Her Chopin Polonaise was given with a fire rarely accorded it, and her Bach Gavotte was a gem. The Schumann Romance showed her depth of expression, and the "Revolutionary" Etude of Chopin was given in a tempo that increased its difficulties but brought out strongly the real character of the composition. Mrs. Lachmund is an acquisition to musical circles, and will be a welcome addition to the ranks of our first musicians.

The second of the Pasmore concerts is to take place in Maple Hall of the Palace Hotel, and the program promises to exceed any they have given before, even in the old days. The Pasmore Trio—Mary, Susan and Dorothy, violin, piano and 'cello—will again give some delightful selections, among which will be a "Petite Suite" by Mr. Pasmore himself, a charming composition. The soloists for the occasion will be Miss Adelaide Birchler, one of Mr. Pasmore's star pupils, and a contralto whose singing has attracted quite a little attention in former appearances; Dorothy Pasmore, the tiny 'cellist of the trio, and Mary, the talented young violinist. Besides these there is to be a complete rendering of Liza Lehman's "Persian Garden" setting, which Mr. Pasmore himself first introduced to a San Francisco audience. The accompanists for the evening will be Fred Maurer and Arthur Fickenscher.

The first concert of the Symphony season is to be given next Friday afternoon at the Grand Opera House, and a large audience is expected to be present. More than common interest is manifested in this movement, as the symphony subject itself is one around which has circled not a little argument and dissension. Paul Steindorff is the new leader, and, as it is his first taste of symphony work, there are many wise wags of the head as to results. A fine program has been prepared for the initial performance.

Next Saturday afternoon Lisser Hall, the new music hall at Mills College, is to be formally dedicated. There will be impressive exercises, and Mr. Lisser himself will play a Raff sonata for violin and piano with Minetti, the violinist.

Saturday is the date given for the second of the Zech Quartet concerts, in which Miss Chamberlain, pianist, will assist.

Mrs. A. Wedmore Jones.

$10,000 for the Best One Act Opera.

Rome, December 15, 1901.

SIGNOR SONZOGNO, whose prize of $10,000 offered for the best opera by an Italian was won by Mascagni, with "Cavalleria Rusticana," has now offered a similar prize for the best one-act opera in any language. He offers to produce the successful work at his own expense at Milan on the occasion of the international exhibition in 1904.—New York Sun.

Delina Peckham.—Mme. Delina Peckham, who is a native of Connecticut, and identified closely with the musical affairs of that State, has taken up her home permanently in this city, and expects a busy winter. For several years Madame Peckham came to this city a few days each week to give necessary lessons, but finding her classes increasing, it seemed best to live here altogether. Many of her Connecticut pupils have followed her to New York, as they prefer her teaching to any other.

Madame Peckham is a teacher of English, Italian, French and German songs and arias for church, concert and opera work. She also gives lessons in physical culture in connection with her vocal lessons. Madame Peckham teaches the old Italian method, but has gleaned the good from various teachers and adapted it to the needs of her pupils She is now planning to give a series of monthly recitals, beginning in the first week in December.

Before taking up teaching as her object in life she had attained much celebrity as a concert singer in New England, and on several occasions in New York and in Brooklyn received the most favorable comments from the newspapers on her singing. With an enthusiasm for her profession and the ability to obtain the interest and admiration of her pupils, Madame Peckham must add continually to their number and to the success of her studio.

AUGUSTA GLOSE.

MISS AUGUSTA GLOSE, whose picture accompanies this, is a pianist and a musician of pronounced gifts. She is making a reputation with a novelty that combines poetry with music and something from the dramatic art besides. Seated before the piano Miss Glose recites the words of art songs and those of more popular kind, playing at the same time the air and accompaniment. The idea is new and one that will appeal to many because the mental picture is enhanced by her presentations.

Miss Glose has made "a hit" in the musical comedy, "The Liberty Belles." She has been on the stage several years and her popularity is growing all the time. As a member of Charles Frohman's companies, Miss Glose appeared in "On and Off," "Because She Loved Him So" and "The Surprises of Love," and in all of these appeared to great advantage, as the reports in the daily press all show.

Miss Glose is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Adolf Glose, and she inherits talents from both parents. She played with her father in the Wagner duets arranged by him. That she should have thought out the specialty which she made her own proves that once in a while there is something new under the sun. With this brief sketch of Miss Glose we include the opinion of one critic:

Fifth avenue patrons of "The Liberty Belles" have recognized in Augusta Glose, the girl who talks her songs, a parlor entertainer who had great vogue with the smart set here during the past two years. It was while working as a society entertainer that Miss Glose conceived the catchy idea of chatting her songs. The novelty caught on immensely. It was a new sensation to have a pretty girl sit down to a piano, face her audience and, while playing her accompaniment, sometimes with one hand, again with both, recite the words of her song, to the rhythm of the tune. Not an easy thing to do, as you may imagine, for one has to be something of a contortionist to get away with the accompaniment gracefully and correctly under the circumstances, and the proper declamation of the song requires a knowledge of elocution above that possessed by the ordinary vocalist.

If you want to know just how nicely Miss Glose can do you must hear her render "Billet Doux" in the dormitory scene of the "Belles."

Miss Glose comes by her artistic gifts naturally. Her father is a professor of music in New York, and her uncle is a painter of note. He was the first man to put the Stars and Stripes on canvas in depicting a Revolutionary battle scene. Some enterprising news-gatherer announced this fact when she was engaged by Klaw & Erlanger. This and the name of the comedy gave rise to the impression that "The Liberty Belles" was a Colonial play, an impression that the managers had a hard time eradicating.

This is practically Miss Glose's first season on the stage, as her vaudeville engagement was brief. She claims to have no ambition to become an actress. When her engagement with "The Liberty Belles" is done she may go back to entertaining society and prosecuting her musical studies.—New York World, November 29.

AUGUSTA GLOSE.

Another critic says:

Miss Glose, who is a finished pianist, did some remarkably difficult work in a very finished way. She recited, not sang, the words of several beautiful melodies, at the same time playing the air and accompaniment on the piano, and rendering the idea of the poem by varied tone and facial expression, so artistically done as to leave a deeper impression than even the singing of the song. It is a new idea and will find much favor.

In the "Lesson With the Fan" song, by Guy d'Hardelot, she manipulates the fan with one hand, playing the piano with the other.

MARY HOWE.

THE well-known soprano Mary Howe, who returned to this country recently and who will shortly appear in concerts here, was asked for an interview by a contemporary, and she gave the following, which was printed under the heading of "Singing Before Royalty":

"Having been requested by the editor of the Vermonter to give an account of my appearance before Kaiser Wilhelm, at the Royal Opera House in Wiesbaden, I will endeavor to give an idea of the evening's performance, which was for me an occasion of great interest and satisfaction.

"The Royal Theatre at Wiesbaden ranks in its appointments, as in the beauty of its architecture, with the finest in the world, and, thanks to a generous subvention from the Prussian Government, is able to maintain a stock company of the very first rank, both for opera and the drama. Every class of opera, from the Wagner and classical repertory to the modern light operas, and all the dramatic works of Goethe, Schiller and Shakespeare, as well as modern society plays and comedies, are to be seen there, interpreted by first-rate artists.

"The orchestra, which in addition to its work in operatic performances gives every season a series of symphony concerts, is exclusively occupied at the theatre, and ranks with the famous orchestras of Dresden, Berlin and Vienna.

"Under the direction of Herr Intendant Georg von Huelsen, and owing to his great executive ability and artistic taste, the operatic and dramatic festivals (Festspiele) given in the month of May, at Wiesbaden, have attained a world-wide reputation. During the festival season Wiesbaden, with its miles of beautiful parks and lovely surrounding country, is seen at its best, and attracts tourists and art lovers from all parts of Europe and America.

"On the occasion of one of His Majesty's visits to Wiesbaden, in May, 1898, the opera chosen, 'auf allerhöshsten Befehl' (by royal command) was Rossini's masterpiece, 'The Barber of Seville,' and I was cast for the role of Rosina.

"As usual on state occasions, the theatre was elaborately decorated with garlands of flowers and foliage which produced, in combination with myriad electric lamps, an indescribably charming effect.

"The hour of the performance was set for 7:30, which for German custom is a late hour, the rule being 7 o'clock, or for extremely long works 6:30. On such occasions full dress is obligatory, and applause is not expected except as led by the Kaiser.

"The entrance of the royal party was heralded by prolonged flourishes by eight trumpeters dressed in ancient German costume, who were stationed at the centre of the second balcony. On the appearance of His Majesty in the royal box the audience rose, the Kaiser making the military salute, and afterward giving the signal for the performance to proceed. It would be unnecessary to describe the performance, which went as smoothly as one could wish.

"The artists certainly had no occasion to complain of any lack of recognition from His Majesty, who followed the piece with the keenest interest and applauded frequently.

"After the performance was concluded I was summoned to the royal box to receive the personal expression of the Kaiser's pleasure in listening to my singing. I was the more pleased at his approval, as it was quite evident from his conversation that he had a thorough understanding of musical art.

"In bearing most dignified, yet amiable, there was no trace of distant and forbidding royalty, but rather the perfect manner and kindly nature which we love to ascribe to the true gentleman. After some conversation about musical matters, carried on in English, and a cordial handshaking, with "Good-bye—I am very glad to have you at Wiesbaden,' my first experience in singing before royalty was at an end."

Miss Grace G. Gardner has a number of fine new voices, some of which are of great promise. Many of her former pupils are now professionals, and there is no question but that her work this year will add to the number.

THE conductors of symphony concerts are considerably agitated by the incessant applause which greets the soloists, and disgust is manifested at this habit of audiences at classical concerts. Then, pray, why not begin reform on the stage by desisting from applauding? Mr. Paur, Mr. Gericke and other conductors are in the habit of applauding the soloists that play and sing at the concerts where these conductors direct; it is most undignified and utterly at variance with good taste, and as long as it is persisted in on the part of the conductors, they must show no impatience when their audiences follow their example.

THERE need be no hesitation in agreeing with the caustic opinions of Mr. Finck of the Evening Post on Hugh A. Clark's stupid "Highways and Byways of Music," just published. This gentleman is professor of music at the University of Pennsylvania and he represents fossilized musical tendencies to the very verge of the incomprehensible. In addition to this he denominates himself a musical doctor, a degree that has been thoroughly discredited in the United States through the fact that hundreds of fakes and frauds in music have had it conferred upon themselves by all kinds of local or State schools.

WHILE reference is made to the fact that Patti, at her last concert in London, sang Wagner's "Träume" it must not be forgotten that, at the same concert, she also sang Arditi's "Il baccio," "Comin' Through the Rye" and "Home, Saccharine Home." No one can sing these songs as she does, but certainly they are not of the category to attract the musically intelligent. The only conclusion that can be reached is that Patti sings for the populace, and that she is not dependent upon the musician or his patronage. The musician seldom pays to attend any musical affairs, and Patti must have learned this long since, for she sings only for the people; otherwise her repertory would certainly have been changed many years ago.

IT has come to it at last that the Berlin music critics formed a combination for mutual protection. They want to change the system of modern criticism as practiced at present in the German capital. In the first place they intend to bring to public notice and legal punishment any cases of bribery that may crop out in the future. At the same time they want to try to fight against the ever increasing concert epidemic in Berlin by ignoring all concerts of mediocre artists, whose sole object in concertizing is to gain cheap notoriety through the press. The critics further agreed among themselves in this mutual protective union to force all old and worn out artists to abdicate a public concert career.

On the other hand, the adversaries of this Music Critics' Protective Union assert that the critics, by means of their contradictory reports, frequently stultify themselves to such an extent that they are now forced to combine in order to save their solidary reputation, which in the case of this protective union would seem to make a virtue of necessity.

ATTENTION is called to an article in this issue of the paper by Bernhard Listemann, of Chicago, called "Problems of Musical Life in America," in which the writer refers to the prevailing prejudice against American musicians here in their own country, and to the utter hopelessness of a successful career in music in America under present conditions. Mr. Listemann's essay is an eloquent indorsement of THE MUSICAL COURIER platform, which demands recognition for Americans and which calls for an abatement of the insane worship of foreign celebrities simply because they are foreign. To such an extent has this foreign fever infested our musical thought that even old, superannuated, worn-out vocalists, whose vocal cords are actually decayed, can come here to sing, as it is falsely called, in opera and concert—merely because they are foreign celebrities.

The American instrumental virtuoso has very small chances, and must first become a European celebrity before going for fair judgment before the world here, and as to orchestral players—Mr. Listemann hits the nail on the head—the orchestral player must be born in Europe before he can hope for any kind of remunerative occupation in the United States. Is it not farcical after all? It looks like a huge joke, but it is a grim one for certain people.

THE following item appeared in the cables of the New York Herald of Sunday:

The Opéra communicates to me the following, apropos of the début of Miss Abbott: "M. Affre, though indisposed, consented to play the role of Romeo, which M. Alvarez had refused to sing because he would not appear alongside of a débutante. Now M. Alvarez," terminates this "communiqué," "has been engaged for America under brilliant conditions."

They refuse to sing with Americans at both the Berlin and the Paris opera houses. This is due to the prejudices of the foreign artists entirely. Alvarez gets more money here in a month than he receives in Paris in a year, and yet he refuses to sing with an American débutante. French débutantes are constantly exploited with the regular forces at the Opéra. How much longer are the people of this country going to endure this nonsense?

DURING the month of November last Frank Van der Stucken's Symphonic Prologue, "William Ratcliff," was conducted by Dr. Franz Wüllner at the Second Gurznich concert at Cologne. His Symphonic Festival Prologue, "Pax Triumphans," was conducted at the first subscription concert in Brunswick by Court Conductor Hermann Riedel. During the same month Music Conductor Trenken conducted Van der Stucken's "Idylle," for orchestra, at Dresden; and Wagner's "The Two Grenadiers," instrumentated by Mr. Van der Stucken, was sung with great success at Queen's Hall, London, during the same month.

All this is possibly of interest to Mr. Van der Stucken's colleagues in Boston, Chicago and other cities, including New York. It seems to us that the activities of a conductor might overflow into the field of composition, provided that he has abilities to compose.

THE cable reports about Paderewski's Polish agitation are to say the least exceedingly exaggerated. The concert in question took place not at Berlin, but at Posen, where the Polish element predominates, and it is no wonder therefore that the numerous Polish barons and magnates who attended the concert lavished upon their celebrated countryman wreaths and bouquets, with ribbons in the national colors, red and white. Similar honors were conferred upon Seidl here by his Hungarian friends more than once, and upon other artists also by their respective proud and exhilarated countrymen. That part of the receipts of the concert were to go to a fund for the support of poor parents concerned in the Wreschen school scandals looks more like Paderewski's well-known kindness of heart than like an anti-German demonstration, for there are many Germans also not of Polish descent who do not believe that the Government's action in this matter was either a wise or a commendable one. Only a few days after the Posen concert Paderewski played before their majesties the King and Queen of Saxony at the Royal Castle in Dresden, which fact does not look as if their Royal Highnesses believed him to be a Polish agitator or political intriguer. In Berlin Paderewski did not play, and will never play again, all talk to the contrary notwithstanding. He was insulted there once and treated most unfairly under the régime of the late Hans von Bülow, and Paderewski is not the sort of man ever to forget an insult.

THE experiment of playing Beethoven's violin concerto will be made at the popular concert in the Metropolitan Opera House next Sunday night. Apart from the novelty of such a work on a program usually devoted to ear tickling music, the violinist is to be Jan Kubelik, a virtuoso whose methods seem hardly in harmony with the profound and noble music of Beethoven. We have called it an experiment, and it is one that we await with much curiosity.

CORDIAL welcome should be extended to Emil Sauer's autobiographical work, "My World; Pictures from the Secret Drawers of My Art and My Life." (Meine Welt; Berlin and Stuttgart, W. Spemann.) Interesting as Sauer is as a pianist and musician he is at the same time a writer full of the powers of narrative, forcible in descriptive style, and instructive as a logician and philosopher. His book gives many illustrations of prevalent conditions of the musical life of Europe, and in relating his American experiences he does not hesitate to give the reasons for the dismissal of the late Albert Steinberg, the critic of music from the New York Herald, besides disclosing what from his point of view were the secret motives that were at work to thwart his success here, although the operations proved to be unsuccessful in his case. It is a question whether Mr. Sauer can produce any material evidence to prove his statement to the effect that Steinberg's favorable criticism resulted in complaints of a piano manufacturing house, with the result referred to.

No critic would ever be dismissed or suspended from this paper on complaint of a patron, for that would at once be an acknowledgment of subservience equivalent to journalistic annihilation, and, very naturally, it cannot be impressed upon us that the New York Herald is any less independent than this paper.

Mr. Sauer may have opened an interesting discussion with his book, but even apart from this it is worthy of a place in the literature of music, and it would be profitable to publish an English translation.

THE London Musical Standard announces its intention of discontinuing to notice concerts unless there is anything special to say of public interest. But how can this be discovered until the concert takes place? How are critics and reporters on events in music to know whether there is anything to be said until they attend to listen to what is being done? They cannot condemn before the event by refusing to entertain it.

This brings us right down to the very kernel of the thing by asking: "Why are concerts given anyway?" Answer: Because débutants wish to make débuts so that they may learn whether they are artists or producers of artistic effects. The students desire to enter the profession, and in the profession there are a number of careers that require public and critical indorsement which can come only by means of a public appearance and hence we have so many concerts. Appearances are not limited to one city, for it is now necessary to make public appearances here, too, besides those already made in Europe, so that an independent American status may be obtained.

Now, then, suppose the critics of music refuse to attend and report on such concerts? Then there would be no object in giving them. To criticise the concerts by refusing to attend would be highly unjust and would constitute the very worst condemnation, for it would signify that in the estimation of the critic the persons who are to play or sing are not even worth listening to. It is obvious that such a course cannot be successful.

The daily papers of this city have solved the question and with many papers in Europe the same rule obtains. They simply refuse to send their critics to concerts unless the managers or artists first recognize the paper by advertising themselves or the special concerts and recitals to be given in its columns; thereupon the critic attends. This is not unjust and the absence of the critic does not constitute a stigma upon the concert giver. The London Musical Standard might adopt that plan; it is commercially and financially unobjectionable; it has an ethical basis, for it establishes a rule that is mutual in its operations and it prevents a misconstruction in case a criticism of a concert should not appear in the columns of the paper. No greater blow can be delivered against a musical artist than to be passed in silence or ignored by a musical paper of influence, power and circulation; the blow is of greater severity than the most trenchant or even biased criticism—if there is such a thing as unbiased criticism. Can the London Musical Standard tell us whether such criticism really exists?

ACCORDING to the records last Monday, December 16, was the one hundred and thirty-first anniversary of the birth of Ludwig van Beethoven. While the date of the great composer's birth remains one of the uncertainties in the history of music, the modern world of music cannot too often proclaim the name—Beethoven, a name that towers above all names. Young people for generations to come must be inspired when they read the life of Beethoven. All men of genius are not noble-hearted, but Beethoven regarded duty as the watchword of his life. His spiritual insight was as keen as his creative faculty was great. In writing about Beethoven, adjectives seem inadequate. In these times, when the altruistic spirit is abroad, it is comforting to read what Beethoven himself wrote regarding the Brotherhood of Man:

"From my childhood, whenever my art could be serviceable to poor, suffering humanity, I have never required anything beyond the heartfelt gratification that it always caused me."

MR. KLEIN IS RIGHT.

IT is very doubtful if Hermann Klein used any expressions that justify the spirit of sarcasm manifested in the following cablegram published in the New York World of December 13:

HE IS COMING TO TEACH US ENGLISH.

H. KLEIN, ANGLICIZED GERMAN, THINKS OUR ENUNCIATION IS WRETCHED.

LONDON, December 12.—Hermann Klein, widely known here as a singing teacher and one time a musical critic, will sail for the United States on Saturday with the avowed intention of carrying the torch of enlightenment as to the English language into what he declares to be a dark country in respect to that tongue.

Mr. Klein is an Anglicized German, and, like the convert from one religion to another, is an ardent devotee at the shrine of the new—a purist as to the language of his adoption. In view of the intending departure of the melodic pedagogue for the land of the red man and the buffalo, leaders of the English musical world honored him with a banquet to-night at Prince's restaurant. Among the distinguished company present were Sir Frederick Bridge, Alberto Randegger, Paolo Tosti, Albert Visetti, Alfred Rothschild and Sir Arthur Trendell.

Sir Arthur Trendell presided. Extraordinary criticism was made of American vocalists. The speakers declared that Americans spend money lavishly in the musical schools of Europe, yet only succeed in learning how to sing in every language except their own.

Mr. Klein, amid applause, said that Americans, although they have wonderful voices, do not know how to speak the English language. He ingeniously admitted that he is going over with the object of remedying this defect.

The American colony here, the members of which are slowly learning how to converse with the natives, and are fast forgetting the Indian language, with its picturesque gutturals, are overjoyed at the prospect of Mr. Klein's altruistic move. They conclude that the Berlin linguistic theorist, with his expansive genius, will quickly inoculate the whole of America with the germ of his superior intelligence, and that they may eventually return home for a visit with the assurance that they will not be set down as foreign devils because of their cultivated speech, and shall thereby escape burning at the stake to make a barbecue holiday in Central Park.

But if he did say so he is very much in the right, for the very good and natural reason that there is no cause and no justification for enunciating English in song over here in the United States BECAUSE the opera here is sung in Italian, French or German, or all three together in the polyglot performance that frequently takes place, and also BECAUSE even in the oratorios with English text foreign singers are frequently engaged to do the English singing, and BECAUSE American singers are not able to make any money, even when they give great recitals of great and new songs, such as George Hamlin, with his Richard Strauss Cycle, presented last week, and with $16 receipts in New York city. Had it been Georgibusky Hamlinski, of Gregorowitchkiville, Umbillicumunkey, Turkestan, singing in a language which no one could understand, he would have had $1,600 in the house; the name alone would have done it, and with long hair hanging over his unshampooed skull $408 more would have been taken in at the door.

Why should Americans study English pronunciation and enunciation, as applied to the vocal art, when they have no paying opportunity to sing such songs, the whole professional work and opportunity being snatched from them by the annual invasion of foreign singers!

The law of supply and demand controls these matters as it does the sale and purchase of cereals, fruits, leather, iron or traffic and transportation or publication. There being no demand here for English songs by Americans, Americans have had no reason to supply them and the study of English as applied to such purpose could not exist. Vocal teachers here are chiefly occupied in instructing their pupils in Italian, German or French diction. Mr. Hermann Klein is right in saying what the cables say he said, but even after he gets his pupils here and shows them how to sing properly in English how are they going to secure the opportunity to do so in public and for money? They cannot go on forever and sing in public for nothing, and where are they going to sing in English (or otherwise even) for cash? Even vocalists need some cash; they cannot do it for love always.

COMMUNICATED.

The Art Club, of Philadelphia, which only a few years ago admitted architects and musicians into its artist membership, on half dues, at its last meeting rescinded this by-law, and thereby practically took from the artist membership both architects and musicians. It was claimed that the financial conditions of the architect differed so far from the artist painter that he did not only receive remuneration for his designing and planning, but also a percentage from the actual building expense, and that therefore he was, in the largest portion of his income, a business man. There seems to be a shade of truth in this position, but why an artistic architect should cease to be regarded as an artist because of some extraneous emolument is difficult to see. In extending this view to the musician, however, a mistake has been made that is not devoid of a grim humor. In the meeting protests were raised by several architects and also by Constantin von Sternberg, whose remarks were not successful as far as the voting was concerned, but, nevertheless, elicited repeated outbursts of applause.

He said, in brief: "Those who do not know me personally may suspect that I, in my protest against this measure, have a mercenary or at least financial motive. They can easily be corrected by those who do know me. I protest because there is an element of rank injustice in the motion before the house. It has been said that into the profession of an architect the element of commerce enters in a large measure. My knowledge of architecture lies entirely on its art side, and I can therefore not judge this question of commerce. If it is so, the architects will magnanimously concur in this view and voluntarily relinquish their artist membership. If it is not so, they are intellectually and numerically strong enough in this club to fight their own battles. I speak for the six musicians in this club. Into our profession the element of commerce does not enter unless you call the honest earning of a living commerce. We compose or play or sing, or we teach others to compose or play or sing. Our every effort is directed toward one of the chiefest graces of life. You may call these efforts art or a profession or trade or labor—choose the term according to your own educational standard or according to your powers of appreciation—but you cannot call them commerce! We do things, we do not do people! Aside from these considerations, the motion before the house is in direct opposition to the spirit of the times, which is one of expansion and not of contraction. Years ago you had broadened your ideas of art, and by shrinking them again you sign a testimonium paupertatis. If you will raise the dues of all the artists in the club I will cheerfully accept it and welcome the flattering estimate upon my financial status; but I emphatically object to my profession being discriminated against as to its being one of the fine arts."

The meeting, however, was "stuffed." The measure was railroaded through in short order, and for once Constantin did not carry his point; but the defeat redounds more to his honor than the victory to that of the victors.

This communication was received and it was intended that THE MUSICAL COURIER should endorse Mr. von Sternberg's proposition. This is impossible. "We compose," he says. When you compose you dispose of your composition or secure a royalty on its sale (if you can, either, or both); that is a commercial proposition. Sometimes the highest bidder gets the manuscript just as the highest bidder gets the painting; just as the lowest bidder among architects (everything else being equal) gets the contract. "We play," Mr. von Sternberg says, and yet unless the emolument is paid to Mr. von Sternberg he will not, as he cannot in justice to his reputation, play. "We sing"—yes, Patti for $5,000 a night; Melba for $1,500 a night; Eames for $300 a night; just as the commercial value calls for it. Some singers sing for $50, some for $25 a night, but the $ sign is always to be found in the contract unless they are such fools as to sing gratuitously.

"We teach others." Free of charge? No, because then your own low estimates of your own abilities would prevent anyone from taking lessons from you. You, therefore, charge $ $ $ for your teaching. Your compositions, your singing, your playing, your teaching, has a barometrical schedule, as it were, away up or away down in accordance with your reputation. If your reputation draws up goes the figure; if it does not draw, down it falls, but the figure is the $ sign.

The misfortune with those who are artists or who are inspired with the idea that they are artists or should be enrolled among artists is the false basis upon which their views of life are founded; they insist upon discarding the vital principle; in other words they obscure the bright, illuminating light of truth and believing that art and commerce are antagonistic they consider a consideration of money as an infection that will injure their status—that will defile their atmosphere. Did Beethoven reject the fee sent to him by the London Philharmonic. Was not Richard Wagner a superb financial genius (he actually raised money out of nothing and frequently had such a lapsus of memory that he actually forgot to repay loans—a sure sign of musical genius we have learned). And Liszt? was not he a money maker. And Paderewski? is he not acquainted with the fluctuations of the bourses? And Rosenthal? does he not figure on contracts? And Brahms? did he not negotiate with Simrock on his fourth symphony? And Rubinstein? Did he not put a minimum figure on his proposed second American tour, to which he adhered so tenaciously that negotiations were broken off.

And does not Leschetizky charge? And does not Jedliczka charge? And does not Martin Krause charge? And did not Rheinberger charge? And does not William Mason charge? And why should they not charge and charge heavily? They instruct; they teach, they confer capital upon their pupils in the shape of knowledge. And Constantinius of the City of Universal Love, does not he charge? He should charge, for he is a bully teacher, and he must make money to pay club dues; he would not accept membership as a gift, for he then would sacrifice the necessary equality.

Musicians of all kinds would become capitalists if they would only look upon their profession as a valuable adjunct of the social state, which is to recognize it as one of those features that demand the same practical recognition accorded by society to architects, painters, sculptors, engineers, poets, prose writers, physicians and electricians and others. It never injured Richard Wagner because he understood financing, nor has it hurt Paderewski. It is sad for any musician and constitutes an injury to his career if he is associated with poverty, and frequently it is unjustly supposed that because he is poor he cannot be a musician of consequence. If he is wealthy it certainly will not reduce the demand for his songs; but if he proposes that music is apart from commerce as a profession he gets into ideal altitudes that blind him to the realities of life and prevent him from appreciating solid facts. Even the paper upon which he composes is manufactured and must be purchased. If he sees in his manuscript merely a revolution in art or the next stage of development after Richard Strauss it is probable that the work will never be played, because in his exaltation he will forget to pay his board, and he will be put out on the street and get chilblains and pneumonia, and that puts a stop to Heldenleben, and after such a death there will be no apotheosis. Music means money; if there is no money there can be no music.

The Art Club, of Philadelphia, made itself ridiculous by rescinding that particular by-law unless it passes an amendment which compels its artist members to give their pictures away and not accept money for them. As long as the painters get money for portraits and pictures they belong to the same category with all human beings who work for money. Rubens made about a million. Van Dyck became wealthy, and many painters to-day are measured in their art by the prices they charge. Go to! Why should an artistic mind become so oblique in its vision as not to see facts and truths as they stand before us nearly hourly!

GERMANY is fast becoming Americanized. The Signale records with astonishment that the "Bunte Brettl," of Berlin, gave two performances at different places on the same evening, and explains how the ladies and gentlemen, after having done their "stunts" at the Alexander Platz, drove off to the Philharmonie, while the performers at the Philharmonie drove to the Alexander Platz.

SHORTER PROGRAMS

EVERY season the question recurs, Why do orchestral conductors make up their programs as if quantity and not quality is the desideratum? Mr. Paur is a notable case, and Mr. Gericke, usually so solicitous in the matter, committed the offense of piling upon us last week at one sitting the following mixture: An overture, Goldmark; a violin concerto, Vieuxtemps; a forty minutes long symphonic poem by Richard Strauss—and a Beethoven symphony! Now we contend this is too much to reasonably digest at one concert. Not alone the variety, but the great length. A popular concert with a program consisting of short numbers, several solo performers and an intermission may cross the two hour limit; but as a rule one hour and a half is sufficient for serious music. Then the brain can absorb and quietly ruminate the material offered. Mr. Gericke's program last Saturday afternoon was a model—concise and well contrasted: An overture, Elgar; a concerto, Chopin; a symphony, Brahms. Not including the intermission, the time consumed was about ninety minutes. Mr. Paur for the Philharmonic concert this week presents another deadly array: An overture, Beethoven; a new symphony, Hadley; a long symphonic poem, Strauss, besides two violin numbers, encores not included, for the Philharmonic Society has not yet emerged from barbarism in this respect. Too long by several numbers. Make your programs shorter!

IF people wish to ascertain what is going on they must leave home and find out. This is not merely an old dilapidated maxim; it is as fresh as it was before the Christian Era, and is applicable as it was in the days of Confucius, to whom it is attributed.

AT LAST! Out on Lake Erie, in the city of Cleveland, a paper called the Press is printed and read, too, and in its December 2, 1901, issue it published an item of news, with great head lines and in display type, which we here reproduce:

TO CORNER THE MUSIC MARKET.

Two Cleveland Men Will Try to Form a Novel Trust.

A huge music trust, to include all the band and orchestral players, vocalists and soloists in the United States and Canada, is being exploited and promoted by Rudolph Berliner and Harold J. Bradbury, of this city.

They claim to have the approval and co-operation of Sousa, De Reszké and over 1,000 other people of influence in the world of music. The promoters say they will have a central agency, from which talent will be distributed according to demands.

The plan is to corner and control the musical ability just as the theatrical trust has gobbled up the theatrical business.

That is the thing and the very thing we needed most in music; but the only discouraging feature is the fact that De Reszké is to be one of the stars, for this shows that it is again a foreign scheme. However, if all of Canada is to be exploited, as it appears, why, then, of course, the native element will predominate, for our Canadian musicians with incomes of less than $500 a year are nearly all born on American soil; when they have a larger income they generally come from a foreign country.

We are also delighted to find that there are more than 1,000 people of influence in the world of music. The statement is somewhat vague and subject to several transmutable interpretations. Are there 1,000 people meant to be influential in the world of music or are they in the world of music and influential or are they in the world of music and therefore influential or are they in the world of music and influential outside of it? We hope they are all put together, for that would remove all doubt.

When the lion and the lamb lie down together, on that same afternoon the band players, orchestral players, vocalists and soloists will also all lie together—in unisono, so to speak as it were. At the present moment there is just as much difference in the relative castes of musicians as there is between some of the many Hindoo castes and just as little intercourse between the various castes in the professions of music as there is between these variegated Eastern castes; any attempt to bring them into one homogeneous fold would be as futile as its proposition is idiotic. Why should a band player or an orchestral clarionetist playing in a dime museum in Sioux Falls condescend to join a movement that allies him with American vocalists who are not even recognized at home in the land of their birth?

A Precious Tear.

[An American woman carries about with her a crystal locket in which she claims that one of M. Paderewski's tears is enshrined.—Daily paper.]

When the day is dark and dreary,
And my heart is worn and weary,
Then I fumble in my dress about the rear
Till I find the cunning pocket
Whence I take this crystal locket,
And I gaze on Paderewski's precious tear.

Women friends to whom I've shown it
Say they'd give the world to own it,
And they offer me the ransom of a peer—
Which they'd give with satisfaction
For a teeny weeny fraction
Of my master Paderewski's precious tear.

And they come in hundreds thronging
And they gaze with eyes of longing
On the relic in its crystal bright and clear;
But although they madly covet
Far too dearly do I love it
To distribute Paderewski's precious tear.

For I watched it slowly straying
Down his nose as he was playing,
And I vowed a vow 'twixt trembling hope and fear—
If I caught it I would perish
Ere I ever ceased to cherish
In its crystal Paderewski's precious tear.

So when Philistines unsoully
Come and mock my relic holy
With a vulgar jest and idiotic sneer,
Then again I seek the pocket
And restore the crystal locket
Which contains my Paderewski's precious tear.

IN Mendelssohn Hall last Thursday afternoon George Hamlin, the tenor, gave a recital devoted to songs by Richard Strauss. This was his program:

Opus 10—Zuneigung.
Die Nacht.
Die Georgine.
Allerseelen.
Opus 17—Seitdem dein Aug' in meines shaute.
Das Geheimniss.
Ständchen.
Opus 19—Wie Sollten wir geheim sie halten.
Breit über mein Haupt.
Hoffen und wieder verzagen.
Opus 21—All' mein Gedanken, mein Herz und mein Sinn.
Du meines Herzens Kronelein.
Ach Lieb, ich muss nun scheiden.
Ach weh mir unglückhaftem Mann.
Opus 27—Heimliche Aufforderung.
Morgen.
Cäcilie.

This selection was culled from the earlier Strauss, the songs written in his lyrical period of transition while there were still humming in his ears reminiscences of Schubert, Schumann and Brahms, and before he had jettisoned his entire cargo of musical convention. Not that these songs—at least not the majority of them—are word-bound, not that he allows the text to determine obviously the angle of his musical arc, but simply that in these he remembers his classic training to keep it sacred. The later Strauss acknowledges no gods of music save himself—this he has voiced in the music of his "Heldenleben." Yet there is scarcely a more interesting index to the man than just these early songs. You follow some of them in amazement to find that he consumes almost the text entire to establish only his thesis and wonder how in the name of melos he is going to back out of this musical cul de sac. But you have figured without your host: a sudden transition, a brusque curve and the field opens before you. Then you realize that the problem was born only in your imagination—for Strauss it had never existed. His originality in matters of form is prodigious. And is it not refreshing to escape the puritanic lines of the eternal "durch-componiertes Lied"? Schubert, greatest of all song writers, was often hide-bound in this respect and many of his tremendous songs are easily divorcible from the text; not so with Strauss, his songs are a unit of word and music.

Of course, he did not design these compositions for the Kindergarten, his pattern is never "neat," nor does the thing flow glibly of the singer's tongue; which difficulties stand seriously in the way of popularity. And why should Strauss become popular? Is Beethoven popular? Heaven forbid! Buttonhole any of the numerous professed Beethoven admirers, haul him up short and hammer a confession out of him, above all coax him to talk intimately about the rude man from Bonn, and you will find that he believes Beethoven to be a necessary belief for one's musical creed—much in the same way that to most people the spring is a season of the year in which one takes medicine. Of the giant Beethoven he knows absolutely nothing, but firmly believes that he has slid gracefully down the altar steps of art if he can manage to keep awake during an entire symphony.

I fear Strauss will become a fad—the mob lets no tidbit of prominence escape its maw, but the worship will be one of hollow words, since few people can sing Strauss and fewer still understand him.

Mr. Hamlin did surprisingly well with these songs. There had come to him just before the concert the lamentable news that death had visited his family and in view of this his bravery in singing was more than remarkable. In all of these numbers he strove for the spirit of the song and resorted to no illegitimate tricks in order to get atmosphere. His mezza-voce was used to lovely advantage in contrasting his climaxes, and his phrasing throughout meaningful. He is that rara avis, a musical tenor. The accompaniments, on which the composer has reckoned heavily in his scheme, were artistically played by Victor Harris.

The betrothal of Maurice Maeterlinck to Georgette Leblanc is announced by the cables. Hasn't Maurice the Mystic been married to Georgette the Wayward for some years? C'est la même chose en français! She is a young woman of beauty and has her caprices.

Emil Paur told me a story the other day of a Viennese composer and Franz Liszt. At a musical gathering Liszt played the manuscript fugue by the young man, and as was his habit interpolated all sorts of effects, building up a coda which astonished everyone. Congratulations were heaped upon the composer; he protested: "But it is not the way I wrote the fugue." All smiled at his naïve modesty, and the Master was rated lucky in having discovered such a genius. The sequel did not prove pleasant, for when the fugue was given in concert it fell flat; and those who had heard it in private declared that the composer had changed it. Liszt simply had adhered rigidly to the score the second time.

The many friends and admirers of Rupert Hughes will be glad to hear that he has returned to his beloved New York. Mr. Hughes was in London two years engaged upon several important works. He has edited and brought to the point of publication a dictionary of music and musicians, himself a copious contributor to it. He has also found time—though God knows where—to set verses of James Whitcomb Riley to music and publish a long poem. It would not surprise me to learn that he has a novel up his sleeve. The poem is called "Gyges' Ring," and is a dramatic monologue, a form dear to Robert Browning. The story is an old one: readers of Herodotus and Theophile Gautier may recall it. Mr. Hughes—whose versatility is bounded on the north by his modesty and on the south by talent, the east and west being as yet unexplored tracts—treats his theme with Swinburnian frankness, and discovers poetic gifts of no mean order. His phrasing is musical, his narrative powers strong. The asides are illuminating and dramatic. Not yet "midway in this mortal life," I wish that Mr. Hughes would elect to pluck from the sheaf of his bewildering possibilities one art and play upon it to its utmost capacity.

I have been re-reading with unqualified pleasure two slender volumes written in delicate and distinguished prose. Ten years ago Prof. Lewis F. Mott, Ph.D., of the College of the City of New York, put forth an essay entitled "Dante and Beatrice," which revealed him as a loving interpreter of that great builder of lofty Terza Rima. As a contribution to Dante literature it is chiefly remarkable for the view that "'The Divine Comedy' is not a magnificent mausoleum in which he has entombed his feeling for Beatrice, amid all the miracles of mediæval art, but rather a garden in which his love grows ripe." This is the love so marvelously pictured in the "Vita Nuova," of which the later work is the logical and poetic sequel. The idea is a happy one. Professor Mott's newest contribution is a study of "The Provençal Lyric"—not the Provence of Frédéric Mistral and his Félibres, but the sweet music makers of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, troubadours whose names sound to us a faint echo. It is a study penetrating, sympathetic, and by its inclusion of translated lyrics of great value. Has not Professor Mott wooed the elusive goddess of rhythmic numbers?

Richard Mansfield tells many stories of Madame Rudersdorff. Here is one of them: While the singer's company was playing an engagement in Dublin she was forced to give an aspiring but utterly incapable relative of one of the managers a trial in an important role. The young Irishman was awkward on the stage, and was especially unfortunate in continually stepping on Madame Rudersdorff's long train. It seemed to have a sort of fatal fascination about it, and, try as he would, he could scarcely come upon the stage without rushing directly upon it.

After warning him several times to be more careful she exclaimed in an aside not loud but deep: "If you step on my dress again I will trip you up!"

A moment later she made the threat good. While the young aspirant was approaching her in amateurish ardor, she grasped her skirt and gave a quick step to one side, and her colleague measured his length on the stage.

He quickly sprang to his feet and attempted to continue, but there was no use trying. The whole house was shrieking with laughter. The effect of the incident was not lost upon the Irish audience, and its sympathies were all with the lady.

The relation of mysticism in poetry to music is the broader subject which Ernest Newman treats in the Atlantic for this month, although the title reads "Maeterlinck and Music." Like Walter Pater and many others, he finds that music is the most perfect of the arts, because its medium is least intractable and its appeal most direct and swift. But this perfection is achieved only through some narrowing of scope and subject After showing the analogy between Maeterlinck's mysticism and the later music of Wagner he finds their common formula of art inadequate:

"Mysticism has this in common with music: that it gives voice to the broader, more generalized feelings of mankind, and hesitates to come into contact with the less ecstatic faculties that are exercised upon the harder facts of life. Maeterlinck, like Wagner, tries to lay hold upon the universal in art; but he does so simply because—again like Wagner—he is comparatively insensitive to other stimuli. And as Wagner's æsthetic holds good only of a musical drama like his own, so Maeterlinck's theory of drama is completely valid only for those who share his general attitude toward life and knowledge. If in the semi-swoon of the faculties before the abyss of the universal we come closest to the real root of things, then is there nothing to be added to or taken from Maeterlinck's statement of the essence of the drama. If, on the other hand, the evolution of the more acutely specialized perceptions in us points to our need of a mental system that shall embrace ever more and more of the phenomena of the world, then must we have an art that shall shape these perceptions into a beauty of their own. * * * But just as the poet relinquishes some of the formal perfection of the musician, finding his compensation in his power to touch a wider range of things, so the realist finds in the bracing, ever interesting contact with the cruder facts of life something that compensates him for missing the broader peace of the mystic—a sense of personality, of struggle with and dominion over inimical forces, that the languor of mysticism cannot provide."

Count S. C. de Soissons contributes to the Contemporary Review a thoughtful essay on "Dilettantism in French Literature." Renan he finds to be the father of this tendency, and Anatole France, Jules Lemaître and Maurice Barrés his worthy disciples. The critic is merciless in his denunciation of an attitude that reduces life to a spectacle and the individual to a series of impressions. Such a philosophy results in a very ignoble egotism. "One might think," writes the Count de Soissons, "that the question was about a purely speculative egotism. Not at all."

It is difficult to forget with what delicacy of heart Renan rejoices at not being present at the death of his beloved sister and thus avoiding disagreeable impressions. From the pure heights on which Christianity brought up his youth, from enthusiasm for the truth and for the progress of humanity, Renan—in direct opposition to Taine, whose broad and honest mind marched continually up from darkness to light—descended more and more, until finally he came to preach Epicureanism and celebrate good living as the only aim of life. The last lesson which in his old age he gave to the young people of his time expresses in cynical words an intellectual and moral rule of dilettantism: "Dear children, it is not worth while to torment your heads in order to change one error into another. Amuse yourself because you are twenty years old."

It is not necessary to try to overthrow such doctrines; they fall down of themselves. The only argument which is efficacious against the theory of egotism is to show that it makes an error in its calculations, that it does not given the pleasure it promises. It is a certain thing that dilettanti renounce the greatest pleasure of life, which is to be conscious of possessing real truth, and to set one's actions according to it; to look boldly into destiny and walk courageously, without fear and hesitation, by the road which leads to the summit of the ideal. How is it possible that philosophers who have made a most thorough analysis of pleasure do not see in it perfection, the flower of the energy of the deed? To cease to act, or to act without knowing why—in a word, to become indifferent to action—is the same as to give up real pleasure and to stop the source from which satisfaction flows so abundantly.

James McNeil Whistler was recently dining with a friend in London. Suddenly, when all had dined and were back in the drawing-room, Whistler said he had almost forgotten it, but he absolutely must write a letter and get it off by the night's post. He was told that in a room at the head of the first flight of stairs he would find the lights burning and pens, paper and ink at his disposal. He went up, and presently there was heard a series of bumps, ending in a heavy thud at the foot of the stairs. The master had tripped, lost his balance and come near having a bad fall. The host ran to him and asked if he was hurt. "I am not killed, if that's what you mean!" Whistler replied; "but tell me, who built those stairs?" The host mentioned a builder unknown either to Whistler or to fame. "Humph, he did, eh? The damned teetotaler," said Whistler.

"Whenever I hear a brass band," says a contemporary, "it reminds me of a funny thing that happened in my part of the city some years ago. It was a time when the brass band was enjoying a rather unique and original popularity in this section of the country, and especially among members of the negro race. And, by the way, I might remark that the brass band has a curious fascination for the negro. If he can hear the blast of horns and the thump and rattle of drums it makes but little difference to him whether there is anything in the larder at home or not. And if by hook or crook he can get into a band organization of some sort, and can wear a uniform, so much the better.

"Some years ago a band was organized in Algiers by rather a shrewd negro who dropped into town, and the fellow played the game up until he had every negro in that section of New Orleans band struck. At night one could hear horns tooting in every part of Algiers, and on the slightest provocation the band would be pressed into service. No entertainment, no dance, no festival, no occasion, in fact, was complete without the brass band. But the musical organization reached the zenith of its popularity when it came to a funeral. The negro who was buried without being marched to the tomb to the tune of the brass band—well, he simply was put away in half-decent shape. His family was snubbed. On funeral occasions it was the custom to hire the band for so many hours. The longer the band played the greater the homage paid the dead man, and the more impressive was the ceremony. I recall an instance of where a well-known negro died some years ago and the family had followed the custom of arranging for the band to head the cortège. 'How long does you want us to play?' asked the bandmaster. ''Bout two hours,' was the reply. The dead man did not live far from the cemetery. Services were held at the church. The march was made to the tomb. The band had kept blasting during the march, grinding out the most doleful airs imaginable. The cemetery was reached. A member of the famliy who had hired the band pulled out a watch, looked serious and whispered something to a friend, who in turn looked at his watch. 'Dey hasn't played but one hour,' said the dead man's relative. 'Dey sho' hasn't,' replied the friend. Something was whispered to the bandmaster, and in a short while the procession was made up again, and the band began to toot and blast over the route again until the other hour was consumed, and then the body was placed in the tomb and the funeral was over."

Henrik Ibsen, the Norwegian dramatist, was one day at dinner asked by a gushing maid how many words he wrote per day. Replied he:

"My dear miss, I haven't written a single word in ten years!"

Of course his questioner and those who happened to overhear the conversation were fairly startled. One of the party was bold enough to say it was incredible, drawing especial attention to the fact that the poet's work, "When We Dead Awake," had just run off the press, adding triumphantly:

"Now, Master, you don't mean to say you didn't write that?" And then the Norse skeptic unbent and explained:

"I did not write that play. I merely thought it out. My secretary wrote it."

A wag in the Tribune tells this funny story: The solemn exercises at the funeral of Mr. Black, a wealthy Brooklynite, last week were marred by a most untoward occurrence. He was a man of fads, but the one consuming fad of his existence was for musical instruments—not the ordinary piano and organ, but mechanical devices whereby harmonies were sounded by unseen forces. For instance, as one entered the house some secret connection with the door started the flattering strains of "Hail to the Chief," to the accompaniment of which the astonished guest was ushered into the reception room. Clocks of every sort sounded fitting music to the passing hours; in short, every piece of furniture in the house seemed in some way connected with a hidden orchestra.

Mr. Black's death was untimely; a hand organ, with a new and wonderful combination of every orchestral instrument that blares, suddenly began a concert in front of his house. In his eagerness to examine this new musical marvel, Mr. Black tripped and fell down the long staircase, and his life paid the penalty of this final pursuit of his ideal.

Before the funeral extreme care was taken to silence all the harmonies in the house. For two days servants labored diligently disconnecting wires and removing offending furniture. At last they rested from their labors and the last sad hour arrived. The exercises were conducted in the house, and as the minister was concluding his panegyric on the departed a belated mourner entered and was shown to the one empty seat, a chair in an obscure corner. Silently the late comer tiptoed to the chair and quietly sank into its depths.

Instantly there pealed forth a loud chord and then without interruption there came forth the loud strident notes of "There'll Be a Hot Time in the Old Town To-night." All efforts to silence the music were futile. In notes that drowned the minister and were plainly audible for blocks the music continued, and not until the last strain had died away was the minister able to conclude his remarks.

CINCINNATI

CINCINNATI, December 14, 1901.

THE second Symphony concert yesterday afternoon in Music Hall was an impressive one.

The orchestra, under the baton of Mr. Van der Stucken, gave the Svendsen Symphony a reading which fully met the demands of its inner spirit and technical requirements. The conception of the conductor was dignified, lofty and searching, bringing to the light of appreciation its many beauties. He held the orchestral divisions under admirable control and they responded to him with directness of purpose and unswerving fidelity. It is not saying too much that the orchestra was earnest in demonstrating the fact that its forces are better in quality and in the force of cohesiveness than at any previous season. The general improvement in the woodwind and brasses made itself plainly felt. The attack was prompt, decisive, the intonation without fault. If a little blurring in the brass in the first movement be excepted, nothing occurred that would have marred its perfect enjoyment. The coda, at its close, was played with a good deal of verve and brilliancy. In the andante the character of the woodwind was finely sustained. The tone of the first horn was soul uplifting in the crescendo and vibrated with life in the sustaining of the melody. The scherzando is perhaps the most perfect of the movements, and it was interpreted with a breeziness and a buoyancy that were positively delightful. The different moods of the finale were well characterized, and the close came with concentration and emphasis. The work of the strings throughout the symphony was marked by the precision of clockwork and an admirable quality of tone. A few more firsts and seconds would put them on a par of strength with the other divisions.

The Tschaikowsky Overture is a colossal work that must be heard more than once to be properly appreciated. It is marked by the composer a fantasy after Shakespeare's "Romeo and Juliet." The overture feature is, therefore, only a general name for what far transcends the ordinary material for this kind of composition. It is more than an overture—in its nature and character it is rather a great symphonic poem. The orchestra did itself proud in its interpretation, and showed itself equal to its colossal difficulties. The instrumental fabric is closely woven, and a tremendous task it is for the different choirs of the orchestra to bring out its coloring and variety of expression. All the progress of modern instrumentation is brought to bear upon the thematic development. The love motive is almost as intensely emotional and worked out with as intricate and intimate a development as the "Liebestod" of Wagner. Admirable were the dash and vehemence with which the passages portraying the conflict between Capulets and Montagues were played. The entire reading was one that left a deep impression.

The ballet music from Massenet's "Le Cid" was familiar and effectively played. It was given with the sensuous, sometimes gorgeous coloring of the Spanish dances, and the last was played with a brilliancy that was overpowering.

The soloist, Estelle Liebling, was a new quantity and well received. She sang the bell aria from "Lakmé" and three miscellaneous numbers: "In Waldeseinsamkeit," by Brahms; "Die Bekehrte," by Stange, and "Die Nachtigall," by Alabieff. She has a light coloratura voice, the purity of which is without alloy. Her selections were for a high soprano, and C, D and E above the staff seemed to be in her range without difficulty. Yet the best part of her voice lies in the middle register. Here her notes are full, resonant and liquid. As she ascends the scale her tones are of less pronounced quality, less sure, and somewhat veiled. She was quite equal to the demands of embellishment in the "Lakmé" aria. Her trill was perfect, her intonation absolutely sure and her portamento exquisitely turned. An improvement might be suggested in her enunciation of both the French and German text, which was quite indistinct. To her miscellaneous numbers she responded with an encore, giving a pretty song, "You and I," by Liza Lehmann, which was really her best work.

An event of musical significance was the operatic concert given by the pupils of Signorina Tecla Vigna at the Auditorium on the evening of Tuesday, December 10:

Organ, chorus and harp accompaniment.

The showing was that Miss Vigna is conscientious and correct in her methods. In the province of opera she gives her pupils the benefit of her operatic training and long experience. She educates them not only for the dramatic requirements but for all the details and accessories of the operatic stage. Mrs. Charles Haynes, Miss Dell Kendal. Miss Lottie Callahan, Miss Irmgarde Bicker and Miss Antoinette Werner are all pupils who are advanced enough and equipped for a public career. Particularly matured is Mrs. Haynes, of Chillicothe. Miss Callahan has a genuine contralto voice of lovely quality.

Reverting back to the operatic evening of Mrs. McAlpin in Æolian Hall last week, it is well to particularize the merits of the participants, as given by the undersigned correspondent:

"The scenes presented from the operas of 'Lohengrin,' 'La Favorita,' 'Hamlet' and 'Mikado' were beautifully staged, and the costuming of the characters was of the richest and newest kind and faithful to historic detail. In the scene and duet from the second act of 'Lohengrin' Miss May Perin showed unusual histrionic and dramatic talent. She has a contralto voice of fine musical quality and timbre, and she proved her ability still further in the 'Mikado' selections as Katisha. The Elsa of Jessie Langlands Thomson was a creditable conception, and her impersonation of the Mad Scene from 'Hamlet' points to the belief that she has a future. Her voice has purity and flexibility. The Frederick of Charles H. Thomson deserves praise.

"Not one of the participants of the evening left a better impression than Miss Mary Naomi Chapman, with her deep, mellow mezzo tones and handsome stage presence in 'Oh, Mio Fernando.' A prettier stage effect could hardly have been desired than was given in the 'Mikado' scene. William Hanson made up quite a laugh producing Koko, and Jessie Langlands Thomson as Yum-Yum, Ella May Bassett as Pitti-Sing and Pearl Keith as Peep-Bo presented a picture of grace and loveliness with the chorus. The latter sang with breeziness and were the following: Mary Rier, May Perin, Eugenia Pedretti, Julia Helrich, Naomi Chapman, Jessie Langlands Thomson, Bertha Calvert, Ida Ewing, Marie Blackman and Florence Keith. Mrs. McAlpin played the accompaniments with well directed judgment, and the operatic numbers were relieved by selections from the Acolian, Orchestrelle and Pianola."

The subject of the next lecture in the History of Music course will be "Luther, the Reformation and the Renaissance," and will be given by Prof. A. J. Gantvoort next Monday afternoon in the Lyceum. Anyone interested in these lectures, and not a student of the college, can make arrangements to attend them by applying at the office of the College of Music.

On account of the second Symphony concert, Dr. Wade Thrasher, who delivers the lectures on the hygiene and physiology of the vocal organs, postponed the lecture last Friday one week. The next and last lecture on the "Voice" will be given on next Friday, December 20, at 4:30 p. m., in the Lyceum. All who use the voice as a profession should be greatly interested in these lectures, for whose benefit they really are.

"Santa Claus' Lesson," a cantata arranged by Miss Elizabeth Mathias, of the College of Music, will be given on New Year's night at the Mohawk Presbyterian Church, on Ravine street. Fifty children will take part in this cantata, which will be under the direction of Miss Mathias.

The last rehearsal before Christmas of Haydn's "Seasons," by the Cincinnati Choral Union, will take place next Thursday evening, December 19, at Smith & Nixon Hall. Dr. Elsenheimer, the director of the Choral Union, is very well pleased with the progress of the organization at the rehearsals so far.

The fourth invitation affair by the School of Expression of the College of Music will take place in the Odeon next Saturday evening, under the direction of Miss Mannheimer. "An Evening of Comedy" will be presented.

The Oscar Ehrgott Vocal School will give a recital embracing selections from "The Messiah" in Suiter Hall, Friday evening, December 20. The soloists and chorus will all be pupils of the Oscar Ehrgott Vocal School, assisted by Walter C. Earnest, tenor, with Mrs. Oscar Ehrgott as the presiding accompanist.

The Organists' and Teachers' Society of the city have arranged for a concert, which will be the first of the kind ever given here. Ten or twelve of the prominent organists of the city will give a program, probably in Æolian Hall.

January 31 is the date on which there will be a concert given at the Covington Cathedral, in which the compositions will be those in à capella style. "Miserere," by Allegri, and "Crucifixus," by Lotti, are among the representative works. The concert is to precede a lecture on "Religion and Art," by Bishop Spalding. The concert is given by a chorus under the direction of Dr. Elsenheimer.

The board of directors of the College of Music paid its first official visit to the new dormitory recently. Those in the party were Mayor Julius Fleischmann, J. G. Schmidlapp, M. E. Ingalls, E. B. Taft, Larz Anderson and W. B. Melish.

George Schneider is continuing his series of piano educational recitals in his studio in the Pike Building. They are of great value, not only to the public, but especially to students. The aim is to present all that is worth hearing in piano composition.

Emil Wiegand, violinist, is employing much of his time in composition, and in that realm is earning well merited success. Two of his recent songs are "A Sunbeam" and "I Love My Jean," the latter after Robert Burns. There is an exquisite simplicity and poetry in the first, and the second is worked out as one of the prettiest Scotch songs ever brought to the notice and appreciation of the public. Mr. Wiegand displays originality of treatment as well as congeniality.

Angela Anderson.

HERE are some London press notices of Miss Anderson's recent recital at St. James' Hall:

Miss Angela Anderson, an American pianist, lent valuable assistance at the piano, being possessed of a fluent technic and sympathetic touch. * * *.—Topical Times.

Miss Anderson's piano solos were much applauded.—Sunday Times.

Miss Angela Anderson is an American, who had not hitherto been heard in this country, and her playing is chiefly remarkable for the mastery she shows of the keyboard, and the audience showed itself well satisfied.—Morning Advertiser.

Miss Anderson played with intelligence, and her rendering of Mendelssohn's "Auf Flugeln des Gesanges" was most praiseworthy. * * *.—Sunday Special.

Miss Angela Anderson, a young American pianist, has a sympathetic touch and intelligence.—Star.

The pianist Miss Anderson plays with considerable technical facility.—Queen.

Miss Anderson played a Chopin selection very well, and an Etude de Concert by MacDowell was thoroughly pleasing. She also played Mendelssohn's lovely air, "Auf Flugeln des Gesanges," with neatness and brightness.—Lady.

The pianist, Miss Anderson, distinguished herself in Bach's Fantaisie and Fugue in G minor, arranged by Liszt; in four morceaux, by Chopin, Paderewski, Mendelssohn, &c. Her playing was marked by a very sympathetic touch, brilliant technic and thoughtful reading. It was regretted that she did not respond to the demand for an encore. She met with warm applause. The recital was attended by a very large gathering.—Jewish Chronicle.

The success of the concert was also due to Miss Angela Anderson, a young and promising pianist, who played the well-known Bach-Liszt Fantaisie and Fugue in G minor with excellent execution and artistic expression. The selections from Chopin were well received. Miss Anderson also played pieces by Paderewski, Mendelssohn and others, and in all the items proved herself a well trained pianist.—Jewish World, November 29, 1901.

EUROPEAN NOTES.

AT a performance of "San Toy" at Innsbruck the management feared that there would be an anti-English demonstration against Miss Mary Halton, on account of her English name and her having to sing some lines in English. The manager, before the curtain rose, said: "I hear that a party of the audience intends to make a manifestation against Miss Mary Halton, because she sings some lines in English. Allow me to inform you that Miss Halton is not English, but a daughter of free America. You will be wrong in holding her responsible for the fact that the English language is the 'official' language of the United States." We need not add that she was applauded to the skies.

The Emperor William has sanctioned the erection of the Wagner monument by Professor Eberlein, insisting, however, on certain modifications indicated on a sketch drawn by himself.

The Philharmonic Society of Nuremberg produced lately a symphony entitled "Bismarck," composed by Major Hermann Hutter, who has already distinguished himself by his tone poem, "Lancelot." The present work is said to be inferior to its predecessor. Each of the four movements bears a motto to form a kind of program: I. Ex ungue leonem; II. Patriæ inserviendo consumor; III. Oderint dum metuant; IV. Per aspera ad astra. They are cleverly constructed and well orchestrated.

In Prague a new tone poem for grand orchestra was produced at the last Philharmonic concert. It is by Leo Blechs, and is entitled "Waldwanderung." He endeavors to paint the effect of wild nature on the human soul. The work lacks inspiration, but the composer displays great technical skill and mastery of orchestral resources.

The Lohse concerts at Strassburg, after a year's suspension, were resumed November 20, when the "Barbarossa" symphony of Sigmund von Hansegger, and F. Weingartner's "Wallfahrt nach Keoloar" were performed.

The 130th anniversary of the birth of Bortiansky has been lately celebrated at St. Petersburg. He was trained by Galuppi, who was the court musical director, and accompanied him to Venice in 1768. Thence the young man went to complete his studies at Bologna, Rome and Naples. Returning to Russia in 1779, he was appointed director of the Imperial Chapel, which position he held to his death. Under his training this choir attained the high excellence it still maintains. For it he wrote numerous works, all marked by great originality, and gained the appellation of the Palestrina of Russia.

In Italy the audiences continue the pleasing habit of talking and chattering during the performance. Lately, while Elizabeth in "Tannhäuser" was warbling pianissimo, a shrill girl's voice was heard: "My dear, allow me to present to you my fiancée." The conductor, without stopping to beat time, sang out: "Delighted, sir, to make your acquaintance." There was silence for a little while, but the gossip soon recommenced.

At Vienna the respectable title of Ueberbrettl has been bestowed on a new theatre which bears the proud name of "Young Vienna Theatre Lieber Augustin." The program on the opening night was very varied, and in spite of some numbers of terrible obscenity which would not have been tolerated in Paris, the new theatre had only a very doubtful success.

The posthumous influence of Wagner will bestow on the city of Venice a new embellishment. During his sojourn there the composer often said to the Banker Fiorentini that it was a disgrace that the citizens had been unable during the last two centuries to erect a façade for the church Della Pieta, close to the piazza of St. Mark, which contains the painting of "Christ at the Pharisee's House," by Moretto. The banker died lately and has left by his will 2,000,000 francs to the municipality for the purpose of erecting the façade.

In the Münchener Post a critic belonging to the most advanced "modern" school, Wilhelm Mankes, published a notice of a concert under Weingartner's leading, as follows: "Still less was he at home with 'Till Eulenspiegel.' Without temperament, without a left arm, almost automatically, he beat the time of his colleague's merry orchestral jest to death. Do Richard Strauss' laurels annoy him? Or does he wish to convince us that this talented tone poem can exercise its charming effect even with the most unpoetic interruption?" To this Weingartner replies that the Strauss number played was not "Till Eulenspiegel," but "Tod und Verklärung," and therefore Herr Mankes must have written his criticism without being present at the concert. This is not so uncommon an occurrence as to deserve anything but ridicule. The sting of Mankes' article is in the insinuation that Weingartner is jealous of Strauss, and mean enough to injure him. As a matter of fact Strauss and Weingartner are on such friendly terms that the conductor offers his baton to the composer whenever any of his works are on the program. It looks as if there was a clique, both in Munich and Berlin, that does its best to injure Weingartner's reputation.

The performance of Gluck's "Iphigenia in Tauris," as revised by Richard Strauss, that took place lately at Schwerin had great success and will soon be given on other stages. The revision by Strauss comprises some entr'acte music, a trio at the finale and some retouching of the orchestral work.

Meyerbeer's "Robert the Devil" attained the biblical age of seventy on November 21 last. Originally produced in Paris in 1831, it gave rise to heated discussions, and had a powerful effect not only in the musical but the literary field. Balzac in his study of "Gambara" compared "Robert the Devil" to "Don Giovanni," concluding with the words: "Robert represents ideas, the Don excites sensations." How Wagner and others judged it is well known, but Liszt in an essay stepped forth as a defender even of Bertram and the scene of the nuns.

The Wiesbaden Court Theatre is again busy in preparations for the May festival. The centre of the festival cycles will be Gluck's "Armida," and other productions will be Auber's "Domino Noir" and "The Merchant of Venice."

Massenet, to please the baritone Battistini, has made a transformation in his "Werther." The hero will no longer be a tenor, but a baritone, and Albert becomes a tenor in place of a baritone. Not merely the voices are transposed, but the whole Werther part is rewritten. It will be given for the first time in its new form at Warsaw, and then at St. Petersburg and Odessa.

The Court Theatre of Munich is arranging a cyclus of Wagner's youthful works, namely, "Das Liebesrelst," "Die Feen" and "Rienzi." The performance will be given before the commencement of the cycle at the Prince Regent Theatre, and will thus be followed by the "Meistersinger," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin" and "Tristan."

Mascheroni's opera "Lorenza" had a great success at Cologne, and the composer received from Karl Ebbinghaus, the president of the Beethoven House, a diploma nominating him a member of the house.

The new opera, "Zarskaja Newjesta" ("Bride of the Czar"), by Rimski-Korsakoff, will be given for the first time in the Imperial Opera House, St. Petersburg.

A symphonic poem, "Adonis," by Theodore Dubois, was given November 24 at the Colonne concert. It consists of (1) "Death of Adonis" (Lament of Aphrodite); (2) "Lament of the Nymphs"; (3) "The Awakening of Adonis" (Springtime).

MUSICAL FESTIVAL AT THE "OLD FIRST" CHURCH.

THE musical festival in connection with the four days' celebration of the Rev. Dr. Howard Duffield's tenth anniversary in the pastorate of the "Old First" Presbyterian Church was given on Tuesday night, December 10. Admission to the stately church, Fifth avenue and Twelfth street, was by ticket, and in the large congregation there were many distinguished and wealthy New Yorkers. The musical program, directed by William C. Carl, the organist and choir director of the church, was inspiring. As the opening organ voluntary Mr. Carl played the Toccata from Widor's Fifth Organ Symphony. After that the choir sang Mr. Carl's "Te Deum," in C minor, which the composer dedicated to Dr. Duffield. The work is yet in manuscript, but will soon be published. Mr. Carl's composition is strong and vitally eccleciastical in character. Dr. Duffield, who is an accomplished musician, was greatly impressed with the singing of the work. Of particular musical importance were "Noël Ecossais," by Guilmant, and the Bach Fugue in D major, which Mr. Carl played as an a and b after the choir sang his "Te Deum." The Guilmant composition is an ancient Christmas carol written in the Scotch style. It has the true joyous Christmas ring to it. In keeping with the occasion and time of year, the choir sang three beautiful Christmas carols, "To Us Is Born Emanuel" and "Lo! How a Rose," by Praetorius, and "Hodie, Christus Natur Est." The last named, by J. P. Sweelinck, was sung in Latin. The first one by Praetorius in German, and the second one in English.

Andreas Schneider, the baritone soloist of the choir, sang as a solo Allitsen's "Song of Thanksgiving," and his rich and manly voice was heard with pleasure by all. Another appropriate selection for the occasion sung by the choir was Enrico Bossi's "Hymn of Glory." This was also sung in classic Latin. Bossi's music is uplifting and the choir, under Mr. Carl's direction, sang it in good style. Beethoven's cantata, "The Praise of Music," was presented after the intermission. While we cannot here make a positive statement, we believe that this is the first time this composition was sung in New York. At all events, we can say that it has not been heard here in many years. The solos are for first and second sopranos, tenor and basso, and chorus with organ parts and accompaniment. "The Praise of Music" begins with a joyful shout:

> Hail! Music, hail!
> Heaven-born Goddess, to greet thee!

It ends with another joyful acclaim:

> Hail, Cecelia, hail! Praise and thanks to thee belong. Hail! thou Queen of heavenly song!

The choir sang throughout the evening with splendid tone and in other points showed the effects of thorough drilling under Mr. Carl. The choir of the "Old First" Church which assisted at the festival includes these singers:

Mrs. Ellen Fletcher Caples, soprano soloist; Mrs. Alice Field, second soprano soloist; Edward W. Gray, tenor soloist; Andreas Schneider, baritone soloist.

Sopranos—Mrs. Axel C. Hallbeck, Miss Addie N. Davis, Mrs. H. N. Hyneman, Mrs. Frederick William Ortmann, Mrs. A. E. Koonz, Mrs. Elizabeth Rudrauff, Miss Ray Bloomfield, Miss Ella Gibson.

Contraltos—Miss Caroline M. Holmes, Mrs. Ambrose B. Tremaine, Miss Bertha Baust, Miss Alice Elmore, Mrs. J. B. Wilson, Miss Cecil Michael.

Tenors—Hugh Fergueson Pollock, W. Andrew Hemphill, William Crawford, John A. Gallagher, Lawrence Ripley.

Bassos—Edward Paul Grout, Henry Johnson, Dr. H. J. Gundacker, A. R. Turner, N. Meltzer.

At the third meeting of the celebration, held last Wednesday night in the chapel of the church, Dr. Duffield referred to the harmonious relations which existed between him and Mr. Carl. Such a thing as differences often do prevail between ministers and their organists, but at the "Old First" Church, declared Dr. Duffield, all was harmony, with never a thought of "counterpoint between minister and choirmaster."

Mr. Carl, by the way, assumed his duties at the church a few months after Dr. Duffield, and in the spring he too will have his decennial anniversary. The closing night of the celebration, Thursday, a reception was held for Dr. and Mrs. Duffield. The ways and means committee of the church, of which Mr. Carl is chairman, arranged the series of services and entertainments to commemorate Dr. Duffield's ten happy years as pastor of the church.

DOROTHY HARVEY.—Mrs. Dorothy Harvey sang at the concert of the Musurgia Club at the Waldorf-Astoria on December 3. Among the other engagements she filled recently was at the concert of the Newark, N. J., Arion Society. Of her singing at that concert, the Newark Evening News said:

> The Arion Society put to its credit during the concert which it gave in the Kruger Auditorium last evening the finest choral and solo singing heard in this city thus far this season. * * * Mrs. Dorothy Harvey was the singing soloist, and her efforts were notable features of the entertainment. Mrs. Harvey possesses a soprano voice of good volume and most pleasing musical quality of tone, which was surprising by reason of its remarkable purity, sweetness, fullness, richness and carrying power, even in the most delicate pianissimo. She was recalled again and again after her aria with the orchestra, and responded with an encore.

Mrs. Harvey sings again in Newark on December 22, and in January she will be one of the soloists of "The Messiah," to be sung by the Baltimore Oratorio Society in Baltimore.

THE OPERA SEASON.

RATHER later than usual, the season of opera at the Metropolitan Opera House opens next Monday night with "Tristan and Isolde" in place of the usual "Faust" or "Romeo and Juliet" openings. New faces will be seen this year, and naturally new voices heard, and as the New York Sun of last Sunday tells most interestingly about these newcomers the article is herewith reproduced. Among other things the Sun says:

"Emilio de Marchi is the most conspicuous of the strangers this year, not only because of his fame abroad but because he is a tenor. He is not wholly unknown here. He was the leading figure of the last Mapleson campaign in 1896, but sang only once. That was as Raoul in 'Les Huguenots.' He made a profound impression at that time, but left the company after he had made this solitary appearance. In Europe he ranks with the best known of the Italian tenors and in Italy shares the place at the head of his profession with Ernesto Tamagno and Arturo Bonci.

"Here he will sing the Italian repertory and will probably be heard first as Cavaradossi in 'Tosca,' although his best role is commonly thought to be Raoul. But M. de Marchi modestly says that he prefers to avoid comparisons at first between him and his predecessors at the Metropolitan.

"M. de Marchi, who has the right to the title of lieutenant through his studies at the Royal Italian Military Academy and his service in the Italian army in Africa, was born thirty-six years ago in Voghera, Piedmont, and was educated in Milan and Turin. He decided when a youth to go to Rome to prepare himself for the military career His father is a general in the Italian army. After leaving the academy he was detailed to service in Africa and distinguished himself to such an extent that he was decorated with the title of chevalier and the cross at the close of his first year of service.

"M. de Marchi returned to Italy, determined to cultivate his voice and devote himself to the operatic stage. He went to Florence and studied there under Maestro Landi, father of Camilla Landi and a well-known singing teacher of Italy. He was ready in 1886 to make his public appearance.

"He accordingly came forward at the Teatro dal Verme in Milan as Alfredo in 'La Traviata.' After singing in his own country he went to South America, which is, with Russia, the paradise of Italian singers. M. de Marchi has also been highly successful in Russia, where the great Masini is still singing at the age of fifty-five. M. de Marchi has been every year since his first appearance at the opera houses of Rome or Milan and at the lyric theatres of Buenos Ayres or Rio Janeiro. He created the role of Cavaradossi in 'Tosca' when the opera was sung first at the Costanzi in Rome, two years ago next month. He was selected for the role by Giacomo Puccini, the composer of the work. M. de Marchi makes his home in Rome.

"He has sung in the Wagner operas and was the original Walther when 'Die Meistersinger' was sung in Milan two years ago, with Antonio Scotti as Hans Sachs. He also sang Lohengrin and Tannhäuser, but has dropped the Wagner roles permanently from his repertory. He sings in 'Carmen,' 'La Gioconda,' 'La Bohême,' 'Cavalleria Rusticana, 'Samson and Delilah,' 'La Traviata,' 'Rigoletto,' 'Il Trovatore,' 'Un Ballo in Maschera,' 'Mefistofele,' 'Ero e Leandro' and 'Aïda.'

"Maurice Declery is a French baritone who was called to the attention of Mr. Grau by his friend, Pol Plançon, and was engaged two years ago for Covent Garden. He was so successful there that he was engaged last summer by Mr. Grau for the season here. He is a native of the south of France and studied for his profession at the conservatoire of Marseilles, where he took a first prize for opera and singing. He then went to Paris and studied for two years more at the conservatoire in that city. He made his first appearance at Pau in the Basses-Pyrénées. Afterward he went to Montpelier and sang Wolfram, among other roles. Later he became a member of the famous Théâtre de la Monnaie, in Brussels, and then went to London.

"Albert Reiss has come here to sing Mime in 'Siegfried,' David in 'Die Meistersinger" and the other buffo roles. Mme. Lilli Lehman has said that she never saw such a representative of these two characters as this singer, whom she heard while she was at Wiesbaden, where Herr Reiss sang for several seasons. He is also well known as a singer of the Lortzing operas and in operetta.

"He is a native of Berlin and was educated there. He had dramatic talent, gave up his studies of law and acted in various German theatres before he was engaged at the Stadt Theatre in Hamburg. There Pollini discovered that he had a voice, and Mme. Schumann-Heink advised him to study seriously for the operatic stage. As an opera singer he appeared first in Königsberg and then went to Posen. He prepared himself under Jules Lieban and Benno Stolzenberg. Last year he went to Wiesbaden, and his fame in the two Wagner roles had become so great that he was engaged for the Wagner performances at the Prinz Regent's Theatre in Munich. He was invited to become a member of the company permanently, but declined in order to accept an engagement with Mr. Grau.

"Andres Perello de Segourola is a native of Spain. He studied at the universities in Madrid and Barcelona, and was for a year a lawyer in Barcelona. He then decided to make professional use of his voice and sang Marcel in 'Les Huguenots' at the Liceo in Barcelona. He had studied singing with the Italian baritone Pietro Ferrari, who teaches in Spain. His success was so great that he sang for three successive seasons at the theatre in which he first appeared. Later he went to Madrid and Lisbon, and then to Italy, where he sang in Rome, Trieste and Milan. He has also sung in Moscow, Lima, Seville, Buenos Ayres and Santiago de Chile. His repertory includes all the leading basso roles.

"Luigi Tavechia is the best known of Italian buffo singers, and has been for years famous in such operas as 'Don Pasquale,' 'Il Barbiere di Seviglia' and 'La Nozze di Figaro.' He is an Italian and sang first at Milan in concert and oratorio. He made his operatic début at La Scala as Germont in 'La Traviata,' and for some years sang in the dramatic roles. He later took up the buffo roles, and has become the best known of the artists of that school in Europe. He has sung in Paris, London and the Continental cities. Last spring he was a member of Madame Sembrich's company at the Royal Opera in Berlin, and it was at her suggestion that Mr. Grau engaged him for the Italian repertory here.

"Louise Reuss-Belce, who takes the place in the company left vacant by the retirement of Susan Strong, is a native of Vienna and prepared herself for the operatic stage there under Gaensbacher. She was invited in 1884 to sing Elsa at Carlsruhe and was immediately engaged as a member of the opera company there. She sang under Mottl's direction Sieglinde, Elisabeth, Cassandra in Berlioz's 'Les Troyens,' Bedura in d'Albert's 'Der Rubin' and the heroine of Schilling's 'Ingewelde' in addition to the regular repertory of the theatre. She attracted attention outside of Carlsruhe first in 1886 at the music festival given there, when she was especially honored by Liszt.

"Madame Belce, who was at that time married to Eduard Reuss, a pianist and composer, went to Wiesbaden from Carlsruhe. There she sang Ortrud and the Brünnhildes. In the meantime she had been active at Bayreuth and sang Fricka, one of the Norns and one of the Valkyrie maidens for several years. Last season she was a member of the German company that introduced the 'Nibelungen Ring' in Spain.

"Sibyl Sanderson may appear during the New York engagement, but, as her contract expires on January 6 and she is still sick, that has not yet been settled. Her career since she sang at the Metropolitan in 1894-5 is too well known to require repetition. Most of the intervening time was spent in retirement. She returned to the stage last winter at the Winter Garden in Berlin and afterward at the Opéra Comique in Paris. She is to return to the Opéra Comique in February. She has been ill during most of the time she has spent in this country and has appeared in opera only a few times.

"Camille Seygard, who has been engaged as one of the sopranos of the company, is well known to New York audiences, through her appearance with the Walter Damrosch Opera Company, with which she sang for two years, and from her appearances in concert. For the past three years she has been singing in Germany.

NORDICA.

NORDICA is on a great concert tour this season. She is singing in many cities and in university and college centres, and there is enthusiasm all along the route, and large audiences. The Omaha Bee, of December 8, has an unusually interesting story to tell:

Nordica. That's all. The critic's work is over.

But for the benefit of the people who were not at the concert given last night it might not be out of place to draw a few lessons from the performance, if such a commonplace word can be applied to such a remarkable demonstration of art.

The voice is a mighty voice and behind it is a wonderful mind. Such diminuendos—such vibrant, intense and distinct pianissimos; the big tones always reducible to the most delicate thread; art concealing the art.

A model of which America may be proud and to which all American singers should bring all their best efforts to imitate. There is no artificiality about Nordica's tone-production. Mark you, no smiling to the right, placing in the nose, vibration over the face; no such absurdities. Imagine one asking Nordica what method she uses!

Her singing is the apotheosis of natural and artistic expression.

She raises and expands her chest to the fullest, but never her shoulders. This is a lesson to the many singers who believe they must secure a big tone by becoming temporarily a hunchback. As an exponent of deep breathing applied to singing her visit was worth the price of many lessons to the vocal student. And there were scores of them present. Her facial expression is always of the most natural, adapted always to the sentiment and emotion of the song.

The all too brief study in recitative presented in connection with the Händel aria—the words, "Oh, worse than death, indeed; lead me, ye guards, lead me, to the stake or to the flames; I'll thank your gracious mercy"—was an inspiration. What a dignity and poise, and what a rebuke to those who think that recitative means always and at all times a strident "declamando"!

The presentation of the Strauss song and that tremendous aria of Erkel, the Hungarian, was especially gratifying to the hungry music-lovers who know how to love such music. The "Maids of Cadiz," magnificently sung, was particularly well received by the audience, as was Grieg's "Ich Liebe Dich," which was instantly resung, and in such a manner as to lead one to think that Nordica herself shared the wish of the audience to hear it again.

In Elsa's dream music one could not help picturing the scene by the banks of the Scheldt, where Elsa sings of her vision, that vision of the knight in shining armor, so soon to be realized in the advent of Lohengrin. Even in the "Song of Thanksgiving," that wonderfully virile product of Miss Allitsen's brain, one could not but think of Brünnhilde as the words "My love is a flaming sword" rang out. Yes, the artist conjured up to the mind Siegmund, Sieglinde, Wotan, Siegfried and the wonder sword Nothung. One could see Siegfried leaping through the wall of fire to awake Brünnhilde with his kiss and the words soared forth, "Thank God for you." It was a coincidence.

The music lingers in the memory. The artist's voice is still heard. May she soon return.

JANPOLSKI IN A RUSSIAN PROGRAM.—Songs of Russian composers are frequently heard in this country, but Janpolski, who is to sing at the next concert of the Orange Musical Art Society, will introduce on that occasion some arias and folksongs of Glinka, Tschaikowsky and Arensky not heard before in this country. These will have the added charm of being sung in the original texts by Tolstoi and Pushkin, which is a great advantage, as much of the weird grace and beauty is lost when translated. Among the numbers included in the first part of this same program Janpolski will make another departure in Händel's aria, "Tyrannic Love," from "Susanna," one of Stockhausen's famous numbers.

PHILADELPHIA, November 30, 1901.

THE program at the second concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra on Saturday evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 3.....Brahms
Prologue to Pagliacci.....Leoncavallo
Vorspiel zu Lohengrin.....Wagner
Aria, Vision Fugitive.....Massenet
Ouverture zu Sappho.....Goldmark

Soloist, Gwilym Miles.

If we are to have a symphony at every concert like the No. 3 of Brahms, the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will serve a double purpose. One hearing is not enough for the digestion of such a work. It is complex in a manner that could only belong to Brahms. But the real beauties of the work become more apparent at each successive hearing. Mr. Schell gave the symphony a beautiful reading, rather than a scholarly one, a point decidedly in his favor. It seems as though a good many present day musicians were dealing with mathematics instead of music. The bare fact that the symphony was technically correct argues a sufficient amount of intellectuality in the reading. The last movement, with its sombre clouds and turmoil of battle, interspersed now and again with the quiet singing of the 'cellos, was perhaps the best of the four.

The Vorspiel to "Lohengrin" was the most satisfactory number of the program. It was beautifully played, with the exception of a slight inequality of tone on the part of the strings in the final measures. The fortissimo work was very good. The brasses have improved since the last concert. There was no trace of a blur in their playing.

The remaining orchestral number was Goldmark's "Sappho" overture. It follows out the same general lines as the rest of Goldmark's orchestral compositions. There is a constant striving after unusual effects. As an example of tonal color it is a remarkable composition. The orchestra performed it in a praiseworthy manner.

The soloist, Gwilym Miles, has a powerful voice, but withal a sweet one. His high tones are beautiful and rich, but in his low voice he shows a tendency toward roughness. He sang the Prologue to "Pagliacci" very well indeed.

It is with the greatest satisfaction that one notices that even in so short a time as a week the raggedness naturally to be expected at the first concert has in a great measure disappeared from the playing of the orchestra. It can be confidently said that if this organization is supported by the people of Philadelphia as it should be, it will do a great deal toward making the city a great musical centre. Elkan Kosman, the concertmeister of the orchestra, is announced as soloist at the next concert on December 14.

I had the pleasure of hearing this week two young women who bid fair to write their names in large letters in the book of musical history. They are Miss Elsie Stuart Hand, pianist, and Miss Gretrude Isabel Keppelman, violinist, and they gave a recital at Griffith Hall on Tuesday evening. Miss Keppelman played Grieg's Sonata for Violin and Piano, op. 45, a Polonaise by Wieniawski, a Ballade by Hubay and a "Spanish Dance" by Sarasate. Her tone is broad and technic splendid. Some really wonderful piano playing was done by Miss Hand. She has a breadth and variety of expression and a smooth, liquid technic which will, if nothing intervenes, place her in the foremost rank of pianists. She played "The Lark," by Glinka-Balakiereff; "Gondoliera," by Liszt; Chopin's C sharp minor Etude, Rubinstein's "Reve Angelique" and MacDowell's "Hexantanz."

Miss Susanna Dercum, a pupil of Nicholas Douty and the possessor of a mellow contralto voice, sang in a beautiful manner the following: "Folksong," MacDowell; "Forgetfulness," Douty; "Bedouin Love Song," Chadwick; "Der Tod und Das Mädchen," Schubert; "Morgenthau," Grieg, and "Nur, wer die Sehnsucht Kennt," Tschaikowsky. Henry A. Gruhler was the accompanist.

Frau Fritzi Scheff will sing at the first Mendelssohn Club concert in December, instead of Pol Plançon, as originally announced.

HENRY I. MAGEE.

Zeldenrust in Nashville.

FOLLOWING immediately upon Zeldenrust's success with orchestra in Cincinnati come reports of a series of sensational triumphs in the South, where he has been giving a short recital tour. From each place in which he has played the verdict is the same: "Overwhelming success," "tremendous ovation," "packed house of enthusiastic people." Here is the criticism from the Nashville News, of December 10, which speaks for itself:

The interior of the Masonic Theatre presented a glowing scene of artistic color and beauty yesterday afternoon for the matinee appearance of Zeldenrust, whose first performance in this city was greeted by a large audience of cultured people. They listened with keenest appreciation and enjoyment to what was unquestionably a very great piano performance, perhaps the greatest ever heard in Nashville.

Enthusiasm for the pianist rose by leaps and bounds, and at the close the great virtuoso was recalled again and again.

Genius such as Zeldenrust possesses is not likely to change when its final development is reached and its methods of expression are as nearly perfect as his. There were hearers who felt yesterday afternoon, notably in the Chopin numbers, that his effects were produced with greater calculation than any artist who has ever played here, and with no loss of spontaneity.

A group of four Chopin pieces was played with a mastery which proved how great an interpreter of this composer's music Zeldenrust is, even when compared with other pianists who have found renown in the same field. He closed the first part of his program with a delightfully dainty composition of his own.

Weber's Polacca Brillante was played with exquisitely shaded revelation of its subtle harmonies, and in the Wagner number Zeldenrust played with great power and brilliancy, giving it with perfect sympathy and appreciation.

Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodie No. 14 was played with an amount of endurance that would baffle many of the leading musicians of today. In the spirit and in poetic suggestion the performance was brilliant. In the poetic and intellectual charm, in the sanity, naturalness and simplicity his art is great.

November 30, 1901.

A GREAT stir has been caused in London by the arrival of John Philip Sousa. His first concerts have merely served as a start off for his provincial tour and hardly gave audiences a fair chance of hearing him. Now, however, he is giving two concerts a day, one in the afternoon at the Empire Theatre and one in the evening at the Covent Garden Opera House. His success is quite unequivocal. Nothing of the kind has ever been seen in England before and the performances are drawing crowded houses. His music was of course quite well known, but it certainly has never been played here before as it should be played, and it is with that Sousa has made such a tremendous hit. He has quite taken London by storm, and it is to be hoped that the success of his present tour will be great enough to induce him to repeat it.

An interesting novelty was introduced into the program of the Saturday symphony concert at Queen's Hall in the shape of an orchestral poem by Dr. Corsen called "A Fantasy of Life and Love." This work, which was specially written for the Gloucester Festival, might well serve as a model for writers of symphonic poems. It does not fall into the error of which so many pieces of its class are guilty, that of attempting to tell too much. It is merely a "mood picture," and the moods which it is intended to portray are cleverly and clearly depicted. The music is well conceived and admirably written. It is likely to prove a very valuable addition to the Queen's Hall repertory.

The indefatigable Mr. Newman, not content with holding a big orchestral concert at Queen's Hall, also gave a most successful popular concert at the Albert Hall. The program was particularly good for a ballad concert, and such well-known singers as Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Florence Schmidt, Mme. Kirby Lunn, Miss Jessie Goldsack and Samuel Masters sang a really excellent selection of songs, while the instrumentalists were Ysaye, Mark Hambourg and Edwin H. Lemare, the organist.

On the same afternoon Mlle. Sandra Droucker, a Russian pianist, gave a recital at Bechstein Hall. Mlle. Droucker is certainly a good pianist, especially so far as her technical accomplishments are concerned. But she is one of those pianists who seem to have sacrificed almost everything to technic, and her playing possesses but little warmth. Thus though she played Liszt's arrangement of Bach's Organ Fantaisie and Fugue in G minor very brilliantly indeed, she did not introduce enough color into Beethoven's Variations on a Theme from the "Eroica" Symphony, and she was still less successful in Schumann's Sonata in G minor. She was at her best in two smaller pieces, Daquin's "Le Coucou" and Brahms' Intermezzo in E flat. The latter she played with more sympathy than she extended to any other piece during the afternoon.

On Monday afternoon that excellent artist, Mlle. Kona Eibenschütz gave a most successful concert at St. James' Hall. She tried a somewhat interesting experiment in having two pianos on the platform, the one a large concert grand for music that is modern in tone and feeling, and the other a smaller instrument for pieces of another or lighter style. The experiment was an undoubted success, and it might well be imitated by other pianists. Scarlatti's "Presto" and Couperin's "La Rossignol en Amour" are undoubtedly too delicate for performance on a modern grand, and they proved much more effective when played on the smaller piano. But the works of Brahms sound better on a larger instrument, and no tone can be too rich or full for them. Mlle. Eibenschütz did well in playing such works as the G minor Ballade and the Intermezzi in E minor, E flat and C upon the larger instrument. The pianist has a particularly delicate and sympathetic touch, and she played every piece upon the program admirably.

On the same afternoon Carl Flasch gave his second violin recital at Bechstein Hall, the pianist being George Liebling. A new and attractive sonata for violin and piano by Herr Liebling was produced at this concert.

In the evening Princesse Adolphe de Wrède, a singer who heralded her appearance with a wonderful circular containing an account of her private life which had enough material in it for a three volume novel, gave a concert at Queen's Hall. She had the assistance of the Queen's Hall orchestra, conducted on this occasion by Landon Ronald, and of M. Ysaye, who played the solo part in Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto with great brilliance. The singer herself possesses a voice which, it must be confessed, displays signs of wear; but she gave songs by Saint-Saëns, Carl Bohm and Schumann with a certain amount of charm.

On the same evening the excellent Wessely String Quartet gave a concert at the Bechstein Hall. The program included three quartets, those by Mozart in C major, Beethoven in F major and Smetana in E minor.

Fate has been unkind to Madame Soldat, whose quartet was to have given four chamber concerts here this autumn. Owing to various untoward circumstances, the chamber concerts had to be abandoned, and in the end a single violin recital was given by Madame Soldat herself. A pupil of the great Joachim, her style reflects many of the best points of her master's playing, and she is at her best in thoroughly classical music. She gave two sonatas, those by Beethoven in G and Mozart in B flat, and Schubert's "Rondo Brillante," and her playing of them was most interesting, especially from the point of view of her phrasing. She was joined by Messrs. Leonard Borwick and Percy Such in Brahms' Piano Trio in B.

In the evening Mme. Eleanor Cleaver gave a remarkably successful concert at the Bechstein Hall. Her program was particularly interesting, and classical and modern songs were very happily combined. She opened the concert with a Romance from Ponchielli's opera "La Gioconda" and Scarlatti's "Per te vive ie par te more," of which she gave remarkably broad and dignified readings. Nor was she any less successful with those of Brahms' most beautiful songs, "Mädchenlied," "Das Mädchen spricht" and "Von Ewiger Liebe," which she sang with absolutely faultless taste. Among the modern songs which she brought forward were those from a new volume by Hermann Löhr, which is particularly well worth notice, as it contains some of the best songs that have been published in England for a long time. The three which Madame Cleaver selected were called "The Slumber Stream," "Baby Eyes" and "The Song of the Sea," and their effect was greatly enhanced by the admirable interpretation which she gave of them. She was assisted by Hugo Simon, a baritone, who sings with excellent taste, and Lady Hallé, whose violin solos were particularly attractive.

On the same evening Miss Mary Louisa White, a composer of light and graceful music, gave a concert of her own compositions at Steinway Hall. Most of her writings are clever, but she is obviously very much under the influence of Schumann just at present, and a little more individuality in her music would do it no harm.

Can it be that Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathètique" is losing its power to attract? Not long ago its inclusion in a Queen's Hall program meant that the concert room would be packed. On Tuesday night, however, it was played to an audience distinctly small in size. It is, perhaps, no matter for surprise if the fiery enthusiasm for this work has burned itself out to some extent. It is, of course, a wonderful and beautiful piece of music, but there is not a symphony in existence that could remain at the height of its popularity after being played so often as this symphony has been played of late years. The rest of the program was excellent and included violoncello solos by Hugo Becker, played in masterly style.

On Wednesday afternoon the third and last of the Ysaye-Becker-Busoni recitals took place at Queen's Hall. Since their first concert this trio has improved marvelously and the ensemble and balance of parts is now nearly perfect. Its playing is quite unlike that of any other trio in existence. Each of the players is capable of producing an enormously rich and full tone of beautiful quality, and in Tschaikowsky's fine trio in A minor they were heard at their best. It is unfortunate that the series of concerts should come to an end just as the three performers were getting really accustomed to playing together, but it is to be hoped that the trio will become a permanent institution.

On the same afternoon a ballad concert took place at St. James' Hall.

In the evening Sigmund Beel gave a most interesting violin recital at St. James' Hall, at which he produced a new sonata for violin and piano by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach The work made an excellent impression, and its originality and thorough musicianship must insure for it a place among the best modern examples of this class of music. The performance of it given by Mr. Beel and Henry Bird was really excellent, and later in the program the violinist gave further proof of his powers in Bach's Air in G and other pieces. The vocalist was Miss Ethel Henry Bird, a daughter of the well-known accompanist, who is a soprano of some promise, though she still needs more training.

On the same evening a recital was given by Lawrence Rea, a singer who has improved greatly of late. He was associated with the pianist Dr. Carl Friedberg, and the concert was given under the auspices of the Curtius Concert Club.

London is at this moment displaying quite inordinate activity in the way of music, and the concerts are really almost too numerous to mention. For Thursday, for instance, no fewer than six are announced, consisting of a vocal recital by Lilian Hovey, chamber concerts by Donald F. Tovey and Norah Nicholas, a violin recital by Richard C. Kay, an organ recital at Queen's Hall with Edwin Lemare as soloist, and Mme. Marie Dulcken's soirée musicale. The announcements for Friday also contain six concerts, of which the most important is a piano recital at Queen's Hall given by Signor Busoni. Sterling Mackinlay, a son of Mme. Antoinette Sterling and himself a promising singer, is giving a concert in conjunction with Miss Lucy Stone, the three Misses Taggart are giving a chamber concert, and Mme. Arta Smetana and Mme. Julia Rudge are holding vocal recitals, while there will be a Scotch ballad concert in Queen's Hall. On Saturday afternoon there will be a ballad concert in Queen's Hall, an orchestral concert at the Albert Hall, and in the evening will take place two Scotch concerts, one at Exeter

Harold Bauer's Recital.

DECEMBER 7, 1901.

The big rush of concerts is now practically over and though every day still brings its quota of music, the concert halls are not nearly so deeply engaged as they were a week or two back. By far the most important concert of the present week has been the piano recital given yesterday afternoon by Harold Bauer. It is to be feared that this artist is hardly appreciated at his true worth in London as yet, and St. James' Hall was not nearly as full as it ought to have been. But Bauer is a great artist, and there can be no doubt that here his day will come, as it already has on the Continent and in America. A popularity that is won slowly is often all the more lasting for it; Bauer's place among the leading pianists of the day has been recognized by the critics, and before long his recitals will attract as crowded an audience as those of any player before the public.

His program on Friday was particularly interesting. Pianists are only too apt to get into a groove, and the program of one recital is as like that of another as Tweedledum to Tweedledee. It was, therefore, something of a relief to go to a concert which did not begin with a Bach-Liszt Fugue, end with a Liszt Fantaisie, with a Beethoven Sonata and a Chopin group sandwiched in between them. The following is the program that Bauer played, and it must be admitted that it has all the merit of novelty, without ever deviating from strictly classical lines:

*Fantaisie in F minor.....Mozart
Etudes Symphoniques.....Schumann
(Introducing the five posthumous etudes.)
Prelude, Aria and Finale.....César Franck
Polonaise in C minor.....Chopin
Nocturne in F sharp minor.....Chopin
Scherzo in E major.....Chopin
Fantaisie in C.....Haydn
Impromptu in B flat.....Schubert
Mephisto Valse.....Liszt

To say that Bauer did justice to his excellent program would be but cold praise. He played everything well. Besides his wonderful technic he has the greatest musical ability, and it is by no means always that the two go hand in hand. His fortissimi are rich and powerful, but never hard; while in delicate passages his touch is beautifully soft, but absolutely unattended by any failure of tone. He is, too, a pianist with plenty of brains, and he knows how to use them; while he understands the poetry of music without ever being guilty of exaggeration or sentimentality.

The Mozart Fantaisie was a beautiful piece of playing. Mozart's music, both vocal and instrumental, has an unpleasant trick of showing up any faults of technic, but it certainly failed to find any in Bauer's case. His reading was delicate and sympathetic. The parts were brought out clearly and the gradation of tone was really remarkable. The performance which he gave of the Etudes Symphoniques was, however, the most interesting of the afternoon. The five posthumous etudes are very rarely played, beautiful though they are. Perhaps it is just as well, for in the hands of incompetent performers, who are only too ready to tackle these studies without the least idea of how they should be played, the piece in its usual form is quite long enough. With Bauer, however, the case is quite different. The variety with which he plays, his perfect command over his instrument and the thoroughness with which he grasps the intentions of the composer, all combined to make the performance one of the greatest interest. No finer contrast could have been desired than that which existed between the firmness and perfect sense of rhythm which he displayed in the fourth study and the finale, and the brilliant delicacy with which he gave the ninth. He played the five posthumous studies between the ninth and tenth of the original edition, and his reading of them was delightful to listen to. He gave the fourth and fifth particularly well.

Throughout the whole of the rest of the program he displayed the same breadth, warmth and sympathy that characterized his playing of the works already mentioned, and he proved himself a thorough artist by his grasp of the individual styles of the composers whose compositions he gave, from Chopin to Liszt. Harold Bauer is a pianist for whom a very great future may be safely prophesied.

*The Mozart Fantaisie is that written originally for four hands and transcribed by Fr. Kullak.

On Monday two piano recitals were given at St. James' Hall. In the afternoon the pianist was Miss Fanny Davies, a sound and praiseworthy player, though not gifted with any great individuality. Her program was arranged on interesting lines and opened with a group of English pieces, which included Purcell's Tocatta in A and Suite in G, two beautiful movements from a sonata by Nares, a charming Allegretto Grazioso, by Norman O'Neill, a most promising young composer, and pieces by Coleridge Taylor and Elgar. It is in lighter pieces such as these that Miss Davies is at her best, and she did ample justice to all of them.

In the evening Herr Wilhelm Backhaus gave a recital. This young pianist is in some ways promising, and in others he is disappointing. He possesses a fine technic, but his playing is overfluent and lacking in depth. He gave a really excellent performance of Brahms' fine Variations and Fugue on a theme by Händel, but in Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata he hurried the tempi in a manner that could not be excused.

In the afternoon two vocal recitals took place, one being given by Hayden Coffin at Steinway Hall, and one by Miss Olive Rae and Sidney Poyser at Bechstein Hall. At the latter hall the Misses Bush gave a concert in the evening.

By far the most interesting concert given on Tuesday was Dr. Lierhammer's vocal recital, which took place at the Bechstein Hall in the evening. Ever since the Viennese singer first appeared in London he has made a name for himself as an artist of the first order. His voice is not large, but it is perfectly trained, and he possesses an abundance of the invaluable gift of variety. His selection of songs covered a wide range and they numbered fifteen, including Schubert's "Der Tod und das Mädchen" and "Die Forelle," Grieg's "Ein Schwan," Caldara's "Come Raggio" and Brahms' "Röslein Dreie." Dr. Lierhammer's singing is marked by the perfection of his phrasing and his wonderful refinement, and it is not too much to say that this program could not have been better sung.

In the afternoon Miss Tora Hwass gave a piano recital at St. James' Hall. Miss Hwass is an eminently praiseworthy, if not a very original pianist. Her readings were all thoroughly sound, but, as is the case with only too many other pianists, individuality is not her strong point.

On the same afternoon Miss Elizabeth Patterson gave a vocal recital at the Bechstein Hall, and made a great success in some songs by Ethelbert Nevin, and in a set of operatic airs. She has, however, one fault which needs correction; her enunciation is terribly indistinct. The words of many songs are bad enough in all conscience, but since the possession of words is the very essence of a song, they may as well be pronounced intelligently. If words are not to be considered of any importance, why should a singer not include a group of Concone's Vocalises in a program? Some of his tunes are really charming.

In the evening a first rate performance of Brahms' Requiem was given in St. Paul's Cathedral. The choir was supplemented by extra voices and a small orchestra played the accompaniments under the conductorship of Sir Theodore Martin. The Cathedral is particularly well adapted for such a performance, and the choir and orchestra were admirably trained. The Requiem is given very seldom in London, and one cannot be too grateful for such opportunities of hearing it. Hitherto Spohr's "Last Judgment" has always been given in Advent, and the change was most welcome.

On Wednesday afternoon Mlle. Sandra Droucker, a Russian pianist, gave a recital at the Bechstein Hall. Mlle. Droucker has an excellent technic and she is at her best in florid music. In music requiring a delicate and sympathetic touch she is apt to be a little soulless, but she proved herself a pianist of undoubted power in studies by Liszt and Chopin.

On the same afternoon the weekly organ recital took place at Queen's Hall with Edwin H. Lemare as soloist, while Henry Bramen gave a violoncello recital at St. James' Hall.

Mme. Blanche Marchesi has always been famed for her interesting programs, and that which she gave on Wednesday evening at the Bechstein Hall proved to be no exception to the rule. Among other songs that she brought forward were Jensen's fine but little known song cycle "Dolorosa," Goldmark's "Fata Morgana," Bonnadier's "Jalouse" and two songs by Hugo Wolff. Madame Marchesi is one of those singers who rely principally upon their dramatic power for their success, and she gave fine performances of all her songs. She might, however, well have omitted Arthur Bouhn's foolish "song without words," "The Birds' Sunday Morning Service," which does not improve on acquaintance.

Mlle. Aus der Ohe, a pianist who has not appeared in London for some years, gave a concert at Steinway Hall on Thursday afternoon. She came forward both as a pianist and a composer, giving excellent proof of her attainments in the former capacity in sonatas by Schumann and Chopin. Her own suite in E proved to be an interesting and original piece of work, brilliantly written and no less brilliantly played.

The rest of the week's concerts call only for passing mention. The Signorine Cerasoli were to have given a recital of music for two pianos at St. James' Hall on Thursday afternoon, but owing to the unfortunate illness of Signorina Rosina Cerasoli the program had to be revised. The burden and heat of the day thus fell upon her sister, Signorina Beatrice, who at the last moment obtained the assistance of the violinist, Señor Arbos.

On the same afternoon Marjorie Lutyens gave a piano recital at Bechstein Hall, while in the evening Willetta Parker and Margherita Cimino gave a concert at the Salle Erard. Two small concerts took place on Friday, one being given at the Bechstein Hall by Samuel Aitken and one at the Steinway Hall by Edgar McIntyre.

The only other important concert of the week was the performance of Coleridge Taylor's "Hiawatha," given by the Royal Choral Society at the Albert Hall on Thursday evening. This work has now gained a firm hold upon the affections of the British public and it seems to be in no danger of losing its popularity. The Royal Choral Society is a particularly fine choir, and the performance on Thursday was as good as could be.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Second Pair of Concerts.

LAST Thursday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the following program at Carnegie Hall:

Concert Overture, In the Spring, in A major, op. 36.....Goldmark
Concerto for Violin, No. 5, in A minor, op. 37.....Vieuxtemps
Charles Gregorowitsch.
Ein Heldenleben, tone poem for full orchestra.....Richard Strauss
(First time at these concerts.)
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 36.....Beethoven

There was a noticeable lack of balance in the arrangement of this program, and such a lapse is unusual coming from Mr. Gericke. Of course the list was so schemed for Boston, but Mr. Gericke ought to know by this time that the temperamental distance between Boston and New York is not to be measured by miles. The step from Strauss' "Heldenleben" to Beethoven's Second Symphony is neither sublime nor ridiculous; it is simply impossible, be the imagination shod with never so many seven league boots. In the slogan of moderns: Place aux nouveautés! So why give us the Beethoven at all on this program; or, if we are to hear it let it not follow Strauss. After the "Heldenleben" comes the deluge of impressions. Perhaps the symphony was meant as an antidote, but since when has Beethoven, even the early Beethoven, been relegated to this ignoble use on a program? There are plenty of French composers whose works easily might have filled in the remaining portion of the evening, works to which we could have listened respectfully and not have been disturbed a particle in our afterthoughts of Strauss. But all this is merely polite hedging—whatever else went before, the "Heldenleben" should have been the last number on the list. Mr. Paur realized that last year at its repetition.

The Goldmark Overture, with which the concert opened, is a pretty work; one feels tempted to call it sweet. It is all couleur de rose and memorable for nothing in particular. Of course the scoring is charming; Goldmark loves profoundly the strings, and writes for them the most graceful passages.

Then Gregorowitsch played the A minor Vieuxtemps Concerto. His tone is manly and healthy, his playing free, unaffected. He has not been heard here for four years, but his absence has not cost him any popularity, as the endless applause testified. Of the concerto itself there is little to be said; it is decorative in pattern and also in contents; it displays the instrument and the performer, and does both gratefully. So one hardly looks for any deeper meaning. Gregorowitsch shaded some of the episodes, especially the adagio, by tingeing them with imagination, and altogether made much of this show piece.

The audience was on the anxious bench to hear how Strauss' hero might live his strenuous life in Boston and Back Bay. Mr. Gericke soon clipped our wings of expectancy—in fact, he did it with the very first theme. Seldom has there been such a laying bare of a score; every section was finely articulated, every reminiscence unearthed. The band played it superbly, and the orchestral color was so luscious as to draw attention away from the composition itself. The solo parts were exquisitely done, the gradations of light and shadow careful. But was it Strauss, was it heroic? Not in the least. Mr. Gericke has been varnishing a Monet, trying to give it the meticulous appearance of a Meissonier, and has succeeded in presenting neither. Give us rather the virile reading of Paur, even though the latter's orchestra have uncouth strings and hesitating woodwind. There is missed in Mr. Gericke's conducting of this work the episodic climax. The battle scene might be a refined version of the Boston Tea Party or it might be only a public reading of Browning on Boston Common; a Strauss battle it is not. There was almost a touch of the gentle in this incident the other night, and one believed that in his mind's eye Mr. Gericke had pictured the Strauss hero a weak fanatic—such as Edwin Abbey has made of the later Sir Galahad—and that he recalled Abbey's tame battle scene when conducting this one. To sum it up and forsake the endless strings of comparison which suggest themselves, we wished that we might have heard the Gericke version first because it cleared up so many mooted parts of the intricate score; and on this foundation it would have been easy to ground the Paur version, which remains, all considered, the one to be remembered.

It seemed a difficult task after hearing the "Heldenleben" to realize that Beethoven's Second Symphony in its day had been regarded as revolutionary music. An English critic had become so much excited by the music that he wished for "a repose of at least a full half-hour after it"! With every bar of this lucid music one's ears denied this story or even the possibility of it; yet it is a matter of record. Are a few years to mellow the difficulties of a Strauss score into easy comprehension? Very probably, and the generation after will read the present discussions, hear the work and blandly ask what the excitement was all about.

This Second Symphony is too often tossed aside by those who mark off their musical admiration according to dates. Of course it is an early work, but Beethoven had not been idle since composing the first of the set; besides his deafness was becoming noticeable and gave him a much more serious view of life; so the stride from the first to this symphony was an enormous one. But withal the work is friendly, and in it there is not yet the touch of the obstinate giant—it is far too amiable for that. In the matter of orchestration it sounds simplicity itself, and with the Strauss seemed to stand for the antipodes in music. Here, too, are innovations in form—one remembers them of old and listens for them now, but does not hear them. Innovations in form? But certainly not after Strauss! And then one girds at the staid man from Boston, whose program is out of chronological plumb.

But the work has not aged; circumstances alone are at fault. The Larghetto is still divinely melodious, and the crispness of the final Allegro will outlast its critics. It was beautifully played the other evening, was this number, and the daintiness of the orchestral tone, with its shimmering colors of violin, was altogether in place.

For the Saturday matinee this program was played:

Overture, Cockaigne (In London Town).....Elgar
(First time in New York.)
Concerto for Piano in E minor, op. 11.....Chopin
Josef Hofmann.
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73.....Brahms

Here the novelty was the first number. Philip Hale in his notes writes interestingly about the program of this work, which is meant to represent in musical terms a glorification of London. But London refuses to be made a holiday of for the sake of any composer, and the work might be half-soled with any sort of program.

Read the following and judge for yourself how much inspiration for composition may be found in such a cockney program: The composer allows two imaginary lovers to stroll the animated streets of London Town, eventually seeking the quiet of a park, where they make foolish love to each other. They are interrupted in their al fresco performance by a band of Hooligans—whose fathers must certainly have come from Nuremberg and at one time or another been engaged in the Wagner "Polterabend" scrimmage—and they again return to the streets, where a military band is playing with real English zeal. The lovers show their good sense by trying to avoid this music, and they stray into a church—always a dangerous thing for lovers to do unless the groom has a ring and serious intentions. But to help the composer's love for musical form they return to the streets once more and give Mr. Elgar an opportunity to ring in the Recapitulation and Coda—for this work is supposed to be in the Sonata form, and of course when one is in a Sonata one must do as the Sonata does.

One does not look to England for masterpieces—British composers are still too busy writing works for provincial oratorio festivals to study Purcell and take up English music where he left it. As a result Elgar's "Cockaigne" disappointed few. It lacks sadly a purpose; it is, in a word, empty. The mind fastens on no single incident as quarry for thought, and collectively it is meaningless. The scoring is far from unusual and the effects are sought after crudely.

For the next number there was Hofmann's playing of the E minor Chopin Concerto. It was a fine ensemble performance. Hofmann treated the work with pianissimo consideration and cheerfully left out of it many of the usual sentimental slurrings which most pianists feel called upon to play with hysterical exaggeration. Hofmann's tempo may be open to criticism, inasmuch as it represented lost opportunities of contrast. But these are details and fall away in the consideration of his work entire. His playing of the Romance atoned for many of his past sins and the sentiment displayed was not of the mawkish sort. The Rondo was done with more spirit than he usually displays, and the most redeeming feature in his playing was that it seemed really to interest him. Mr. Gericke's accompaniment was all the pianist could have wished.

The concluding work was Brahms' D major Symphony, and if this beautiful reading and performance of it did not initiate many unknowing ones into the beauties of this composition then there is no hope for them. It is the most easily understood of the four, the most pleasing. As has been pointed out by someone, Brahms composed his greater works in pairs, the one in contrast to the other; and it would seem here that he had tried to atone for the heroic sternness of the First Symphony by writing at short interval this vernal second one, in which there is the mild mood of a great man.

There is the breath of Beethoven in parts of this work—the first subject suggests a tempered version of the main

WHITNEY TEW

In America
November,
December
And January.

The London Press says of Mr. Tew's singing:

The Stage—"Mr. Whitney Tew proved himself a singer of excellent capabilities. His voice, which is a bass of great compass, is delightfully sympathetic—now full of tenderness, now instinct with passion and joy. He could not have been surpassed in his rendering of Schumann's 'Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn' and Liza Lehmann's curiously weird 'Myself when Young.'"—July 4, 1901.

London Musical Courier—"Mr. Whitney Tew's singing was marked by a high order of intelligence. He is one of the few singers now before the public who possesses the many qualifications that mean success. Besides a voice powerful and sympathetic he has a remarkable memory, and he never fails to display an intuitive knowledge of the poetic and dramatic significance of the text. In four songs by Bach, Brahms, Schubert and Schumann he exhibited great powers of vocalization and expression, and a style in singing German so thoroughly Teutonic that it was hard at times to realize his American origin . . . Three songs in English were equally impressive."—July 5, 1901.

Ladies' Field—"That fine bass singer, Mr. Whitney Tew, gave the first of his recitals in Steinway Hall. Madame Lehmann's 'In Memoriam' was a great test of Mr. Tew's manner and inflection, and he sustained the interest of his audience well throughout it; and it is a supremely hard work for a single voice—fragmentary, passionate, moody, with its pedal-note of acute sorrow. . . . Mr. Tew is fortunate in possessing a powerful voice of fine quality, and he has both the voice and brains for success."—May 25, 1901.

Daily Telegraph—"Mr. Tew is an artist who commands attention and deserves praise. Especially has he the gift of feeling and the power of conveying it to others, while in point of intelligence he leaves but little to desire. Mr. Tew essayed last evening songs of widely contrasting kinds and of various countries, but the manner and spirit proper to each were easily revealed, and the result was a conspicuous success."—May 23 1901.

theme in the first Allegro of Beethoven's "Eroica"—but for the rest it is Brahms at his sunniest. Every movement of this symphony is separately beautiful, and as a whole the work hangs together as logically as a symphony should; be it confessed that in this respect it is quite the equal of Beethoven's "Eroica."

To reduce the impressions and meanings of music to words is frequently to succeed in the absurd. So it is not without a great splurge of superlatives that one can try to sketch the beauties of this score. One should hear it to appreciate the melody of it all; the peace of the Allegro, continued in a more mysterious vein in the singing Adagio; then the naïve Ländler, with its change of rhythm and its misplaced accents; and the final Allegro, interrupted by the tranquil episodes. As for the scoring, about which so many wise heads have been wagged, here let Brahms talk for himself: Who of the moderns has gotten such results from the strings, for instance, in the first movement, where the theme is pitched in their upper register, and in his sympathetic treatment of the horns and 'cello? And lovers of Schumann call this thick scoring! But why this discussion at all? There are none so deaf as those who will not hear.

At both concerts were there large audiences. The orchestra's work was better than it has been at any time this season.

OBITUARY.

Constantine Otto Weber.

A CLAIM is made that several errors as to dates, &c., appeared in the obituary notice of the late Constantine Weber in The Musical Courier of a recent date. The following is contributed:

Constantine Otto Weber, musician, composer and teacher, died in New Orleans on Wednesday, November 13, 1901, at the age of fifty-four years. The deceased was a native of Germany, a graduate of the Leipsic Conservatory, and for more than thirty years a resident of New Orleans. Always distinguished as a piano teacher, he devoted the first period of his life in this city chiefly to the organ, and occupied the position of organist and musical director in Temple Sinai, Trinity, and the Unitarian and Jesuits' churches. In his riper years he abandoned this calling for the occupation of teaching and composing, and soon rose to recognition as the most eminent piano teacher in New Orleans. Mr. Weber published almost exclusively through Leipsic and other Continental houses, and the amount and the character of the unpublished compositions left by him are not yet known.

Ferdinand Quentin Dulcken.

The old guard, which used to make Steinway Hall their artistic headquarters more than two decades ago, is gradually dying out. Death removed from its ranks last Tuesday night, after a lingering illness of several months' duration, one of its proudest pillars. Ferdinand Q. Dulcken, amiable man, excellent musician and fertile composer, breathed his last at his home in Astoria, L. I. The following data concerning his life are furnished by an old friend who knew Dulcken intimately ever since he came to this country in the centennial year.

Ferdinand Dulcken was an Englishman by birth and came from a musical family. His mother was Mme. Louise Dulcken, a great pianist in her day and a younger sister of Ferdinand David, the once celebrated concertmaster of the Gewandhaus Orchestra at Leipsic, under Mendelssohn, and after the latter's death under succeeding conductors. Equally well known was David as a violin teacher.

Louise Dulcken in 1828 married in London, where she made her début in 1829 at one of Mr. Ella's soirées, and on March 1, 1830, she played at the Philharmonic Society and thereafter at many other important concerts.

As a teacher she was extraordinarily successful, and among her pupils may be mentioned the Duchess of Kent and the Crown Princess Victoria, who, upon her accession to the throne, named Madame Dulcken a court pianist. She died on April 12, 1850, thirty-nine years old.

Ferdinand Quentin Dulcken, her son, showed musical talent at an early age, which was carefully developed. Later on he entered the Conservatory at Leipsic, where he became a pupil of Mendelssohn, who took much interest in him, probably through the influence of his uncle, Ferdinand David. Dulcken must have been at the time a mere boy, for Mendelssohn died in 1847. After graduating from the conservatory he successively lived at London, Warsaw, Moscow and St. Petersburg, teaching and concertizing. He came to the United States in 1876, when he acted at Steinway Hall as accompanist to the violinist Alfred Vivien, who was a member of the Essipoff Concert Company. He also appeared during the same season as soloist in various concerts at Steinway Hall.

He was an excellent musician and accompanist, traveling for a number of years with Remenyi and Wilhelmj.

After his marriage, seventeen years ago, he settled down and the last years of his life were spent at Astoria, L. I., quietly, but busily, in teaching and composing, Dulcken appearing from time to time also at local concerts and taking an active but unsectarian interest in church music. As a composer he was prolific, his published works numbering nearly 400, among which are some masses, vocal quartets and songs and a great number of piano pieces.

Personally Ferdinand Dulcken was one of the most genuinely good natured and kind hearted of men one could possibly find. Of him it is actually true, what has been said so often with more or less veracity of others, viz., that he had not a single enemy. The number of his friends, however, was legion. Hence also the mourning at the news of his demise was general and the grief over his death sincere. This could be seen plainly also at the funeral obsequies on last Saturday afternoon, when the home of the deceased was thronged with friends, who were eager to bestow the last honor on Dulcken. Willis H. Halling, an old pupil of his, officiated at the organ and John C. Dempsey, in a voice choked with tears, sang some Ambrose and Spohr sacred songs. Remarkable was also the fact that, although Ferdinand Q. Dulcken was not what might be called a "religious" man, four clergymen of different denominations, not a single rabbi among them, however, had united in lending their services for his funeral.

Norman McLeod.

Boston, Mass., December 16, 1901.

The sudden death of Norman McLeod at his residence in Boston on Sunday afternoon, December 15, came as a great shock to his many friends and admirers. In the morning Mr. McLeod played at the First Baptist Church, where he has been organist and director of music for twenty-five years. A large congregation assembled at the church in the evening for the special musical service, Rossini's "Stabat Mater" having been announced, only to be met with the sad news of Mr. McLeod's death.

Mr. McLeod was identified with whatever stood for the best in music in Boston. He was a member of the leading musical societies, always taking an active part in their work. A thorough musician, his knowledge of all music made him a remarkably successful teacher, and many of his pupils are among the best known soloists of Boston and vicinity.

Mr. McLeod is survived by his widow and two young sons, one of whom has just entered Harvard.

THE HAMLIN COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

Elaine DeSellem, contralto, and Charles Champlin, basso, will sing "The Messiah" with the Amateur Musical Club, of Battle Creek, Mich., on December 31. The Hamlin Company announce the ensuing bookings for December: Charles W. Clark, Gaul's "Holy City," Chicago, December 5; Indianapolis, Ind., December 10; Chicago Orchestra's Historical Program, December 13 and 14. Sue Harrington Furbeck, Aurora, December 4; Galesburg, December 6, and Oak Park, December 10; Oberlin, Ohio, December 12 and 13. George Hamlin, Galesburg, December 6; New York, December 12 and 16, and Joliet, Ill., December 9. Holmes Cowper, Terre Haute, December 4; Oak Park, December 10, and Chicago, December 10. Sydney Biden, Cincinnati, December 5, and Joliet, December 10.

George Hamlin, tenor; Sydney Biden, baritone, and Leon Marx, violinist, will contribute a program at Joliet on December 19. On November 22 Holmes Cowper sang at Davenport, Ia., with great success. The following press notices indicate the enthusiasm which he aroused:

Mr. Cowper has a pure tenor voice. There is in it not the least suggestion of baritone, and though he makes no effort to develop a large volume of sound, his tones are sufficiently modulated to give beautiful expression to all that he sings. Possibly it was the aria "Onaway, Awake!" (Taylor) which pleased the audience especially and showed the possibilities of his voice.—Times, Davenport, Ia., November 26, 1901.

Mr. Cowper's voice is of rare sweetness and purity of tone, and the facility with which he handles the high notes and the great range of which he is the complete master excited admiration in all privileged to hear him. He is assuredly a most remarkable tenor.—Republican, Davenport, Ia., November 26, 1901.

Holmes Cowper, of Chicago, the celebrated tenor, was the feature of the evening, as he did not disappoint the audience. He is the possessor of a superb high tenor voice, his upper tones being of dulcet clearness and purity, and at the same time his lower register gave evidence of much training and careful control, the quality being exceptional for the compass of his voice. It was his "Jessie, the Flower of Dunblane," that seemed to awaken the audience to the sympathetic qualities of his voice, and as the last tones of that sweet old Scotch melody died away the singer was greeted with rapturous applause. At the conclusion of "An Evening Song" he was recalled and sang "Oh, that We Two Were Maying," by Nevin, and his Rubinstein selections were of such merit as is seldom heard here.—Davenport Leader, November 26, 1901.

Kubelik, the violinist, will give two recitals at the Auditorium, the dates being Thursday evening, January 16, and Saturday afternoon, January 18.

Clara Morris, the actress, will lecture at the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, on the evening of January 31.

It is announced that Richard Burmeister, the eminent pianist, will give a recital in this city on February 13.

Eduard Zeldenrust, the distinguished Dutch pianist, will be heard in a recital at the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, on February 28.

"Peculiar People I Have Met" will be the subject of Max O'Rell's lecture on January 9, at the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building.

Mr. Curtiss, director of the Fine Arts Building, and Louis Francis Brown, manager of the Music Hall and Studebaker Hall, left this city last Saturday, to pay New York a business visit. They will return to Chicago on Monday, December 16.

EVENTS AT THE AUDITORIUM CONSERVATORY.

Before an appreciative audience Sig. Umberto Beduschi, the Italian tenor, who has been engaged by the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory, gave an informal concert at the Hyde Park Hotel on Tuesday evening, December 10. Errico Sansone and Fay Hill assisted.

Errico Sansone, of the violin department of the Auditorium Conservatory, gave the second recital of his Bach series on Wednesday evening, December 11, in Recital Hall, Auditorium.

Pupils of H. Stanley Davies, of the dramatic department of the Auditorium Conservatory, give the laughable farce, "Who's to Win Him?" on Monday, December 16.

Miss Lillian Sargent will give a piano recital at the Auditorium Conservatory on Thursday evening, December 19.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Dickson, directors of the School of Acting of the Auditorium Conservatory, will entertain the members of their classes on Wednesday evening, December 18, in the parlors of the Conservatory.

Robert Stevens, of the piano department of the Auditorium Conservatory, will give the first of a series of Bach recitals on Saturday afternoon, December 21.

A new choral society to be known as the Auditorium Choral Club is being organized under the direction of Herman L. Walker. The purpose is to study and present, in a series of concerts, the lighter choral works and part songs of the best composers.

"When a young artist raises his terms he limits his field and makes more difficult the arrangement of his engagements," said a prominent Western manager the other day. "There are about a dozen clubs which can pay so much," he continued, "but the rest are unable to reach that sum."

It appears, however, that the young artist is not always ready to appreciate these facts.

Thus the manager has difficulties with which to contend. He works day and night, and secures for his budding artist seven or eight engagements.

The press in the small towns where these seven or eight appearances are made prints glowing accounts: "No such singer ever before visited the county of Z——." "Such art is art indeed; Melba will soon be outshone." Or, in the case of a tenor: "He reminds one of de Reszké."

Then the head of the youthful artist is turned.

With a triumphant air he greets his manager, and declares: "It was all a tremendous success. But there wasn't enough in it for me."

The manager ventures to suggest something about his percentage.

But the youthful artist hasn't his pocketbook with him just as present. "I must raise my concert fee!" he simply exclaims.

And the manager's troubles begin.

In May, 1902, Victor Heinze will leave Chicago for a six months' sojourn in Europe.

Bruno Steindel has given his exclusive management to Dunstan Collins for the season of 1902-03. He will also tour several weeks with the Steindel Company. Mr. Collins states that he has never known a company to give such excellent satisfaction as the Steindel Company ha

Elizabeth Edwards, who is studying with William A. Willett at the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory, recently sang with success before the Rogers Park Woman's Club.

Hazel Harrison, the young pianist, who recently made a brilliant début before the Amateur Club, of Chicago, is a pupil of Victor Heinze, of the Fine Arts Building.

MARY PECK THOMSON.

The following estimates of Mary Peck Thomson, the exceptionally gifted soprano, will be read with interest:

Her voice is a fine mezzo soprano, excellent to begin with through the gift of nature, and now possessed of that charm which culture alone can bring. She became a favorite with her audience at once, and every number she sang only served to strengthen the bond of sympathy.—Minneapolis Tribune.

Her enunciation is delightfully clear and distinct. Her singing was a rare treat, the equal of which has perhaps never been heard here.—Watseka Blade.

Miss Thomson's voice combines singular sweetness with power, and is of wide range. Her selections gave an opportunity for variety in expression and in this she excels.—Topeka Daily Capital.

She has a rich, full voice of velvety softness and an ideal temperament for a concert singer.—Minneapolis Journal.

Miss Mary Peck Thomson, of Chicago, took the leading part in the program and succeeded in completely captivating her audience with a fine voice and charming manner.—South Bend Sunday News.

In addition to singing in public, Miss Thomson is teaching a large and promising class of pupils at the Fine Arts Building.

Glenn Hall has made a contract with Dunstan Collins to tour for ten weeks next season in joint recitals with some artist to be announced later.

A musical monologue, "The Christmas Star," and three one act plays, "St. Valentine's Day," "Palmistry" and the "Sisters," were given on Tuesday evening, December 10, under Miss Lumm's direction, by students in the dramatic department at the American Conservatory. Such work is truly educational, and to persons not familiar with these recitals the finish which characterized the entire program must have been a surprise. Those who took part were: Messrs. Palmer, Lennon and Kirkland, Mrs. Staples, and the Misses Lewis, Phillips, Holmes, Buffington, Benedict and Abell.

"There is just one distinguished pianist whom everyone is ready to turn out to hear on such a stormy night as this promises to be and that is Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler," said a well-known local pianist at one of the Chicago conservatories this afternoon. And this local pianist's friend, a tenor, who, on very excellent authority, is said to resemble the hero of a well-known present day novel by a very estimable author, rushed off to hurry through a Christmas rehearsal, so that he might not keep the other waiting when the time should come for them to tramp together through the snow and hear Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler play to-night.

FREDERICK WARREN'S RECITAL.

Arthur Somervell's cycle of twelve songs, the words of which are from Tennyson's beautiful creation, "Maud," formed the first part of the program given by Frederick Warren, the well-known baritone, at the Chicago Auditorium Conservatory on the afternoon of December 12. Mr. Warren sang with much expression, and, when occasion demanded, his numbers were full of dramatic intensity. Later the singer contributed before his appreciative and essentially musical audience the ensuing group of American and English ballads: "In Haven," Elgar; "When Katie Tuned the Old Guitar," Bird; "Spanish Serenade," Bird; "A Good Excuse," Foote; "The West Wind Croons in the Cedar Trees," MacDowell; "My Love and I Sat Close Together," MacDowell; "Irish Love Song," Lang; "To My First Love," Lohr; "You'd Better Ask Me," Lohr; "Long Ago in Alcala," Messager.

The accompanist was Zella Marshall, a young pianist of considerable ability.

A recent caller at the Chicago office of THE MUSICAL COURIER was Electa Gifford, the soprano. Under the direction of Charles R. Baker, of the Fine Arts Building, Miss Gifford has been filling important Western engagements, owing to which she was compelled to decline two important New York appearances. In the East Miss Gifford sings with the Boston Orchestra and with Paur's Orchestra. As is well known, her New York début, on November 30, was a decided success.

Mabelle Crawford, the contralto, is having a busy season. This artist, who, like Miss Gifford, is under the management of Charles R. Baker, will be heard here, with the Apollo Club, in "The Messiah," on Christmas night. It would be interesting to hear Miss Gifford and Miss Crawford in a joint recital.

Many musicians will attend the Spiering Quartet's concert in Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, on December 17. The Chicago Tribune recently printed an interesting record of work accomplished here by this skilled organization.

"For eight years the Spiering Quartet has struggled for existence," said the writer, "and only the indomitable will of its founder has kept it from the dissolution to which the indifference of the public seemed determined to force it. Its founder would not give up, however. He believed that in time he could attract a number of charming music admirers sufficient to enable his organization to live, and he felt that Chicago as a music centre must needs have such an organization.

"Eight years of labor, of sacrifice and of money seem now to have brought the regard he believed would come—this season the quartet concerts promise to be self-supporting. The condition is a most gratifying one, and, although the music public's duty can scarcely be called done until patronage sufficient to do more than merely meet present expenses is accorded, yet one can but congratulate Mr. Spiering on the success which he seems finally to have won through his determination and courage. He, too, has learned by the past years, however. He has learned that programs of string quartets alone will not find favor here, at least not yet, and he has wisely conceded to public preference, and now offers chamber music evenings varied in character.

"The first of these evenings attracted an audience of exceptionally choice musical quality to Music Hall last evening, and the size of the audience, as well as the appreciation it lent the performance, told that the seed sown in years past now are beginning to bear good fruit."

CHICAGO MUSICAL COLLEGE.

Many hundreds of students daily attend the Chicago Musical College, where inspiration and knowledge are gained. Among the pupils are vocalists and instrumentalists of exceptional talent, whose names are destined to become familiar to the world of music.

The great success of the Chicago Musical College's faculty concert, recently given in the Studebaker Hall, Fine Arts Building, has been referred to in a previous article. The program was of so excellent a character that it may well be printed in full:

Artists who consented to assist Mrs. Luella Clark Emery at her class musicale on December 9 were Mrs. Aimee J. Richmond, soprano, and members of the Mendelssohn Trio.

On December 12 at the second ballad concert in the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, under the auspices of the Clayton F. Summy Company, the artists who took part were Mme. Ragna Linné, soprano; Miss Elaine De Sellem, contralto; Claude Cunningham, baritone; W. C. E. Seeboeck, pianist, and Mrs. Nellie Bangs Skelton, accompanist. Composers represented on the extensive program were F. Lynes, Geo. L. Tracy, H. N. Bartlett, John A. Carpenter, Noel Johnson, Clayton Johns, Denza, De Koven, Elisa Mazzucato Young, Constantin v. Sternberg, Rachmaninoff, J. B. Campbell, Joseph Gahm, F. S. Hastings, Adolf Weidig, Mrs. Charles S. Hardy, C. Welleby, C. B. Hawley, W. C. E. Seeboeck, F. W. Wodell, Edith Swepstone, Susan Weare Hubbard, Dudley Buck, Guy d'Hardelot and Grieg.

Herbert Butler, violinist, has been engaged to tour for ten weeks in recitals with Glenn Hall next season under the management of Dunstan Collins.

Among promising pupils of Mary M. Shedd, who teaches the American Method of Singing at the Auditorium Building, are Irene Briggs, Anna Rosengreen, Hazel Lucile Jameson, Harry Canevin, Hardie Pitzele, F. S. Bingham, O. Rohn, A. Rosengreen and L. Miller.

The recitals given recently at Aurora, Ill., by Birdice Blye Richardson, the gifted pianist, was commented upon as follows by the local press:

Mrs. Richardson's playing is marked by a grace and poetry of interpretation, a beauty of tone, a charm of expression and a perfection of finish that belong truly to the greatest artists.—The Aurora Daily News, November 20, 1901.

Thoroughly at ease, with a gracious and delightful personality, she charmed her audience with her beautiful and artistic playing. She plays with great expression and ease and repose that is astonishing when one considers the effects she produces. Her touch is clear and firm, and her technic leaves little to be desired. The program was varied enough to show her power, and the hearty applause and encores testified to the enthusiasm she aroused.—Aurora Daily Express, November 20, 1901.

On the afternoon of December 21, under the auspices of the American Conservatory, Kimball Hall, a Mozart-Haydn recital will be given by prominent members of the faculty.

The musical portion of the Arché Club's program of December 13 has been arranged by D. A. Clippinger, of Kimball Hall.

Genevieve Clark Wilson has given her exclusive management to Dunstan Collins for the balance of the present season and for the season of 1902-03.

For the third annual artists' recital of the Piano Students' Club, Freeport, Ill., Theodore Spiering and Maurice Aronson have been engaged to give a violin and piano recital.

Clara G. Trimble will sing with the Apollo Club, Denver, Col., on January 9, and at Kansas City on February 4.

That a city of Chicago's dimensions did not tender to the Pittsburg Orchestra a more enthusiastic and spontaneous welcome may appear, to the uninitiated, to be a matter of surprise. But it must be taken into consideration that from the beginning of the year to the end of it, Chicago is fairly saturated with orchestral music. Likewise, it must be remembered that with their own conductor members of the local orchestra and subscribers to the regular series of local events are understood to be quite satisfied.

The two anniversary concerts given at the Auditorium on December 9 and 10 were under the local management of Charles R. Baker, who engaged not only the Pittsburg Orchestra, but four soloists for these events.

William H. Sherwood interpreted Liszt's Concerto, No. 1, in E flat. Seldom has this artist played more brilliantly and with finer effect, though he was at some disadvantage, owing to lack of sufficient rehearsals with the orchestra. At the conclusion of the fourth movement he received an ovation and was compelled to contribute an encore.

"Home, Sweet Home," and "Auld Lang Syne" on one night! That was what we heard! For Victor Herbert introduced the latter as a theme in his somewhat noisy but "taking" "Auditorium Festival March," composed for the occasion, and the former was sung by Suzanne Adams as an encore. Since, on a former occasion, of similar nature, Madame Patti sang it at the Auditorium.

Now, if Miss Adams had sung "Home, Sweet Home," well she might be forgiven for introducing it. But she did not sing it well. The enunciation, expression, tone coloring—all were imperfect. And she embellished the final cadence of the last stanza with a high note, which seemed to be somewhat uncalled for. Her fine soprano voice was more effective in Verdi's Aria from "Traviata," but she seemed to be suffering from a cold. The orchestra gave selections by Wagner, Herbert and Tschaikowsky. Victor Herbert conducted with characteristic spirit.

On the second night Mr. Herbert introduced to Chicago his symphonic poem, "Hero and Leander." Tschaikowsky's Symphony No. 6, op. 74, and Wagner's Vorspiel, "Die Meistersinger," were the remaining contributions.

Sembrich sang the aria from Bellini's "Norma" and created such a furore that she had to give three encores. She was in superb voice, and her manner was more charming than ever.

Esther Feé played the first two movements of Bruch's G minor Concerto. The young artist was well received and enthusiastically encored. To be placed on such a program was a trial for any youthful violinist. Her playing illustrated that she possesses exceptional talent, and that before her undoubtedly lies a brilliant future.

Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler's concert at the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, last evening was a great artistic achievement. An extended review of the remarkably comprehensive program, together with to-day's and to-morrow's glowing tributes in the Chicago papers, will constitute the first part of the next Chicago letter in THE MUSICAL COURIER.

To-day someone referred to Madame Zeisler as one "divinely gifted." This person must have been present at her recital in Chicago last night. MAY HAMILTON.

FRITZ KREISLER.

THE well-known violinist, Fritz Kreisler, arrived here a few days ago on the Etruria for his American tour, and there is every evidence of big success for him again this season. He will make his first appearance with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra on December 20 and 21.

Many are the stories of how the renowned violinist enraptured his fellow passengers one evening during the voyage, and the following, from the New York Herald of December 16, gives a true version of it:

Meanwhile the sea-worn Cunarder had found her pier and was leaning wearily against it—topheavy with Christmas mail and freighted with strange tales. One of these has to do with a violinist, who, during the voyage, entranced the saloon passengers with melody. When embarking at Liverpool there had floated aboard with him a story of a sweet-toned and ancient Stradivarius, an instrument for which the owner was said to have paid a fabulous sum.

Fritz Kreisler is the name of the violinist. Many of the passengers knew of him through having read of how he had come into fame on a happy night in Berlin, when Ysaye, famed soloist, had been unable to proceed, and Kreisler had continued the performance, winning many laurels and vast applause.

But it was around this noted Stradivarius of his that most interest clung. Violinists are many, but "Strads" are few, and although, as some cynic has observed, they derive their chief value from their rarity, there were none among the Etruria's saloon passengers who were not more than eager to hear strains from an instrument of such antiquity and renown.

So Kreisler was appealed to and Kreisler consented. The pleaders had thought it delicate to make no reference to the Stradivarius, urging only that they wished to hear the violinist, and when at the Saturday night concert he gave selections the entire saloon listened breathlessly, to cheer mightily at the end. And some were so affected that they spoke in emotional and broken words of that superb violin—an instrument that was so sweet toned and so witching. They might have been talking about that wonderful violin yet had not the artist innocently mentioned that his own was in some inaccessible place in the baggage room and that he had borrowed for the occasion a cheap, broken and spavined instrument from one of the stewards.

According to a Berlin telegraphic correspondent of the Staats-Zeitung, the concert of Paderewski in Posen proved a great national demonstration, a part of the receipts being given to charity. The same telegraphic dispatch states that the concert which took place on December 12 in Bremen was a great artistic success, but that on account of the high prices the hall was not crowded.

Boston Music Notes.

HOTEL BELLEVUE,
17 BEACON STREET,
BOSTON, MASS., December 14, 1901.

MME. SARGENT-GOODELLE, several of whose pupils were heard last winter at recitals and concerts, has just received many compliments for the work of one of her pupils, Robert C. Adams, of Boston. Recently he sang at a musical festival in Augusta, Me. He was splendidly received, and the Augusta papers had the following flattering things to say of him: "The first solo was sung by Robert C. Adams, and at once claimed the attention of the audience and chorus. His voice, a rare baritone, together with a supersensitive musical temperament, made his interpretation of the two delightful songs by Gertrude Beane most enjoyable. The hearty applause accorded him was a flattering compliment to his ability."

Madame Goodelle came to Boston last winter and has so thoroughly established herself in this city that she is at her Huntington Chambers studio both Wednesday and Saturday. The recitals given by Madame Goodelle's pupils last spring in Haverhill were spoken of as unusually excellent in every respect.

On Tuesday evening the members and friends of the Waltham Musical Club had the pleasure of hearing for the first time Homer A. Norris' new work, "The Flight of the Eagle," a musical setting of selections from Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass." It was performed under the direction of the composer. The assisting artists were Miss Laura Van Kuren, soprano; Robert Hall, tenor; Archibald Ellis, baritone, and Miss Edith Currie, accompanist. The music is spoken of as being delightful. Many musicians from Boston attended the concert.

Mr. Norris has already received several offers from out of town societies to perform the work, two or more of them being from New York city.

During the season Mr. Wilder will give a series of pupils' recitals at his studio on the first and third Monday evenings of each month. The third one, on December 16, will be given Miss Caroline E. Leinbach, assisted by Miss Florence E. Garvin.

At the New England Conservatory of Music, on Wednesday evening, the recital was given by E. Mahr's Quartet Class. Edson W. Morphy, 1899, first violin; George P. Chatterley, second violin; Albert J. Stephens, Carl Faelten's recital in Steinert Hall, on Tuesday evening, was attended by a large and enthusiastic audience The program, which was given last week in these columns, was a rare musical treat. Mr. Faelten played in his usual charming style.

The prize of $600 for an original work for chorus and orchestra, offered last year by the New England Conservatory of Music, not having been awarded by the judges, is again offered for competition.

The prize will be awarded for the best work for mixed chorus, solos and orchestra, with English text, either sacred or secular in character, limited to four solo parts, the time of performance to be from thirty to sixty minutes The work may be in the form of a one act serious opera if the composer so chooses. The restriction to solo voices applies to principal parts, not to small parts which might be assigned to chorus singing. In case of opera, no objection is made to change of scene.

There are practically no limitations in regard to the size of the orchestra, except that it is not expected that any number of instruments unusual in symphonic orchestras will be used. A piano score and full orchestral score must accompany the work. The composer must furnish correct and complete orchestral parts if the conservatory arranges to give a public performance.

The competition is open to all composers, born or resident for five years in the United States. The judges will be George W. Chadwick, Prof. Horatio W. Parker and Frank Van der Stucken.

The establishing of "students' performances" on Monday evenings and Saturday afternoons at the Bijou has proved very popular.

The Dorchester Choral Society will give its fifth concert on December 17, in Whiton Hall, Dorchester Woman's Clubhouse.

William H. O'Brien, of East Boston, is to be the soloist at the municipal concert in the new Dorchester High School December 19.

The mid-winter concert of "The Singers," of Newton Centre, will be held at Bray Hall on December 19. The program will include Max Bruch's "Flight of the Holy Family." a portion of Gounod's "Missa Solemnis," and a Christmastide motet, composed by the conductor of the club, George A. Burdett.

Kubelik is to give his Boston audience on Wednesday afternoon, January 1, a program exclusively devoted to the compositions of Paganini. No violinist of the present century has attempted such a task as Kubelik has set himself in this announcement, and Boston is the first American city to hear Kubelik in such a program.

A morning with Italian composers was given Friday morning before the Chromatic Club. The program included selections from Vannuccini, Verdi, Viotti, Mattei, Tosti, Rossini and Scarlatti. The vocal numbers were given by Miss Dietrick and Miss Castle, both of whom recentiy have studied with Vannuccini in Florence. In a concerto by Viotti Dr. J. A. Jeffrey took the piano part, and the violinist was Miss Velevny, a young Russian girl in her teens. An impromptu contribution to the program was that of Mrs. Edith Noyes Porter, violinist, who, by invitation of the president of the club, Mrs. Richard Hamlen Jones, who presided, played her own compositions, "European Sketches." The Chromatic Club. which numbers about sixty members, with several honorary members, is now in its fifteenth season of musical work. At other meetings this season there will be a Polish-Bohemian morning. one of British music, a German day, a Scandinavian morning and one for compositions by American writers, as well as a French morning. The series will close, after a morning devoted to Russian composers, with a meeting given over to the works of Liszt and Wagner.

A recital of church choral music, sung à capella by fifty voices from the Boston Singing Club, under the direction of H. G. Tucker, was given on Thursday evening, at the home of Josiah Bradlee, on Marlboro street, in the course of which three new compositions of Mr. Bradlee's were sung.

RESIGNATION OF M. GUILMANT.

RESPECTING the resignation by M. Guilmant of his position as organist at La Trinité, we glean the following from the Paris papers:

"This event will not astonish those who know how strained for many years have been the relations between the curé of the parish and the organist. The strain went on till a rupture took place. We will not enter into detail of all the proceedings of the curé of La Trinité; we mention only that for the maintenance and repairs of the Cavaillé-Coll organ he made arrangements absolutely contrary to the desires of M. Guilmant, who was not even consulted. Quite recently this singular clergyman has shown such a want of regard and such a forgetfulness of the most elementary convenances that M. Guilmant, to protect his self respect, did not hesitate to send in his resignation.

"While we regret that his premature resignation deprives the congregation of La Trinité of one of their great enjoyments, we cannot but approve the determination of the eminent professor of the Conservatory. Let us hope that he will give the public compensation by resuming his series of organ concerts at the Trocadero, and by opening occasionally to his friends the door of the temple of music which he has erected at his residence at Meudon.

"M. Ch. Quef, who for more than two years has been choir organist, has been called to succeed M. Guilmant. We congratulate him sincerely. M. Ch. Quef will be succeeded at the choir organ by M. André Coedes-Mongin, hitherto organist of Saint Leu."

JEANNETTE DURNO.—The Daily Northwestern, of Oshkosh, Wis., printed the ensuing appreciative estimate of Jeannette Durno's recital, given there recently:

The young ladies of the Congregational Church builded perhaps better than they knew when they selected Miss Jeannette Durno and her piano as one of the numbers on their lecture course. It was not alone because the piano recital last evening gave real pleasure to music lovers, but because it showed the possibilities of this kind of entertainment to an audience nine-tenths of whom would have stayed at home under the ordinary conditions of an advertised concert, but who, being present, were moved to a reasonable degree of enthusiasm by the excellent playing of this highly endowed young woman, and who may be moved thereby to help to remove the stigma that has rested over Oshkosh as being a "dead town" for professional musicians. Miss Durno is an attractive young woman, musical to her finger-tips, and with an abundant technic. It is interesting to know how a great teacher will impress his methods and style upon his pupils. No one who is familiar with the mannerisms of Leschetizky, the greatest of piano teachers, could fail to see that here was one of his pupils, and a good one, too.

A RETIRED vocalist, soprano, wishes to dispose of her library, consisting of fifty piano scores of the best known operas, operettas, oratorios and song books; the whole will be sold at a very reasonable price. Address "L.," care of THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, December 16, 1901.

MARIE CROSS-NEWHAUS bade a hundred guests to her suite of studios on Sunday night, and none neglected coming. Madame Newhaus presented the following artists: Mrs. Zillah Pratt, Miss Beatrice Fine, Miss Jeanne Arone, Miss Bessie Bonsall, Miss Ida Simmons, Oley Speaks, Robert Hosea, Frederick Hoffmann, with Miss Henriette Weber, Miss Emilie Illsley and F. W. Riesberg at the piano.

All these singers are either artists of present high standing, or of coming importance. Their French diction they have gained from Madame Newhaus, an authority, and the general elegance and finish of style come from her. This was the program:

Zigeunerweisen .....Sarasate
Mr. Hoffmann.
Absent .....Medcalf
Aus Meinen Grossen Schmerzen.....Franz
Soupir .....Bemberg
Mrs. Pratt.
Fantaisie, F minor.....Chopin
Miss Simmons.

Mr. Hosea.

La Bohême.....Puccini
Miss Fine.

In Maytime.....Oley Speaks
Mr. Speaks.
Humoresque .....Dvorák
Des Ailles.....Godard
Miss Simmons.
Elégie (violin obligato).....Massenet
Miss Bonsall and Mr. Hoffmann.

The audience listened with appreciation, and Madame Newhaus received many compliments on her studio musicale. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. W. D. Ellis, Mr. and Mrs. Gage Tarbell, Mr. and Mrs. Olin D Gray, Mrs. Alexander Striker, Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Murphy, Dr. and Mrs. Jamison, Miss A. L. Amendt, Mr. and Mrs. Mitchell, Mr. and Mrs. Henri Gargan, Mr. and Mrs Sylvester Blood, J. H. Beggs, Mr. Trisidder and many others.

The Rescue Society furnished an audience, which for total lack of sympathy reminded one of a gathering of a religious sect, utterly unused to a musical performance; this at the Astoria Gallery one afternoon last week. These people sat there utterly subdued, either by their surroundings or their ignorance of music. It made it hard for the performers, who gave the following program:

Violin soli—
Andante Religioso.....Thome
Mazourka .....Wieniawski
Claude Treviyn.
Soprano solo, Thou Brilliant Bird.....David
Miss Zelda Platt.
Piano soli—
To the Spring.....Grieg
Shadow Dance.....MacDowell
Miss Ysabel Kearsing.
Contralto soli—
Beneath the Stars.....Russell
No One Saw at All.....Loewe
Miss Dorothy Taylor.
Violin solo, Polonaise de Concert.....Wieniawski
Mr. Trevlyn.
Soprano solo, Waltz, from Romeo and Julictte.....Gounod
Miss Platt.
Piano solo, Ballade in A flat.....Chopin
Miss Kearsing.
Contralto song, Love Stanzas.....Flegier
Miss Taylor.
Violin obligato by Mr. Trevlyn.
Miss Bertha DePew, accompanist.

The participants were all from the Metropolitan School of Musical Art, Louis Arthur Russell, director, and some excellent music, well performed, comprised the afternoon's doings. Trevlyn plays with understanding and intelligence, though lacking in warmth of temperament. Miss Platt sang the David "Thou Brilliant Bird" transposed down to F with flexible voice and good taste, and Miss Kearsing, pianist, played Grieg's "To Spring" especially well. Miss Dorothy Taylor has a beautiful voice, sings with superior musical taste and warmth of expression, and did Smith's "The Quest" with real artistic fervor. She ought to beware of the constant tremolo, however. Apart from this, her singing was well nigh perfect, her low A and enunciation admirable in every respect.

Eleanor Page Spencer, a child pianist of Chicago, a pupil of Mrs. Cheney, was the beneficiary of a well arranged recital which occurred at the home of Frank S. Hastings last week, other participants being Francis Rogers and Dr. Gerrit Smith, with Mrs. C. B. Foote at the piano. The twelve-year-old girl, who is a normal, happy faced child, plays well. The snap and style of her playing of a Prelude (in B flat, from the Clavichord) by Bach, and the understanding and musical interpretation of a Scarlatti Sonate were equally astonishing. Later she played some Chopin numbers, finishing with a group of modern composers, these numbers: "Valse Lento," Schütt; "Serenata," Mason; "Pas des Amphores," Chaminade; "Wanderer" and "Butterflies," Grieg; and "Spinning Song," Mendelssohn.

This girl should be heard of in the future, given health and continued study; talent, taste and technic she has already, and right there so many prodigies stop.

Mr. Rogers lent agreeable variety to the afternoon by his refined singing, Sidney Homer's beautiful song, "Thy Voice Is Heard," suiting him well. This is a song worth the doing, dramatic, modern music, full of ardor, seemingly spontaneous throughout. If Homer continues, he will rank with the best of American composers, as his wife, the dramatic soprano, Louise Homer, is already among the leading sopranos.

Dr. Gerrit Smith played the Bach Toccata and Fugue in D minor on the surprisingly full-voiced organ with effect and brilliance, and the beautiful house was well filled with interested listeners.

One of the most delightful events in the musical world was Edwin Lockhart's reception on Wednesday, from 4 to 11 o'clock, at his studio. Mr. Lockhart numbers among his friends many prominent people, musically, artistically and socially, is an ideal host and has the faculty of gathering about him a brilliant assemblage. He was assisted in receiving by Mrs. Crossmond, Miss Crossmond, Miss Shepard, Mrs. Charles Stone, Mrs. McInnerney, Mrs. I. Taylor, Miss Cole, Mrs. V. Leonard, Mrs. Meyer, Mrs. Bringolf, Mrs. E. Buckout, Mrs. F. Hanford. Many artists contributed to the enjoyment of the occasion. Among others, Mrs. Jennie Hall, Madame Buckout, Leigh Pepi, the boy contralto; Miss Topping, the new Canadian pianist; Mrs. Jessie McC. McInnerney in her cantillations, and William De Nike, 'cello. Mr. Lockhart himself sang a number of songs in his usual brilliant manner, and while listening one could not wonder at his success as a soloist both here and abroad. His friends find cause for congratulation in his decision to remain in America instead of entering the field of grand opera in Paris, where flattering offers were made him. His decided preference for teaching and unusual talent may account for his marked success in that capacity, while his late excellent contributions to magazines are bringing him national prominence. Altogether this young Californian has earned for himself an enviable position in musical circles in New York city. Since his engagement as bass soloist at Holy Trinity Church his voice has been an attractive feature of the service.

The Gounod Choral Society, Emilio Agramonte director, gave Anderton's "Wreck of the Hesperus" at Grace M. E. Church Friday night, with Effie Stewart, soprano; Mrs. Pearl Benham-Kaighn, alto; George W. Jenkins, tenor, and Julian Walker, bass; also Saint-Saëns' "Christmas Oratorio." The works were well done, the soloists all of artistic stature. A new singer is Mrs. Kaighn, the contralto, who sings in good style, reliable and sympathetic.

Kate Stella Burr, the regular organist of the church, played the accompaniments.

Mrs. Babcock and Mrs. Ingersoll were at home at their Carnegie Hall studios Saturday afternoon. A throng of people listened to Miss Demorest, alto (Scotch songs in costume); Mrs. Elizabeth Leonard, Miss Clara Weinstein, soprano; W. N. Searles, Jr., bass; Percy Hemus, baritone; Samuel Siegel, mandolin, and Master M. Shapiro, violin, with Miss Burr and Messrs. Briggs and Warner accompanists. A large social contingent was present and some of the participants found engagements at once.

Abbie Clarkson Totten, the soprano, gave a concert at Y. W. C. A. Hall, 72 West 124th street, last week, assisted by Misses Florence Mackwood, reader; Sara De Fenton, Alice Saxby Hall; Conrad Wirtz, piano soloist, and Dr. F. Nice, violin.

Mrs. Totten has a light but carrying quality of soprano voice, and sings brilliantly. Mr. Wirtz played a Bolero by Chopin, the same composer's Berceuse, and an Impromptu by Poldoni. Wirtz plays with musicianly interpretation and brilliantly as well, and the concert giver made a success of her affair, as she always does.

Estelle Blumenfeld is a young soprano of decided merit, combining full and sweet voice with charming presence, every inch a lady. She is available for church and concert, and some church will find in her an excellent soprano.

Anne Wright Comstock is another young singer, a contralto, of most promising voice, who recently sang for a gathering of musical folk some sacred music. "Eye Hath Not Seen" was sung with tasteful expression, and Allitsen's "Like as the Heart Desireth" she did well indeed. As she has experience, and is ambitious and seems intelligent, she should have a future, for she certainly has the first essential—voice.

Edward Bromberg has been solo baritone of the West End Synagogue four years past; also sang at Yonkers for several years, coming to Calvary M. E. Church in the spring, and graduating from there to the Brick Presbyterian Church, where, under S. Archer Gibson, he finds the work most congenial. He is singing in concerts, teaching, &c., and has well won the high position he has attained in comparatively short time. Allied to a voice of carrying power and nice quality, Bromberg has gentlemanly appearance and modest demeanor to his credit, and all these things count in the hustle of New York musical life.

J. Warren Andrews announces a series of five organ recitals by students at the Church of the Divine Paternity, Seventy-sixth street and Eighth avenue, on alternating Thursdays, December 19, January 2 and 16, February 6 and 20, at 4 o'clock. December 19 Alfred Willard, organist of St. Mary's P. E. Church, of Burlington, N. J., gives the recital, assisted by Miss Cornelia Marvin, the alto of the church.

Francis Rogers.

FRANCIS ROGERS, the baritone, on December 4, gave a song recital in Boston at Steinert Hall, and on December 10 repeated the program in New York at Mendelssohn Hall. A notice of the New York concert, with program, is to be found in another column. We append here some of the many favorable press notices of his work:

Mr. Rogers has been heard here before, but never to the same advantage that he appeared yesterday. He was in splendid voice and showed such charming sympathy with each number that even the well-known and slightly worn songs sounded fresh because of his earnest and thoughtful interpretation.—New York Sun.

His work always shows evidences of careful study of the content as well as the musical phraseology of each song. He treats both words and music with deference, and he enunciates so that the text is intelligible to the listener. * * * He sang the Brahms song, whose subtle essence is so easily missed, with much finish.—New York Times.

Mr. Rogers sings as one who loves his art.—New York Evening Post.

His enunciation and vocalization are good, and he succeeds in "getting into" his song as few singers of his experience do.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

Sophisticated observers will best appreciate the fact that the more professional element in this audience stayed from the opening to the closing numbers. Professional courtesy alone would hardly explain that.—New York Evening Sun.

Mr. Rogers has a very resonant and freely emitted baritone, and careful schooling enables him to keep his beautiful voice well under control. He sings with understanding and taste.—New York Staats-Zeitung.

His voice is placed well forward, his diction is clear and his interpretations always artistic.—New York Evening Telegram.

That he was the possessor of a high baritone voice of fine quality, also of good taste, intelligence, dignified purpose and sincere feeling, his recital two years ago demonstrated. All these admirable qualities were again brought to notice on Tuesday, and also the gratifying proofs that some technical slag which then adhered to the fine metal of his art had been put aside. He reads his texts painstakingly and intelligently in all languages, and his enunciation is delightful.—New York Tribune.

Mr. Rogers has a smooth and sympathetic voice, a clear enunciation, an understanding of the purport of what he is singing, and his presentation of a list of German, English and Italian songs was perfect enough to justify the constant applause of the large audience. In these days, when foreign vocalists enter the American concert field with all the prestige of European reputation, it is a pleasure to find an American artist who can vie with them in almost every school of vocal art. Mr. Rogers' program was sufficient to prove a versatility far above the average, and not only his enunciation, but his comprehension of the spirit of the different schools of composition, made his recital delightful in every number.—Boston Advertiser.

Mr. Rogers grows in the right way. He has made a notable advance in his art.—Boston Herald.

His selections, without exception, were given with fine effect, both vocally and artistically.—Boston Post.

Mr. Rogers sang December 16 at Mr. Bagby's concert at the Waldorf. Ternina and Gérardy were the other soloists. He makes his first appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra at Trenton, N. J., December 31.

Jasper Dean McFall.

JASPER DEAN McFALL, whose picture appears in this column, is one of the busiest vocal teachers in Washington. He is one of the few teachers who devotes himself to the development of the voice in all its essential points.

A day recently spent in his studio proved most instructive and enjoyable. Here were pupils in all stages of development, from the beginner to the advanced singer. When the pupil first enters the studio Mr. McFall takes note of the deficiencies in his tone production. The art of pure vocalization is so rare now that he finds much to correct. The lesson of each pupil in turn is devoted to the correction of the most prominent defect in that particular voice. Mr. McFall is quick to detect a flaw and as quickly finds a remedy for the same. He has a distinct aim in view according to individual needs, hence his pupils all possess individuality.

Many of Mr. McFall's pupils come from different States in the Union, and in addition to these he has a large Washington contingent. A number of these are engaged in church work, and some are successful concert singers, of whom THE MUSICAL COURIER will hear more in the future.

Last, but not least, Mr. McFall is himself one of the most popular singers in Washington. He has a superb baritone voice, which he handles with consummate skill and artistic ease.

Don't Distribute Free Samples Too Often.

A courteous young man called here to represent the Euterpe Musical Society. The object of his visit was to politely disagree, on behalf of his own society at least, with insinuations made in this column to the effect that musical clubs, which made it a practice to invite professionals to perform gratuitously at their concerts, were largely responsible for the bad business conditions prevailing in the Washington concert field.

He pointed out many advantages to the professional artist of singing or playing before a "Euterpe Musical" audience. One was its value as an advertisement. An artist performing here would be surrounded by amateur talent, and would thus appear in a most favorable setting. Another advantage was to be found in the fact that the members of the Euterpe Musical Club always try to assist artists who appear on their programs, either by helping the sale of tickets for the artist's concert or by some similar act of thoughtfulness and consideration.

Being personally acquainted with several members of this club, I have no doubt that they do what they can in this direction, but, aside from personal and individual considerations, the aspect of the question remains unchanged. To you in New York the situation will appear a novel and unusual one.

It is a fact that there are nearly as many musical clubs here which invite professionals to "help us out just this once," as there are days in the week. These clubs are composed of people who are perfectly able to buy their concert tickets. I know certain faces that are to be seen always at these free concerts, and that never are seen at paid concerts. The argument is patent enough, as it is only a statement of facts, and I am positive that this is the principal cause of the large losses sustained in Washington by the majority of concert givers of highest rank. Perhaps the fault is to be laid at the door of the musicians, instead of the clubs. At least it may be said that clubs which make some return, even if not a financial one, may be the less blameworthy. However, if musicians were bound by common consent not to perform gratuitously except for charity, it can readily be seen that the musical public which already exists would be obliged to satisfy its craving for good music by buying tickets.

If there are plenty of artists to be had without remuneration, I suppose it is all right for clubs to exist for the purpose of inviting them. The poor, foolish musician again! Then there is no particular use in taking up the cudgels for indifferent people. Two or three musicians have expressed their approval of the attitude of this paper on this subject, and there it has ended. So the matter had better be dropped. There are many estimable people in these clubs, and they are doing much good. The Euterpe Musical Club has engaged Mr. Heimendahl, of the famous Peabody Institute, Baltimore. He will direct future concerts and will "edit" the future programs. I don't see why offense should be given to these good people as long as no good will come of it, and so for the time being instead of considering what were best to be done to aid the struggling artist, it were well to devote ourselves to a study of what will be of greatest assistance to the poor, struggling musical clubs.

Should the members of a successful string quartet be over fifty years of age? This question occurred to me while listening to "The Ladies' String Quartet," a new organization, composed of four clever, energetic young women, who all appear to be under the age of eighteen. The concert took place last Tuesday at the Washington Club, and the way they livened up staid old Mozart with their fresh, buoyant enthusiasm was a thing not easily forgotten. If Mr. Meagles had been there we should doubtless have heard his kind voice ringing out: "Count four and twenty, Tattycoram." But he wasn't, and so the impetuous young things delighted us with their rashness and freshness, even if they weren't quite able to settle down into the stolidity of old age. The quartet performed three good string pieces of Ernest Lent's, in which form of composition Mr. Lent seems to be successful. Mr. Duffy sang acceptably. Miss Mason accompanied.

The Rakemann String Quartet established a reputation for itself last year. There is no doubt this reputation was well deserved. Mr. Rakemann presented some good novelties last year and he otherwise conducted himself in an approved manner, at least on several occasions. It will, therefore, be somewhat of a shock to the sensibilities of the dear people who think it is the critic's duty to say only pleasant things, when it is here set forth that the first concert of that organization last Wednesday acted upon the nerves of your correspondent much in the same way that a nutmeg grater acts upon the rind of the fragrant lemon.

The blame for this is not to be put upon the three able gentlemen who assist Herman Rakemann in making up his string quartet. They did as well as they could under the circumstances. Now if this string quartet were a theatre orchestra, the concert might have been acceptable. Mr. Rakemann plays in orchestras to a considerable extent. He is considered by directors a good leader of the strings, because he presses down his bow as hard as he can and plays in a determined manner to lead along the stragglers. The first year I was here he used to play ahead of time in his string quartet so as to make the others play in time. And who were these others? Why, they were our excellent 'cellist Ernest Lent and two other good players. Mr. Rakemann makes a mistake when he tries to pull such men up to time. He mistakes the occasion and the place. It is all right in a theatre orchestra, perhaps, when there has been no time to rehearse; but the idea of disturbing the soothing and restful character of chamber music in this fashion is nothing less than barbarous. I do not find myself able to narrate much else which occurred at the concert because of the jarring of my nerves occasioned by the sight of Mr. Rakemann sitting alone and facing his three colleagues, who were drawn up opposite him like a class at school in the last piece, a piano quintet by Max Lewandowsky. The first theme, as Mr. Rakemann played it, was "Saw-Saw-Saw-Saw. You've got to get this right; do you hear?" The second theme varied slightly from the first. It was "Saw-Saw-Saw-Saw. Here, there, Mr. Villalpando, come in with that 'cello part." And the next subject was "Saw, scrape, saw, scrape. Mr. Finckel and Mr. Welti, I will move my head back and forward with a jerk so as to beat time for you. I know you can't do it for yourselves."

Fortunately I was saved from complete prostration by the excellent piano work of Miss Alice E. Burbage, formerly a correspondent of your paper. She played her part at short notice, substituting for S. Monroe Fabian, and she played it well. Mrs. W. L. Wilson, the vocalist of the occasion, has a beautiful voice, but is unfortunate in her manner of using it. She was enthusiastically applauded, and responded with an encore. E. F. Droop accompanied her in good style. A King quartet was played; also compositions by Edward Bergenholtz.

Mrs. Florence Hill Hormess and Miss Burbage are planning an out of town recital.

Henry Xander will present one of his excellent programs at the Saengerbund on Sunday. The concert is too late for insertion in this issue.

Anton Kaspar, the violinist, has been heard here in a recent musicale. He is now booking engagements for the remainder of the season. Mrs. Kaspar returns from Europe this month.

Lecturer Tomlins was in town Friday.

WASHINGTON, December 14, 1901.

Whenever a public Saengerbund concert is given I ask myself the question: "How does Henry Xander manage to secure always the best talent, and only the best, for his concerts?" I have asked him this question in vain. Perhaps the reason of his silence is that the secret if given away would become common property. Artists come here from Europe, New York or Chicago and play at a Saengerbund concert, and they always play well. Other artists come to other concerts and their playing is good, indifferent or poor, as the case may be. The answer is probably to be found in the fact that Mr. Xander is a good business man, in addition to his other qualifications. He knows how.

The concert on Sunday night was successful from every standpoint. The "scratch orchestra" played almost as well under Mr. Xander's leadership as if it had been a permanent affair. The chorus singing showed the results of careful training, the compositions were well received, Mr. Xander's "Jubelklänge" (given here for the second time), words by Frank Claudy, being well received. Estelle Liebling sang her songs in a voice which charmed by its sweetness and delicacy, and Max Bendix acquitted himself creditably. It was another wholly successful concert to be added to the long list of Saengerbund triumphs. The principal numbers on the program in addition to Mr. Xander's composition were part of the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto, the "Indian Bell Song," Sarasate's arrangement of the Chopin Nocturne, op. 27, No. 2, and Johann Strauss' "Wein, Weib und Gesang," with words by J. Weyl, for chorus and orchestra.

The rush of material at this season makes it impossible for me to describe the other concerts of the week at this time.

BERENICE THOMPSON.

WILLIAM BAUER.

THE Leonora Jackson company, after three weeks of success in the New England States, from Hartford, Conn., to Augusta, Me., are now on their way West, en route to the South and Pacific Coast. Miss Jackson's supporting artists prove prime favorites and are winning their share of the laurels. The Portland (Me.) Express spoke as follows of Mr. Bauer: "William Bauer, the pianist, immediately established himself as one of the foremost concert pianists of the day. He was enthusiastically recalled."

GREGORY HAST.—Gregory Hast has been successful in arranging a postponement of his European bookings, that he may accept some very important engagements just after the holidays on this side of the water. He will be obliged to sail January 25, however, in order to reach England in time to commence a tour beginning the first week in February.

Mr. Hast's rare art and delightful voice have been accorded cordial appreciation by press and public, and the widespread demand for his appearances has caused him to defer his return to Europe, the more because his engagements on the other side extend through March, 1903, and will prevent his return to America next season.

Aside from his other engagements, arrangements for Boston recitals are nearly completed for Mr. Hast, and he will probably give another in New York before sailing.

FREDERIC MARINER.

TO learn of the continued success of Frederic Mariner in his new venture as director of the Bangor Piano School gives pleasure to pupils, friends and musically interested people.

Mr. Mariner, during the last ten years in New York city, did much for the cause of music that brought his name and fame to extend into nearly every State in the country, and now that he has chosen to return to his native State, occasional notices of his continued advancement and devotion to the art of teaching pupils how to play are sure to be read with interest.

The Bangor Daily News of December 13, 1901, speaks in highest praise as follows of the Thursday afternoon recitals, originally started by Mr. Mariner in New York and being continued in Bangor:

The largest audience of the season attended the regular weekly recital of the pupils of the Bangor Piano School on Thursday afternoon. The concert began promptly at 4:45 o'clock, and nearly an hour before this time every seat in the suite of rooms occupied by the school on the seventh floor of the Morse-Oliver Building was taken, while the corridors and stairways were blocked with people unable to gain admittance. It was one of the largest audiences, in fact, which has ever attended an amateur musicale in this city.

The program was as follows:

Kermesse ..... Gounod-Saint-Saëns
Arthur Beaupre.
Clochette du Convent ..... Ludovic
Agnes Additon.
Courante ..... Bach-MacDowell
Miss Frances Weston.
Caprice ..... Virgil
Dorrice Robinson.
Little Story ..... Virgil
Etude ..... Virgil
Estelle Beaupre.
Valse Caprice ..... Bosc
Minette Chick.
Andante ..... Beethoven
Bernice Brann.
Waltz ..... Liebbrand
Scherzino ..... Schumann
Arthur Beaupre.
Romance ..... Wagner-Liszt
Miss Lura Swett.
Courage ..... Virgil
Carl Maxfield.
Souvenir Waltz ..... Ducelle
Earl Anderson.
Minuet ..... Bach-MacDowell
Miss Grace Tupper.
Southern Lament ..... Arron
Sidney Jones.
Waltz ..... Chopin
Arthur Beaupre.

Miss Frances Weston, whose ability as a singer is well known, was heard to advantage in the "Courante" number, by MacDowell, proving herself to be a pianist of more than ordinary ability. The Chopin waltz by Arthur Beaupre, a piece played by the young musician several times during the past few weeks, was given in a manner which left very little to be desired.

To attempt any criticism of the others would be unfair, since to mention the many interesting features would be to reprint the name of everybody on the program, and to pick out the best but a matter of opinion.

A New Year's reception will be held on the evening of January 1, 1902, and all interested in the cause of music are cordially invited to attend.

MRS. MORRILL'S MONTHLY MUSICALE.—This occurred last Thursday evening at the Chelsea, when a goodly company listened to the singing of some of the Morrill pupils, among them Mrs. St. John Duvall, of Richmond, Va.; Mrs. William Innis, of Yonkers; Miss MacGregor, Mrs. E. E. Hand, of Brooklyn; Mrs. Morrill also favoring the listeners with some classics. Intelligence, breath control, thorough understanding of the spirit of music, and clean enunciation characterize the singing of those who have the right hold on the Morrill method. Mrs. M. Beardsley, of Brooklyn, played some tasteful piano solos, among other things the Schumann "Aveu" from the "Carnival" and the "Czardas," by Joseffy. Her playing was much enjoyed by all. Those privileged to attend the Morrill musicales may always count on hearing none but good music, well performed.

PADEREWSKI IN HAMBURG.

PADEREWSKI'S CONCERT ON FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1901.

"AS unfortunately the widely felt wish to hear Paderewski's significant piano playing once more in one of our important concerts had to remain unfulfilled in consideration of the exorbitant external demands which were made, the artist, in response to the repeated invitations extended him, decided to undertake an evening recital. Hamburg sees within her walls all prominent personalities, and so even a Paderewski may not hold aloof. Since October 25 and November 1, 1889, and the memorable evenings on which Paderewski appeared with the Philharmonic and the Zajic Quartet, respectively, so long a time has elapsed that we were justified in looking forward with the keenest anticipation to the reappearance of the brilliantly gifted artist, who is now in his forty-second year.

"The program of the concert began with the playing of Bach, habitual with virtuosi. But it was not the transcription of an organ piece, but the piano work, Chromatic Fantaisie and Fugue, which formed the opening number. Then appeared Beethoven (Sonata, in C minor, op. 111, 1822); Schumann's Sonata in F sharp minor (op. 11, 1833-5); Chopin's Ballade in F minor, two Studies, Nocturne in G, Waltz in A flat major (op. 42), Waltz (op. 64, No. 2). Polonaises in C sharp minor and A flat major, a Nocturne by the concert giver, and various pieces by Liszt (two rhapsodies, &c.).

"Paderewski is one of the most distinctive phenomena on the horizon of interpretative art. An eminent virtuoso! In the conception of an art work completely subjective, in reproduction instinct with genius. Highly interesting was everything that Paderewski did, even to his playing of Bach and Beethoven, in which the temperament, the unbridled passion, the juxtaposition of contrasts without gradation were conspicuous. The mighty Sonata of Schumann afforded an artistic treat in its performance, which remained an inimitable effort of genius. Obviously Schumann's romanticism finds a ready response in Paderewski's sensibilities. Everybody was wound to enthusiasm by his playing of Chopin, which was glorious, especially in cantabile passages. Though even here one cannot always unreservedly indorse his conceptions, one must yet admit that the way in which the G major Nocturne, the C sharp Waltz, the G flat major Study were represented offered many new, hitherto unfamiliar points of view. Chopin himself allowed many variations in the performance of his creations. When Alfred Jaell and others—and Rubinstein not the least of them—exhibited peculiarities in their phrasing of Chopin, the world was highly incensed. Since those performances people think differently, and will not seriously take it amiss in one who has a special gift for the interpretation of Chopin if he follows the bent of his own conception in this case, when the genius of the creator conditions the genius of the interpreter. After the respectable Nocturne in B flat major of his own composition the floodgates of titanic virtuosity were opened once more, and still more notably than before in the performance of the Liszt pieces. Paderewski's octaves, his glissando, his bravoura are phenomenal. A Rosenthal, and whatever the names of them all may be, must lay down their arms here on the field of virtuosity before Paderewski. One is less sensible in the case of Paderewski than with others, and especially in a large, well filled hall, of the forcing of the tone, which, however, occasionally asserted itself in a double fortissimo. As regards plasticity of expression, the highest achievement yesterday was in the Sonata of Schumann; as regards perfection of technic the highest point was reached in Chopin's A flat major Polonaise, and the two rhapsodies (No. 10 and No. 6) of Liszt. The enthusiasm evoked by all the performance reached the highest point."—Hamburger Fremdenblatt, November 3, 1901.

PADEREWSKI'S CONCERT.

"The Hamburgers—the Hamburgers who are denounced as cold-blooded—were yesterday, for once in a way, quite beside themselves. In the "Konventgarten" there was an enthusiasm such as I have not experienced since the days of Rubinstein. People yelled, cheered, hurrahed and raved. And what artist was it that had brought about this thing? Ignaz Paderewski, beyond question the first, the greatest pianist of the day. All the others, whatever their names may be, even the biggest of them, sink into insignificance by the side of Paderewski, for after all they lack the genius which he, and he alone, possesses. A little of the demon, a little of the poet, dwell side by side in the artist nature of Paderewski. Hence he never degenerates into brutality even in the display of the most elemental strength, and never into sentimentality in the most ethereal pianissimo passage. The chief magic of Paderewski's playing probably resides in his touch, which is capable of a quite uncanny gamut of modifications. Paderewski belongs to the very elect of those who can extract tone from the root, the keyboard. Paderewski sings on the piano better than many a diva in her throat, and there, at the outset, he differs mightily from the latter day virtuosi who in cantilenas almost always squeeze out and jerk out the tone. Well, is Paderewski, then, no virtuoso? Certainly not in the ordinary sense of the word, for even when Paderewski is playing Liszt and Rubinstein the splendidly subtle artist in him dominates the mere virtuoso. That even genius can sometimes go astray I saw once again in Paderewski's reading of Beethoven's C minor Sonata, op. 111. In spite of considerable lack of clearness, due to abnormal use of pedals, in spite of much hurrying in the second movement, yet a mighty note of true greatness sounded through the performance. Schumann's phantastic, but in its phantasy too unrestrained, Sonata, Paderewski played also with audacity of purpose, brilliantly and like a true musician. But Paderewski did not find himself quite in his element till he interpreted his fellow-countryman, Chopin. I have never heard Chopin played like that—it was truly poetry in sound.

"The brilliant A flat major Polonaise formed—with the Nocturne by himself as connecting link—the transition to Liszt. Paderewski, the finely gifted composer, with two great modesty chose only this one piece of his own, which I regreted the more as it is not one of the most valuable.

"With Liszt Paderewski could give free rein to his fervidly glowing temperament. Here he displayed absolutely bewildering powers, with which he literally fascinated and hypnotized the public. The loud cheers after the pieces of Chopin were absolutely nothing compared to the almost terrifying ways in which enthusiasm manifested itself after the rhapsodies. Again and yet again had Paderewski to appear and again and again were the demonstrations renewed, since the amiable artist, whose mental elasticity is no less remarkable than his physical stamina, by each additional piece only stimulated the desire for yet another and finally also granted it. Another rhapsody of Liszt (in B flat major), a Song Without Words of Mendelssohn and Rubinstein's Waltz in E flat major, all of which he also played in a masterly way."—General-Anzeiger für Hamburg-Altona, November 3, 1901.

"Bonn.—The fifth chamber music festival of the Verein Beethovenhaus in Bonn began on May 12 in the presence of a very crowded audience. Paderewski appeared and proved the groundlessness of many fears which had been expressed concerning him. He was rapturously applauded after the great B flat Trio of Beethoven, with Joachim and Hausmann. The remaining items consisted of Haydn's E flat major Quartet, gracefully played by Frau Soldat and her colleagues, and of Beethoven's F minor Quartet, in which the Joachim Quartet covered itself with laurels. The opening number was Mozart's Serenade, for wind instruments, in B flat major, which, thanks to its admirable performance by the Meiningen artists, had almost the effect of a revelation."—Dresdener Anzeiger, May 15, 1901.

The Guilmant Organ School.

THE fall term of the Guilmant Organ School concludes this week and a students' recital will be given in the Old First Presbyterian Church. The school has been most successful, and the work accomplished reflects the highest credit upon Mr. Carl.

The enrollment of students has been large and several have recently given recitals, among whom are Harry E. Woodstock, in a series of four in St. Paul's Church, New Haven, and Hyde Demaray at the New York University. Mrs. Gertrude E. McKellar has been appointed organist and choir director at the Congregational Church, Woodhaven, N. Y., and Merrill M. Hutchinson at the Riverdale Presbyterian Church, Riverdale, N. Y. The organ school is under the personal direction of Mr. Carl and harmony, counterpoint, analysis, &c., are taught by A. J. Goodrich, formerly of Chicago. The winter term will begin January 7, after Mr. Carl's return from Lakewood, where he will spend the holiday vacation.

MISS SIDNEY COLESTOCK.—Miss Sidney Colestock, of Altoona, Pa., has been in New York during the past few days, making arrangements for her concert course in Altoona. The first concert of the series took place November 27, with a piano recital by Arthur Hochman. On January 9 Wm. Worth Bailey, the blind violinist, and his company, will be the attraction. On February 20 Miss Electa Gifford will give a recital.

The set of Five New Songs, op. 33, by Frank Lynes, will prove to be of interest to a large singing public. No. 1, "If All the Dreams," is a pretty and melodious musical setting to a dainty little poem; well adapted for use as an encore song. No. 2, "Thy Picture," is a dainty little love song, quite original in its modulations; equally useful for concert and teaching. No. 3, "Tell Her," a song light and vivacious in character. No. 4, "A Bedtime Song," is a gentle, crooning little lullaby, melodious and making no technical demands on either the singer or accompanist. No. 5, "Dreams," is a tender love song. Mr. Lynes has given a harmonious musical setting to words by Dorothy King. The transposition of the melody to the minor mode for the middle section, where the poem strikes a more melancholy note, is an expressive touch. The piano accompaniments to all are easy.

Rogers' Song Recital.

FRANCIS ROGERS, one of the well-known local baritones, gave a song recital in Mendelssohn Hall last Tuesday (December 10) afternoon. His list of songs included Dvorák's cycle of Gypsy melodies, which are rarely heard in New York. Mr. Rogers delighted a large, and what may be accurately described as a fashionable, audience in this long program:

Tutta rea la Vita umana.....Händel
Where'er You Walk.....Händel
Serenade (Don Giovanni).....Mozart
Bois Epais.....Lully
Barcarola (La Gioconda).....Ponchielli
Wie Melodien zieht es mir.....Brahms
Aufenthalt.....Schubert
Wenn ich in deine Augen seh.....Schumann
Es hat die Rose sich beklagt.....Franz
Mädchen mit dem rothen Mündchen.....Franz
Gestillte Sehnsucht.....Ries
Die blauen Frühlingsaugen.....Ries
Zigeunermelodien, op. 55.....Dvorák
Clair de lune.....Saint-Saëns
Mirage.....Liza Lehmann
Thy Voice Is Heard.....Homer
Mavourneen.....Lang
Clown's Serenade.....Luckstone
Border Ballad.....Cowen

Counting the seven songs in the Dvorák cycle, Mr. Rogers gave altogether twenty-five numbers. His achievement was all the more remarkable, because in the closing song his voice was still clear and smooth. Singing in four languages in operatic selections, oratorio, arias and lieder is the goal for which all ambitious vocal artists strive, and from Mr. Rogers' success it seems needless to add that he has arrived. He is a manly singer. Refined, too, after the right manner.

The opening number, "Tutta Rea la Vita Umana," is from one of Händel's antiquated operas, "Scipione," and yet old as it is the text is one that modern men may study to their advantage. The first line of the aria reads:

"Base and worthless would be the life of man without the sense of honor."

A charming pastoral note is introduced in the aria, "Where'er You Walk," from Händel's "Semele." Mr. Rogers sang both of the Händel arias with beauty of tone and convincing dignity. He gave his audience real romance in the Serenade from "Don Giovanni." In the air, "Bois Epais," from Lully's "Amadis," and in the Barcarolle from "La Gioconda" Mr. Rogers showed that he was not deficient in the dramatic instinct. The songs by Brahms, Schubert, Schumann, Franz and Ries are familiar to the better class of New York music lovers, and being familiar a good singer like Mr. Rogers gives all the greater pleasure by singing them.

The Gypsy songs by Dvorák require perhaps more abandon than Mr. Rogers gave them. But it cannot be an easy matter for a singer of his refinement to do full justice to the weird and ardent impulses of the roaming children of Central Europe. The audience enjoyed the English songs as Mr. Rogers sang them. An extra round of applause greeted the singing of the "Clown's Serenade," by Isidore Luckstone, the accompanist of the afternoon. Throughout the recital the piano accompanying was cause for congratulation. With such a program as Mr. Rogers gave a good accompanist is an indispensable prop to the singer.

Augusta Cottlow's Recital.

MISS AUGUSTA COTTLOW, the young pianist, will present this program at her recital in Mendelssohn Hall on the evening of January 9:

Prelude and Fugue, D major.....Bach-Busoni
Seventeen Variations Serieuses.....Mendelssohn
Rhapsodie, B minor.....Brahms
Intermezzo, A flat.....Brahms
Sonata, B minor.....Chopin
Romance, F minor.....Tschaikowsky
Troïka.....Tschaikowsky
Etude, D flat.....Liszt
Polonaise, E major.....Liszt

Maria Victoria Torrilhon.

Miss Maria Victoria Torrilhon, who is quite well known as a drawing room pianist, gave a chamber music concert at Mendelssohn Hall last Saturday evening. Miss Torrilhon had the assistance of Sam Franko, violin; Joseph Kovarick, viola; Paul Morgan, 'cello, and Max Baier, contrabass. Brahms' Trio, op. 40, and the Schubert Forellen Quintet were played.

Meyn-Gerardy Recital.

HEINRICH MEYN, the baritone, and Jean Gerardy, 'cellist, united in a recital at Mendelssohn Hall last Monday afternoon, which proved to be full of substantial musical merit. There was a program of altogether unusual songs, well arranged, done in artistic, refined fashion, such as one can expect from Mr. Meyn. Von Koss' "Winterlied" is a rousing song, and was done in good fashion, while the singer got all possible out of the sentimental von Fielitz "Am ersten Tag." "Alt Heidelberg" was a characteristic thing, done in true German student humor fashion. The English songs were doubly enjoyable because of the ever-distinct enunciation, containing in them a wide range, from the pathetic to the Scotch humorous. Following them came a group of old French and Italian, of which Secchi's "Lungi dal caro," with its low A flat and the high F, was effective. "J'ai perdu" was dainty, the piano part in the hands of Bruno Huhn suggestive of the mandolin, as was intended, while "Chanson a boire" was sung with brightness and grace.

Gerardy's special qualities of luscious tone and musical temperament shone forth in all his numbers. His first encore, "The Swan," brought him affectionate admiration from the ladies, so full of sentiment was it. Schumann's "Abendlied" and Popper's "Butterflies" completed his triumph. Bruno S. Huhn, at the piano, was sympathetic and reliable.

WIENZKOWSKA PUPILS' RECITAL.—Madame de Wienzkowska, who is directress and founder of the Leschetizky School of Piano Playing, gave a pupils' recital at her Carnegie Hall studio last Monday afternoon. The charming singing of Mrs. Rhoder, who is a talented pupil of Oscar Saenger, was greatly enjoyed by the distinguished audience, as was also the splendid showing of Madame Wienzkowska's pupils. The program was as follows:

Technical Illustrations.
Mrs. Y. A. Parker and Ida Mampel.
Nocturne, E flat.....Field-Liszt
Melodie à la Mazurka.....Leschetizky
Edna Mampel.
Chant sans Paroles.....Tschaikowsky

MUSICALE BY E. PRESSON MILLER'S PUPILS.—The last pupils' musicale before Christmas was given at the spacious and handsome studio of E. Presson Miller on Wednesday afternoon, December 11. The following program was rendered:

Summer.....Chaminade
Villanelle.....Dell' Acqua
Miss Leslie Stewart.
Out on the Deep.....Lohr
Nathan Meltz.
Two Folksongs.....Foote
Mrs. J. A. Hammond.
Vielle Chanson.....Bizet
Miss Mary Frances Kirby.
Das Kraut Vergessenheit.....von Fielitz
Could I?.....Tosti
M. James Brines.
Quando a te lieta (Faust).....Gounod
Miss Grace Farmer.
Before the Dawn.....Allitsen
Ma Mie.....A. L.
J'ai pleuré en Rêve.....Hue
Leo Lieberman.

Two new comers who made a very pleasant impression were Miss Mary Frances Kirby and Miss Grace Farmer, Miss Kirby, who came from Towanda, Pa., to study with Mr. Miller, possesses a soprano voice of beautiful quality. With proper development her future as a singer is assured. Miss Farmer's sweet mezzo soprano made a very favorable impression. The work of Miss Stewart was, as always, interesting ,and her coloratura work was exceptionally well done. Mrs. Hammond sang her numbers like an artist. Nathan Meltz, although suffering from a severe cold, sang his numbers with good effect. Mr. Brines was not in good voice, but by the amount of taste and temperament displayed in his work made his songs thoroughly enjoyable. Mr. Lieberman is so well known to the public that his work needs no special comment.

VIENNA, NOVEMBER 30, 1901.

THE "Sign of the Cross" has celebrated its seventy-fifth performance, and is still running on before crowded houses at the Kaiser Jubilams Theater. It may further interest our readers to learn that the beautiful and youthiul Amalia Dolcini has won her suit against Bohrmann; that is, she gained the right to have her name as co-translator appear on all the bills and receives 2,000 crowns. She was, however, obliged to retract in the presence of official witnesses her insinuations against her co-laborer's honor.

The concert season has begun in good earnest. Bösendorfer Saal, Grosser and Kleiner Musik Verein Saal are filled every evening and overfilled; and people are being nightly turned away from the doors, while over the box office in large letters is seen the—to managers—delightful word "Ausverkanft" (sold out). On Wednesday, November 20, Henryk Melcer, a Polish pianist and composer, gave the first of two concerts in the smaller of the Musik Verein halls. He played only his own compositions: two piano concertos, one in E minor, one in G minor, and three transcriptions of songs by Stephan Monnysko. He also directed a composition of his entitled "Four-Tone Pictures in Symphony Form." Both of his concertos have won high honors: the first a Rubinstein prize in Berlin in 1895; the second a Paderewski prize in Leipsic in 1898. On the 27th Mr. Melcer will give a recital of standard works.

On Sunday, November 14, Xaver Scharwenka played his new Concerto in C sharp minor (first performance in Vienna) with the Philharmonic Orchestra. At the next Philharmonic concert Emil Sauer will play his E minor Concerto. Eugen d'Albert is announced to play the Brahms F minor Quintet with the Bohemian strings. The Joachim Quartet, which includes Joachim, Carl Halir, Wirth and Hausmann, will give a series of concerts. They will play some of the most celebrated Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Beethoven and Brahms quartets, and one seldom heard, by Cherubini. Other concerts which are exciting special anticipations are the song and ballad evening of the celebrated Bavarian singer Eugen Gura, on November 28; Bronislaw Hubermann, on December 2; Katharine Goodson, the English pianist, also December 2; Emil Sauer's piano recital, on December 11, and the Soldat-Roeger Quartet, on December 21.

About the Paderewski concerts, the learned critics of Vienna pass varying judgments. The public passed but one. R. Walaschek, in the Zeit, speaks forgivingly of the Polish Fantaisie on original themes. Why does he call it tasteless? Surely there is place for and a reason for a brilliant virtuoso number at the end of a program. Perhaps, indeed, such a composition proves a rest to that section of the audience whose brains and nerves are overstrained by preceding exhausting attention. Speaking of the Beethoven numbers, it would be impossible not to agree at least about some of their aspects with the Zeit. It is certainly a great pity that Gustav Brecher should be at the Hof Oper in the capacity of assistant director, and it is also inexcusable that his immature efforts at conducting should be imposed on an educated or an uneducated audience.

For our own poor part we cannot look upon "Coriolan" as a mere study for the accurate, pedantic counting out of beats and especially rests, and it is obviously impertinent for any so-called leader to attempt the "Emperor" Concerto if he be still unable to give the cues or bring in the tuttis on time. Not once was Herr Brecher behind the pianist, but always. And still we felt no lack of repose in Paderewski's reading. The first movement seemed to us admirable; the second and last would doubtless have been given with more intensity had not at least half the pianist's energy been devoted to helping the director along. The Chopin Concerto was beautifully played in pianistic style. Possibly the tragic declamation of the second movement has been more forcibly brought out, but here again the orchestra was responsible. Paderewski was greeted with such tempestuous applause at both concerts that the oldest Viennese maintained that even Liszt's triumphal passage was not such an ovation.

On the night of the recital, November 22, a large number of people were seated on the stage. Behind these others were standing and crowded up to the walls. The most beautifully given number, not excepting the Chopin pieces, seemed to us the chromatic Fantaisie and Fugue of Bach. Whatever academicians may have to gainsay, for many this immortal composition must always remain a wonderful song of romantic character. Paderewski played besides: Op. 111, of Beethoven; Schumann's G sharp minor Sonata; eight Chopin numbers, of course repeating the G flat study according to his custom in America; A minor Rubinstein Barcarolle and Rhapsody No. 11, of Liszt. The audience rushed upon the stage, and so surrounded the artist that he could with difficulty move on and off. After the close of the program he was recalled so often and obliged to play so many encores that he was able to leave the hall only just in time to make his train for Prague, where he directed his opera "Manru" on November 23.

An erudite contributor to the Neue Freie Presse, speaking of Paderewski's recital, says that he hears "the Polish artist for the second—nay, the first time." Such are his paradoxical words. He insinuates later that only in Chopin, Schumann, &c., is Paderewski at his best. There is always much said about the proper interpretation of Bach and Beethoven. From the citadel of tradition certain critics fulminate condemnation on all who venture to disagree with them. We feel that when a pianist succeeds in making the musical and dramatic contents of such a work as op. 111 of Beethoven clear to an audience only in small measure previously prepared to receive the message, he has done the work the composer has left for him to do—and he has done it well.

It is amusing to read Anton Door's views of the new Meister Schule under Sauer at the Conservatory. In his article made public by the Freie Presse on Sunday, November 24, Professor Door states that brilliant examples cannot cause virtuosity in students not already preeminently fitted by nature for the development of the same; that many are called, but few chosen; and other glittering generalities.

The readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER no doubt remember that Sauer's appointment at the Conservatory as head of the piano department, his titles and his salary proved too much for the forbearance of some of the time-honored members of the faculty, who consequently resigned. Without departing from proper respect for ancient institutions, we cannot but express our opinion that the Vienna Conservatorium has suffered sadly from the lack of new ideas. It is a fact that since the days of Czerny it has sent forth many thousands of certified pupils; has indeed published a long list of the so-called artists found within its walls. Some of these must have had natural talent. Why have they not been heard from?

Mahler is absent from Vienna. He produced his new symphony in G minor at Munich on Monday, November 25. The work will be given here later in the season.

An item in the issue of November 13 of THE MUSICAL COURIER leads us to believe that the Berlin correspondent has been misinformed. As every one in Vienna knows thoroughly well, the cause of Leschetizky's brilliant pupil Gaston Lherie's unfortunate suicide was the young man's hopeless love for a fellow student, a handsome American girl. Certain rumors circulated by a Berlin daily are entirely without foundation. Differences of opinion on musical matters or methods need not include slurs on morals and character.

We receive from Berlin news of the success of a young Viennese pianist and composer, Arthur Schnabel, who performed his own concerto in Beethoven Hall on Sunday, November 17. Prof. Carl Krebs, in Der Tag, speaks in high commendation of his characteristic themes, broad scope and fine orchestration of the work. Prof. Leopold Schmidt, in the Tageblatt, says that Mr. Schnabel's concerto demonstrates a maturity surprising in one so young (only nineteen), and that though the general impression is not cloudless, the composer shows that he has capacity not only to produce frequent themes but likewise to artistically elaborate them.

ARTHUR WHITING'S CONCERT.—Arthur Whiting gave the first in a series of four chamber music concerts last Sunday afternoon in the room of the Architectural League in the Fine Arts Building. The program included Mozart's violin and piano Sonatas in G major and E minor, Nos. 379 and 304 in the Köchel catalogue; the Brahms D minor Sonata for violin and piano, and Mr. Whiting's songs to poems from Fitzgerald's translation of Omar Khayyam. The sonatas were played by Mr. Whiting and Franz Kneisel. Perry Averill was the singer. The program was unusual as it was interesting.

Miss Howard, a pupil of Miss Genevieve Bisbee, will give a recital on December 18 at 4 o'clock at the music rooms, 1109 and 1110, Carnegie Hall.

Artists AND THEIR ... Affairs.

Anton Kaspar, the violinist, has been fulfilling several engagements in Washington. Mrs. Kaspar, who is still abroad with her parents, will return to this country and join Mr. Kaspar in December.

Miss Estelle Liebling is to be heard at an early date in an orchestral concert in this city. On Wednesday evening, January 8, she will give her own concert in Mendelssohn Hall, under the management of Henry Wolfsohn.

Adolf Glose assisted Mrs. Charles W. Rhodes in her illustrated lecture on "Wagner and the Bayreuth Festival" at Utica, Elmira, Williamsport and Springfield, Ohio, recently.

A concert was given recently in Unity Church, Denver, Col., by Emil Tiferro, at which Grant Weber, the pianist, assisted. He played Chopin's F sharp Nocturne and the Study, op. 10, No. 12, and Moszkowski's Spanish Caprice. The concert was a big success.

Berenice Thompson has published a new song, "Bubbles," which is to be sung at one of the coming musicales at the Washington studio of Jasper Dean McFall by Miss Pickering. The "Three Songs From Some Verses" are to be sung by Amy Law, a gifted Washington soprano, at her next recital.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Reginald Little gave a musical evening at their studios, 701-2 Carnegie Hall, on Friday. There were many prominent persons present. Those participating were Mrs. Morris Black, Henry K. Hadley and also Mr. Little. Mrs. Black sang charmingly some of Mr. Little's and Mr. Hadley's songs. Mr. Little, among other things, played two piano concertos, kindly assisted by Mr. Winston at the second piano.

Mary A. Cryder, a mezzo soprano, of Washington, D. C., sang the "Three Songs From Some Verses," words by Miss Hay, at musicales in Rye, New York, Bar Harbor and Middletown (Conn.), in the course of the heated term, and they were always well received. Other songs on Miss Cryder's programs were "At Parting," Rogers; "Bon Jour, Suzon," Thomé; "Serenade," Meyer-Helmund; "Ouvres tes yeux bleus," Massenet, and songs by Schubert, Nevin and many others.

Hallet Gilbertè, the tenor, assisted by his wife, the dramatic reader, has been giving a series of successful recitals in the New England cities. The newspapers have published very favorable reviews of these entertainments and have bestowed upon Mr. and Mrs. Gilbertè many compliments. The programs were made up largely of Mr. Gilbertè's own compositions. As a singer Mr Gilbertè long ago earned an enviable position, and this season he is enjoying great success. He purposes to appear in New York soon after the holidays.

Oley Speaks, the talented singer and composer, is much in demand just at present for private musicales. His voice, a beautiful bass, remarkable both in range and in quality, lends itself especially well to the songs of his own composing.

On December 10 he sang at Mrs. Bennett's private musicale in Seventieth street, on December 13 at the Rutherford Club, Rutherford, N. J., and on December 15 at Madame Newhouse's musicale on Fifth avenue. On December 23 Mr. Speaks will sing "The Messiah" at St. Thomas' Church. He will sing selections from "The Messiah" at the Aeolian Company's recitals in Brooklyn on December 27, and in New York on December 28.

In January Mr. Speaks will give a series of song recitals in the West.

Mr. Bennett gave his second recital this season at Carnegie Hall, December 10. Some fine examples of tone production were shown by the various pupils.

Those who appeared were Mrs. Laurel Rivers, Miss Edna Hunter, Miss Cecelia Quinn, Oscar Fuchs, Miss Luise Ruprecht, assisted by Wilhelm Fischer, 'cellist.

SECOND ARION CONCERT.

CHRISTMAS greens and huge clusters of holly enhanced the surroundings of the second Arion concert last Sunday night. The program included five novelties, and the soloists were Miss Esther Palliser and Miss Olive Mead. As the opening number the orchestra conducted by Mr. Lorenz played as a memorial to the late Josef Rheinberger that composer's Prelude and Fugue, op. 79. The Maennerchor followed it, singing appropriately an old Christmas song by Praetorius, and sang it so well that a repetition of a part was redemanded. Of the new choral works heard at the concert "The Forsaken Chapel," by Mathieu Neumann, made the best impression. Devotional in character, refined and melodious, it proved very agreeable. Two of the other novelties may be dismissed by classing them as pleasing trifles, but no more. One a folksong, "Im Feld des Morgens Früh," by Ch. Burkhardt, and the other a semi-humorous song, "Die Hahnenfeder Nickt von Hut," by Rudolf Wagner. Being only a chicken feather the Audubon Society will not object.

Miss Esther Palliser combined dramatic power and winning pathos in the aria, "Ave Maria Königin," from Max Bruch's "Feuerkreuz." The splendid stage presence of this artist also proved a factor in her success during the evening. In her songs, "Fischerknabe," by Liszt; Brahms' "Sandmänchen" and "Rosalind's Madrigal," by Liza Lehmann's mother, Miss Palliser recalled another side to her art, namely, that of singing songs simply and poetically, and this is something all operatic and oratorio singers cannot do. Miss Palliser came to America in time. She will be needed. Her voice is one of those rich, full vibrant sopranos, with a big range, and there is wide scope for such a voice.

Miss Mead belongs to the school of young violinists who are gladly heard at concerts. Tone, technic and taste, she has them all, and moreover, her playing is marked with sincerity that is unusual in so youthful a performer. Then, too, Miss Mead's presence is winsome. Her selections for the evening included the Romanza and Finale from Wieniawski's Second Concerto, Wagner's "Albumblatt," arranged by Wilhelmj, and a Mazurka, by Zarzycki.

The string orchestra played a Romanza by Georg Keller, and this was one of the things marked "new" upon the program. But for this marking, no one would have guessed it was "new." The orchestra also played the fourth part of Bizet's Roman Suite. Robert Schwalm's "Death Song of the Goths" was sung as the closing number, and this was another novelty. Like the making of books, there is no end to the publishing of new musical compositions. However, with all due respect to composers and conductors, five novelties are too many to digest at one concert. But for some reason the conductors of the German singing societies delight in presenting novelties, and while the plan redounds greatly to their credit, it is not possible to expect the average music lover or even music student to be wholly in sympathy with the fashion.

Many conductors of the clubs which sing in English go to the other extreme and neglect new compositions altogether.

FRIEDA STENDER'S SUCCESS.—That Miss Frieda Stender's appearance in public is always a complete success is sustained by her recent press notices, of which we reprint a few herewith:

Miss Stender next appeared and sang an aria from "Der Waffenschmied," by Lortzing, accompanied by the full orchestra. Miss Stender is the possessor of a remarkably sweet soprano voice, highly cultivated, and rendered the difficult selection in a manner which stamped her an artist of rare ability. She was enthusiastically recalled, and in response to an encore sang a pretty little ballad, "Violets." It was rendered in such a pleasing manner that she had to repeat it. * * * Miss Stender next sang Chaminade's "Madrigal" and Hildach's "Mein Liebster ist ein Weber" in charming manner, and when again forced to respond to the vociferous applause sang "The Sweetest Flower that Blooms."—The Observer (Hoboken), December 9.

The next number of the program was a soprano solo by Miss Frieda Stender, who rendered the aria of Marie from "Waffenschmied," and earned such stormy applause that she had to give "Violets" as an encore. It was the young artist's first appearance in Hoboken. She has a beautiful voice, and her style is excellent. Miss Stender sang also "Madrigal" and "Mein Liebster ist ein Weber," and as an encore "The Sweetest Flower that Blooms."—New York Staats-Zeitung, December 9.

Miss Frieda Stender, the prima donna, proved once more that there is a fine future for her in store. She rendered an aria from "Der Waffenschmied," two songs ("Madrigal," by Chaminade, and "Mein Liebster ist ein Weber," by Hildach), to which she kindly added as an encore Van der Stucken's "The Sweetest Flower."—New Yorker Herold, December 9.

MISS
FEILDING ROSELLE,
Mezzo-Contralto.
ORATORIO, RECITAL and OPERA.
ADDRESS:
221 West 44th Street, NEW YORK.

Powers Studio Musicale.

MISS E. GENEVIEVE WEAVER gave a recital of Nevin songs at the Powers-Alexander studios last Saturday evening, under the direction of Francis Fischer Powers, with this program:

When the Land Was White With Moonlight.
Nocturne.
German songs—
  Rechtezeit.
  Mädel wie bluhts.
  Herhstgefühl.
French songs—
  Vielle Chanson.
  La Vie.
  Dites Moi.
One Spring Morning.
'Twas April.
In a Bower.
Children's songs—
  In Winter I Get Up at Night.
  Of Speckled Eggs the Birdie Sings.
  Dark Brown Is the River.
  Beat Upon Mine, Little Heart.
  Little Boy Blue.
At Twilight.
Oh, That We Two Were Maying.
The Merry Lark.
The Dream Maker Man.
The Rosary.

Miss Weaver quite captured attention by her unusual combination, handsome person and expressive, finished soprano voice. All her numbers were sung with much sympathy and indeed there is probably no better singer of the graceful Nevin songs before the public. The group ending with "The Rosary" she played, with musical touch and tone, showing versatility and ability at the piano. "One Spring Morning" was especially graceful and quaint, "'Twas April" full of fervor, and the high G of "In a Bower" caught attention, because of beautiful tone-quality.

Harry S. Briggs played accompaniments full of sympathy and temperament quite astonishing for such a youth.

Miss Weaver, with Mrs. Hadden-Alexander, stunningly gowned, assisted Mr. Powers in receiving, and the usual prominent society people crowded the handsome studios.

Jessie Shay.

MISS JESSIE SHAY, the piano soloist of the Kubelik tour, is receiving many excellent criticisms. We add those of the Hartford (Conn.) concert:

Herr Kubelik was assisted in this concert by Miss Jessie Shay, pianist, a dainty lady, with a charming presence. She was practically a stranger to Hartford, but Miss Shay is the kind of artist that Hartford will always esteem. Her introduction was two numbers en suite, "Etincelle," by Moszkowski, and "Etude de Concert," by Schloezer. The first was a dainty and characteristic Slav bit, given with much delicacy and interpretation that was thoroughly artistic and enjoyable. The Etude was equally modern, immensely difficult and given with snap, discretion and good sentiment. Miss Shay was enthusiastically received. Her second number was the Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12, by Liszt. Miss Shay interpreted the thunders and dainties of this big number marvelously for a young woman, and this is said in no spirit of apology for her. She is a genuine artist, and deserved all the recognition she received. Her temperament is apparent, and she should play Chopin exceptionally well.—Hartford Courant, December 13, 1901.

Miss Jessie Shay scored almost as much of a success as Herr Kubelik. As a pianist she was grand. Miss Shay is a young woman, a blonde of pleasing appearance. Her rendition of Moszkowski's "Etincelle" and Beethoven's Romance in G major were divine. She put much feeling into her playing and her technic was excellent.—Hartford Telegram, December 13, 1901.

An excellent pianist, who stirred the feelings of the audience strongly, shared the program with Kubelik. Miss Jessie Shay played a Moszkowski number with remarkable grace and clearness and a perfection of touch that won admiration from the first measures. In the "Concert Study," by Schloezer, she took such rapid time that one marveled, and yet nothing clearer, more distinct, more finished in treatment was offered during the evening. It was a brilliant yet cool performance, and it displayed notable technic and perfect control. In the Hungarian Rhapsodic she added color and power to her production, and made the instrument respond with those orchestral effects which Liszt designed. Miss Shay was an exceedingly satisfactory second during the evening, and her piano playing, which is of distinct and highly modern character, made a strong impression on the audience, which applauded long.—Hartford Times, December 13, 1901.

VOORHIS SUBSCRIPTION CONCERTS.—The first of three with the Kaltenborn Quartet began last night, Tuesday, December 17, at the Jersey City Club; the second occurs February 11, the last April 15. The success of the chamber concert of last year, under Voorhis' management, has induced this series.

MACONDA.

HERE are more press notices recording in no uncertain tone the continued success of the artistic soprano Charlotte Maconda. She is one of the artists who is meeting with a well-deserved triumph:

Mme. Charlotte Maconda, an artist who is the equal of any soprano heard in concert in Spokane, deserved a larger audience than that which sparsely dotted the floors of the Spokane Theatre last evening. But those who braved the inclement weather were richly repaid. They manifested their delight by most vigorous applause, and had Madame Maconda cared to respond she had excuse for doubling the length of the program. Hers is a voice of exquisite quality, of wide range and volume, and it is apparent that it has been trained by masters.

Chaminade, Grieg, Schumann, Ifahn, Nevin, Bartlett, Lehmann, in fact the works of nearly all the noted composers whose compositions are rendered by the world's greatest artists, were intelligently and delightfully interpreted by Madame Maconda. The trills and cadenzas of "Thou Brilliant Bird," from "Perle du Brézil;" the mournful tones of the Irish Folksong, crooning notes of lullabies and melodious runs in sweet ballads of English song writers came from her throat in a way that showed to advantage the versatility of this really splendid vocalist.

Some of her songs were quite exacting, particularly Gounod's "Mignon," the chief beauties of which are smoothness and evenness and exquisite shading. There was the pathos and clearness of tone that makes the artist. Madame Maconda's personality was pleasing. She seemed to enjoy to the utmost the rapture of every one of her hearers, and she was as painstaking with her numbers as if she were singing before the largest of metropolitan audiences.

"'Twas April" (Nevin) was a familiar song to even the less musical of her hearers. She gave it a color that was a revelation. Again in the Schumann song she held the audience spellbound.

"Si mes vers Avaient des Ailes" (C. Hahn) was a tone picture that also added to the laurels of this gifted colorature soprano.—Spokane Spokesman Review.

The Maconda concert—artistically speaking, it was a thorough success. Financially, however, it was a disappointment, for less than 1,000 people were in the Tabernacle, including the choir, and 1,000 people are lost in the Tabernacle. Madame Maconda is charming as to personality, stage presence and voice, and her solos were followed each time by a storm of applause. Her voice is a pure coloratura, with dramatic tendency; in fact, some of her numbers were cleverly acted, and it showed conclusively that her true place is on the operatic stage. Her piano accompaniments were played by Prof. J. J. McClellan, who only had a day in which to rehearse with her, but his work was especially complimented by the fair singer. Madame Maconda sang "Romance," by Bartlett; "L'Ete" and "Tu me dirais," by Chaminade; "Pearl of Brazil," by David; "Berceuse," by Godard; "Maids of Cadiz," "'Twas April," by Nevin; "Lullaby," Luckstone; "You and I," Lehmann, and the solo "Inflammatus," with the choir, all of which were splendidly given. The choir, led by Professor Stephens, rendered efficient aid, and the concert, as a whole, was a delight to all present.—Salt Lake Tribune.

What would have been called a fairly good house at a smaller hall, one of nearly a thousand people, including the singers, enjoyed the magnificent program offered by that rare artist, Charlotte Maconda, to Salt Lake last night at the Tabernacle. While Madame Maconda was really suffering with a severe cold, yet a more beautiful voice under more perfect and artistic control has seldom been heard here. She can be compared only with such as Nordica or Melba—or still more like Sembrich—had the latter been heard here. Perhaps of the varied program that she gave the "Bird Song," from "The Pearl of Brazil" and the "Polonaise," from "Mignon," were the most rapturously received, though the daintier numbers were exquisitely done. The only regret was that so few people, comparatively, turned out to enjoy the feast.—Salt Lake Herald.

ANTONIA SAWYER.—Laura Vreeland, a pupil of Mrs. Sawyer, sang at the Christmas affair at the Astoria last week, singing a Hawley and a Neil song with such artistic self-poise, control of the means of expression, and musical as well as delightful voice, that she made a distinct hit. Mrs. Sawyer also sang a brace of French and German songs, when those characteristics which have made her a favorite, namely, beautiful voice, temperament and superior diction, all combined to make her singing an event of the evening. Four of her pupils sang at the last gathering of the Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Gardner school, where she teaches.

HAROLD BAUER.

[By Cable.]

PARIS, DECEMBER 17, 1901.

Musical Courier, New York:

"Harold Bauer, the pianist, sails for America on December 19."

A SUCCESSFUL BOWMAN PUPIL.

Maude Sanders Faust.

MAUDE SANDERS FAUST, in charge of the piano department at the Colorado Springs Conservatory of Music, early showed musical talent and had piano lessons from her sixth year. Her really serious study, however, began when she entered the music school at Vassar College, and came under the instruction and helpful musical influence of Miss Jessie Chapin, for many years one of the most efficient teachers attached to the musical staff at Vassar. During her last four years at college Miss Sanders' studies were pursued under the supervision of E. M. Bowman, of Steinway Hall, then professor and director of the department of music at Vassar, and in harmony, counterpoint, music form and history she enjoyed the privilege of being instructed by him. For several years Miss Sanders was a prominent performer in the public recitals given by the pupils in the college chapel and also at the more frequent musicales of the Thekla Society.

In 1894 she graduated with high credit, and the following week, with no special preparation other than that received through her regular studies at Vassar, she passed the exacting examinations held in New York city by the American College of Musicians, winning first honors.

Subsequent to her college course in music and arts and her marriage to Dr. Faust, of Poughkeepsie, Mrs. Faust studied piano and composition in New York with Professor Bowman, and taught a large class of piano and theory pupils up to her recent removal to Colorado Springs, where she is prominently identified with the piano department of the Colorado Springs Conservatory of Music, an excellent school of music connected with the Colorado College. Thoroughly equipped for her work as teacher, pianist and theorist, earnest and conscientious in her every effort, Mrs. Faust will prove a splendid acquisition to the musical forces of her adopted city and State. In her Mr. Bowman has another addition to the already long list of able representatives in the Far West of his painstaking preparation of professional pupils.

Charles W. Clark's Success in Chicago.

[By Wire.]

CHICAGO, Ill., December 16, 1901.

Musical Courier, New York:

CHARLES W. CLARK'S fine voice and musicianly interpretations important feature at historical orchestral concerts, Chicago Auditorium, December 13 and 14. Recalled many times Saturday night. H.

Estelle Liebling at Kubelik Concert.—Miss Estelle Liebling, the young soprano, will sing at the Kubelik concert at the Metropolitan Opera House next Sunday night. This will be Miss Liebling's first public appearance in New York since she returned from Germany. The young artist sang earlier in the season at the Arion concert, and a fortnight ago at the concert of the Brooklyn Apollo Club.

Brounoff Russian Lectures.—The pianist, singer, composer and lecturer, Platon Brounoff, has been very busy of late giving his popular lecture recital on "Russian Music and Life," having just finished a course of six under the auspices of the Brooklyn Board of Education. December 11 he gave it for the Women's Club, of Waterbury, Conn., assisted by his pupil, the soprano, Clara Gorn, who is singing better than ever. The papers had most enthusiastic notices. December 14 he gave a students' concert in Brooklyn, assisted by Miss Sara Fish, pianist; Louis Cohn, pianist; Miss Gorn and Mishel Shapiro, the young violinist, pupil of Fonaroff.

Dannreuther Quartet.—This well-known organization played last week at Miss Porter's school, Farmington, Conn., this being their eighteenth year at that school. They gave a Mozart Quartet, Schubert Theme and Variations, Glazounow Novelettes, Schumann Quartet, and Mr. Dannreuther played the Händel Sonata in A.

A $68 Library of Musical Knowledge and Sheet Music—16 Volumes—sent complete on receipt of $1 and your acceptance as a Club Member

This one Edition only at HALF PRICE

Theodore Thomas.

This Musical Library is the 1901 edition of Famous Composers and Their Music, edited by Theodore Thomas, John Knowles Paine and Karl Klauser. Musical instructors and the foremost musicians universally recognize it as the best of all musical libraries. It is the standard of the world and over 50,000 sets of the earlier (six volume) edition have been sold at more than double our price per volume. There are sixteen Imperial Octavo volumes measuring about 9 x 12 inches—six of reading matter and illustration, and ten of music. The text volumes contain all you want to know about the history of music itself—the different schools of music, Italian, French, German, and so forth; the complete stories of all the great composers, their private lives and their public careers; clear and full accounts of the special peculiarities of every composer's work, and how each of them differed in essential points from all his fellow-craftsmen, yet made important contributions to the total. In short, they really form a complete encyclopedia of all musical knowledge, not written like an encyclopedia but like simple history or biography.

FAMOUS COMPOSERS AND THEIR MUSIC

6 Encyclopedia Volumes—10 Music Volumes

The entire content of these text volumes consists of articles specially written for this work by such men as Oscar Comettant, Director of the Paris Conservatoire; Edward Dannreuther, the distinguished musical critic of London; the late John Fiske, Philip Hale, Adolphe Jullien, who stands at the very head of the Parisian critics; Dr. Louis Kelterborn, Dr. Philipp Spitta, of Berlin; Henry E. Krehbiel, of New York, and many others equally famous. Each subject has been written about by the one particular person in the whole musical world who is best qualified to deal with it, and the cost to the publisher of all these special articles was enormous.

The 10 Music Volumes contain nearly 1700 pages of sheet music chosen by Theodore Thomas and Karl Klauser. The pieces are neither too easy nor too difficult. Plenty of them can easily be mastered by pupils of a year or two's experience. Yet Paderewski bought five sets of the first edition—one for his own use and four for gifts to his friends.

For Young Musicians this work is invaluable. It does not preach; it is not full of "Dont's"; it does not attempt to teach how to play or sing; it does not try to take the place of a musical instructor. But after one has owned the Library a while, dipped into its reading volumes and wandered through its hundreds of music pages, there grows up insensibly a love for what is really good and an aversion to what is bad in the great world of melody and harmony.

Beautiful Illustrations to the number of over 500 are scattered through the volumes. Many are magnificent color plates of rare and interesting musical instruments, 234 of them are portraits of the great composers, while others are facsimiles of their music manuscripts, views of the towns they lived in, their birthplaces, and notable scenes in their careers.

Half Price {LITTLE PAYMENTS [IF YOU PREFER]

The set consists of sixteen Imperial Octavo volumes, measuring about 9 x 12 inches—almost sheet music size—bound in classic vellum, with rolled gold tops and gold-lettered and decorated backs, and the music volumes will lie open perfectly flat on a music rack, with no bothersome tendency on the part of the leaves to turn over of themselves.

The publisher's price of the set is $68.00. Our club price is just one-half of that, with the Club fee ($1) added. The payments are $1 (Club fee) down and $2 per month for 17 months.

The full Set is sent you when you join the club and pay the first Dollar.

PARIS, DECEMBER 12, 1901.

FOR several consecutive seasons it was a sort of rule or custom that there should be an American prima donna at the Grand Opéra, of Paris. During the last few years, however, this unspoken rule has appeared to be in abeyance. On Monday night last it was, however, revived in the person of Miss Bessie Abbott, who was announced to appear as the ill-fated lyric heroine in Gounod's "Roméo et Juliette." In a role associated with surely every soprano since it was created by Madame Miolan-Carvalho, I am glad to say that Miss Abbott achieved a decided success. Her voice is of a bright, telling quality, which, while possessing a certain warmth of color, rang out admirably in the more dramatic and impassioned phrases in the opera. Her vocalization, too, except in one or two passages, was sure and distinct. The first phrase of Juliette, "Ecoutez, c'est le son," with its florid ending ascending to the high D, was delivered with such effect as to secure the good opinion of the audience at once for the young débutante, further confirmed by the valse ariette, which was encored. The suffrages of the audience were retained by the effective manner in which Juliette's share of the Madrigal duet, "Ange Adorable," and the grand duet of act four, with its beautiful phrase "Non, ce n'est pas le jour," were delivered. In short, it may be briefly said that Miss Abbott scored a real and merited success, and that even her few defects were simply those of extreme youth and inexperience. Even these seem to give an ingenuousness and charm to her impersonation of the girlish heroine. In appearance Miss Abbott was simply charming as Juliette. She appears again in the same role on Saturday next, and has been chosen to sing the music of the Forest Bird in the coming production of Wagner's "Siegfried," with M. Jean de Reszké in the tenor role.

By the way, in view of recent reports that I have read in THE MUSICAL COURIER as to the treatment of certain foreign singers at various German opera houses, and at some of the lyric theatres of Italy, I asked the direct question as to Miss Abbott's relations with her professional colleagues at the Opéra, and was assured by her that one and all had been most kind and sympathetic to her. The Paris journals are uniformly generous, one critic (Pierre Veber) saying that she sings "without an accent." As there are at present Mlles. Courtenay and Garden, American; Mlle. Nervil, English, at the Opéra Comique; Mme. Acté, Finnish; Mlle. Abbott, American, at the Opéra—not to speak of Jean de Reszké, Polish—Mlle. Wanda de Boncza (Rutkowski), Russian or Pole, leading actors at the Comédie Française, not to speak of other foreign artists in Paris, whose name at present I do not recall, it would seem as if the outcry of nationalism in art were perhaps not so well founded after all, or is it that the Gallic nation has so strong a feeling for art and such natural politeness of manner as to prevent any petty demonstrations such as those I have alluded to. I cannot tell; I have simply stated what I know. I remember that excellent artist Santley saying that he did not believe any foreign singer had ever taken an ounce of food from his mouth. Personally I do not think that nationality is any bar to success. No, but mediocrity is. And as we have in Paris several instances of artists successfully singing and speaking in a foreign tongue, the matter of diction is not an insurmountable difficulty; it all depends how you go about it.

I have never been very enthusiastic about piano duets. Prejudice on my part, no doubt, but I have never cared either about the literature or effects to be gotten out of this form of musical art. It was, therefore, with a feeling of resignation to the inevitable that I leaned back in my chair at a recent matinee musicale in a certain Parisian salon when I saw two young and charming girls, most becomingly gowned—"confections"—where the same fanciful conceit was carried out in different colors—seat themselves at two grand pianos. After the first few bars, however, my attention was at once enlisted. It was not that there was simply a beautiful tone quality produced and a sure technic displayed. In this pianistic age one seems to expect those things from every pianist. It was that with these there was a unanimity that was never rigid or mechanical, a perfection of ensemble that conveyed no idea of its having been attained through working with a metronome, but as if one mind had grasped the interpretation of the composition and manifested it through the medium of four hands on two pianos. From a technically perfect point of view, the performance was equal to the best work of its kind I have heard; from an artistic and intellectual standpoint, much superior. These two sisters—Mlles. Sondheim—come from Berlin and Vienna, and are shortly to make a Parisian début at the Salle Erard.

At the last Lamoureux concert a splendid performance of the Pastoral Symphony was given, thus continuing the chronological order of Beethoven's symphonic works. As surely everything has been said that can be said on this great work, or at all events as I find nothing new to say, I merely mention the fact of its having been given. Mendelssohn, who is not often performed in Paris, was represented by his music to a "Midsummer Night's Dream," and the prelude to "Dante's Vision," by Raoul Brunel, of which I spoke last week, was also given. Madame Raunay was the vocalist, and gave in excellent style excerpts from Gluck's "Alceste" and Reyer's "Statue." The picturesque valse of "Mephistopheles," by Liszt, with its ingenuity of color and rhythm, was given at a most extraordinary pace.

At the Conservatory concerts nothing of any importance is to be noted except a symphony by Mehul, for the first time, and a chorus for women's voices, by Massenet, called "La Chevrière."

At the Colonne Concert the Symphony by César Franck, in D minor, which had been redemanded, seemed to spoil the ear for Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony, which followed closely after. This work, although admirably performed, appeared commonplace, particularly the first movement. Comparing the last part of this work—the Saltarello—with Berlioz's "Carnival Romain," a critic said that Mendelssohn's composition seemed to him like an individual on a balcony throwing confetti among the crowd, while Berlioz's reminded him of someone taking an active part in the mad frolic underneath. The vocalist was Mme. Rose Caron, the once famous cantatrice, who created Reyer's Salammbô. Imagine a singer who has once been great, but out of whose voice all beauty is entirely gone, and who even on the concert platform tries to atone for the insufficiency of her vocal means by dramatic gestures in order to bring her conception of the composer's idea more clearly before the audience. Madame Caron's voice is nearly gone, not so her art. The color and accent, the dramatic fire and pathos she infused into a recitative by Gluck, from "Alceste," formed a lesson for all students of singing.

The Schorg String Quartet from Brussels played at the third concert of the Philharmonic Society. Ensemble admirable, and excellent effect produced in the Quartet in D major, by C. Franck and that in D minor, by Schubert. Frederick Lamond, the Scottish pianist, gave a magnificent performance of the Sonata Appassionata of Beethoven, and Mlle. Vicq sang songs by Schubert in a French translation very tastefully. The first violin—M. Schorg—chose as his solo number a fragment of Bach for violin unaccompanied.

I have already spoken of the excellence of the music given at the Odéon Theatre of Paris during the entr'actes. As a further instance of this liberality in artistic matters le me mention that at the next performance of "Le Mariage de Figaro"—I mean the comedy, not the opera—Colonne has been engaged, with his orchestra, to perform the following program: Overture, "Marriage of Figaro"; Symphony in G minor; Quintet in A; Turkish March; Symphony in C major; Quartet in D minor, all by Mozart. Most theatrical managers would consider it an absolute waste of money to engage a distinguished orchestra and with its conductor to play classical music between the acts of a play.

DE VALMOUR.

MARGARET GOETZ.—During the season Miss Margaret Goetz has given seven folksong recitals, representing seven different nations, and in addition three recitals with Schubert programs. Miss Goetz, being an accomplished linguist, is enabled to sing folksongs in the original tongues. However, in the educational recitals the songs are translated to the audience.

HOTEL CECIL, LONDON,
December 14, 1901.

AN appetite of a Gargantua is needed if one is to appreciate the gigantic feasts of music with which Mr. Newman provides us at his symphony concerts nowadays. This, for example, is the program of the last that took place, that of December 7:

Overture, A Midsummer Night's Dream.....Mendelssohn
Recitative and air, O ma Lyre immortelle (Sapho).....Gounod
Mme. Kirkby Lunn.
Symphony No. 6, in F (Pastoral).....Beethoven
Piano Concerto in D minor.....Brahms
Signor Busoni.
Overture, Les Barbares.....Saint-Saëns
(First performance in England.)
Aria, Ah rendimi quel core (Mitrane).....Rossi
Mme. Kirkby Lunn.
Trauermarsch (Götterdämmerung).....Wagner
Entrance of the Gods Into Walhall (Das Rheingold).....Wagner

I do not know at what hour it was over, as I did not wait to see. It began, however, at 3 o'clock, and Saint-Saëns' new overture ended at 5:15, so the program was presumably finished shortly before 6. At any rate no one can complain of not getting enough for his money.

The new overture is an interesting work, but so complex that several hearings must be needed before it can be fully appreciated. Placing it so late in a long program, too, was a mistake, for the brain is inevitably wearied and cannot grasp all the points. It is, however, a good example of the work of the composer in his most serious mood and fully merits a closer acquaintance. The performance of the symphony was as good as are all Mr. Wood's performances, but the best feature of the concert was Signor Busoni's fine reading of the Brahms Concerto. He reached his highest level in his reading of the beautiful second movement, which was as full of poetry as could be.

A short but interesting program was given at the Salle Erard by Signorina Maria Bambacioni, a singer with a good voice of unimpeachable taste, who would, however, do well to pay some attention to her phrasing, which is sometimes so faulty as to spoil the effect of her songs. She gave an interesting selection, which included Pergolese's "Célèbre Siciliana" and Bach's "Liebster Jesu." That excellent pianist, Miss Angela Anderson, though she did not play any big work, gave a number of small pieces in good style. These included Scarlatti's Pastorale and Capriccio, which she played with remarkable neatness and sympathy, while she displayed her fine technic to the best advantage in Liszt's Thirteenth Rhapsody.

On the same afternoon Kocian, the new violinist, who is expected by some to oust Kubelik from his pinnacle, gave his first concert at St. James' Hall. Kocian and Kubelik are both pupils of the same master, Sevcik, and both of them possess that wonderful technic which Sevcik is famous for imparting to his pupils. Kocian is, perhaps, hardly Kubelik's equal as yet, but he has youth on his side (he is some years younger than the violinist of the moment), and there is no saying what he will do. One thing, however, is certain, and that is that he has the making of a very fine player. His performance of Ernst's F sharp minor was brilliant to a degree, and it was indeed only his skill in playing it that made that appalling composition tolerable. Kocian was, perhaps, rather unwise in allowing his artistic powers to be judged by his performance of the "Kreutzer" Sonata. It is a work that only the most experienced player should attempt, and youth and experience cannot possibly go hand in hand. His artistic powers are, however, evidently above the average, and his performance, though not entirely satisfactory, had some very good points. Miss Marguerite Elzy, who was his associate in the "Kreutzer" Sonata, played some piano pieces very brilliantly.

In the evening Walter Ford gave the second of his historical recitals of German songs, and, as was the case with his first concert, presented a very interesting program. Songs by Schumann, Brahms, Mendelssohn, Cornelius and Schultz figured in it, and the singer sang all of them with admirable taste.

On Tuesday afternoon two very interesting concerts unfortunately clashed with one another—those given by the Kruse Quartet at St. James' Hall and by Busoni at Queen's Hall. The program of the former was drawn entirely from Brahms' works, and, moreover, Richard Mühlfeld, the famous clarinetist, came over on purpose to take part in it. This, of course, meant the inclusion in the program of the Trio in A minor for clarinet, piano and violoncello, admirably played by Herr Mühlfeld, Miss Fanny Davies and Herbert Walenn, and of the Quintet in B minor for clarinet and strings, in which Herr Mühlfeld was joined by the whole of the Kruse Quartet. The latter must always rank among the most beautiful of its composer's works, and it was admirably played on Tuesday. The style of this Kruse Quartet is particularly suited to Brahms' music, and it plays with splendid solidity and breadth. The concert was quite the most attractive of the series.

Busoni's program was also very interesting. It opened with some Bach arrangements of his own, which he played beautifully, and he was hardly less successful in Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata, though he rather overdid the sentiment in the last movement. By far his finest performance was that which he gave of the two books of Brahms' Paganini Variations. His technic is so fine that the great difficulties of the music form no obstacle, while his remarkable variety of touch and tone can rarely have been displayed to better advantage. He caught the different moods of the variations to perfection, and in his hands each of them became a beautiful musical piece instead, as is only too often the case, of a difficult technical exercise.

On the same afternoon Charles Phillips and Ethel Barns gave their second chamber concert at the Bechstein Hall.

In the evening one of the most interesting concerts of the week took place at the Salle Erard. Miss Adela Verne is well known as an excellent pianist, and on Tuesday, greatly daring, she decided to give a program entirely made up of unknown works by living British composers. Her enterprise met with all the success that it deserved and it is to be hoped that in future our pianists will realize that there exist native compositions which are quite worth recognition. Most of the works were by composers who have already made names for themselves. Sir Hubert Parry was represented by a Theme and nineteen variations, Stanford by a Scherzo, T. F. Dunhill by a very fine set of variations, Percy Pitt by a graceful Minuet and J. F. Barnett by a Toccata. One of the best compositions Miss Verne played was a charming and beautifully written Ballade by H. F. Birch Reynardson, at present in manuscript, which fully deserves a place in the program of any piano recital. It is to be hoped that other pianists, encouraged by Miss Verne's success, will follow in her footsteps.

On the same evening Madame Belle-Rauske, who is well known as a lecturer on the voice, gave a vocal recital at the Bechstein Hall.

A concert was also given at the Queen's Hall by the Stock Exchange Orchestral Society, which, conducted by Arthur W. Payne, the well-known leader of the Queen's Hall orchestra, is quite one of the best amateur orchestras in London. Fine performances were given of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Percy Pitt's "Cinderella" suite and other pieces.

On Wednesday afternoon Miss Amy Castles, the Australian soprano, gave her second concert at St. James' Hall. Her second appearance only served to increase the impression which she made at the first—that she has still much to learn. She has, beyond a doubt, a very beautiful voice, but she is still hopelessly lacking in style and it is to be feared that if she persists in concert singing before she is fully developed her great powers may be wasted. Latest reports tell of a projected tour in Australia. If reports speak true for once, it is a pity. It would have been far better had she persisted in her original intention of continuing her studies in Europe.

In the afternoon, too, Edwin Lemare gave yet another organ recital at the Queen's Hall, while in the evening Miss Ellen Bowick and Miss Nellie Atkinson occupied the Bechstein Hall with a dramatic and musical recital.

Mr. Galston, a very promising young pianist, gave a very successful recital at the Bechstein Hall.

On Thursday evening a very attractive vocal recital was given at the Salle Erard by Miss Mabel Manson, a young soprano from New Zealand. She has a very fresh and pleasing voice, though it is not powerful, and she is also an excellent artist. She was particularly successful in some songs from Arthur Somervell's cycle "Love in Springtime," in Coleridge Taylor's "Spring Had Come," and Brahms' "Wiegenlied." She had the valuable assistance of Miss Angela Anderson, who, besides giving remarkably fine performances of Rubinstein's Barcarolle in F minor and Moszkowski's Concert Valse in E, was joined by Mr. Kolin-Balozky in a reading of Grieg's Sonata for piano and violoncello that was marked by great breadth of style and real sympathy.

On the same evening a remarkably fine performance of the "Elijah" was given at the Queen's Hall. The choruses were sung by the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society, which made on this occasion its first appearance in London. It proved capable of producing a fine tone; the parts were well balanced, and it sang with a great deal of dramatic feeling. Of the soloists, by far the most successful was Mme. Lilian Blauvelt, who gave a very brilliant performance of the soprano music, and particularly of "Hear Ye, Israel," while the other principals were Miss Ada Crossley, Mr. Davies and Lloyd Chandos, the secondary quartet being Misses Fanny Chetnam and Edith Leslie and H. Plevy and G. Stubbs.

Concerts were also given on Thursday by Miss Frances McCulloch and Miss Norah Nicholas.

On Friday took place one of the excellent performances of Bach's "Christmas" Oratorio, which are now being given at St. Anne's Church, Soho. This church has always been famous for its unswerving devotion to Bach's music, and many fine performances of his cantatas and oratorios have been given there. The length of the "Christmas" Oratorio precluded the possibility of performing it in its entirety on such an occasion, so it was wisely decided to give three performances of the first three parts before Christmas, and to reserve the last three parts for the new year. The music is really admirably sung, both soloists and choir being far above the average, while an excellent little orchestra played the accompaniments. Performances of the "Christmas" Oratorio in London are only too few, and the opportunity of hearing it was, therefore, all the more welcome.

727 Emma Spreckels Building,
San Francisco, December 14, 1901.

SAN FRANCISCO is putting on her prettiest behavior for the holidays, and sunshine and balmy weather are our daily portion, for which those who are deep in the mysteries of Christmas shopping are very thankful. Not that it is at all unusual for us to have beautiful weather at holiday time, for I have known it to be so warm that a white lawn house dress was none to cool at New Year's. The weather is in strong contrast, however, to that we had during the grand opera season, when more often than not it was storming so that many of the fine gowns that were not protected by rain coats and had not a friendly carriage to protect them were badly draggled and all but spoiled. The afternmath of the opera season is strongly demonstrated in a decided indisposition on the part of many to part with any more of the money that a week ago was as free as water.

But so it goes. It is the unfamiliar that attracts and anything foreign will be greeted by a full house and well supported by subscription if need be, while local talent of the highest order often groans over rows of empty seats and the amount of paper necessary to insure even a decent showing which must be had for respectability's sake. Yet the symphony movement goes hopefully on in the face of previous disaster and flat failure. This brings one to the first symphony concert of the season, given by the new Symphony Club under the old name. It was given in the Grand Opera House yesterday (Friday) afternoon, to a fair house, considering the size of the theatre, and the fact that people have not had a fair chance to get over the inroads made by the too recent opera season. There was, however, no lack of enthusiasm, and the program went off very well, though the spark of musical vitality was lacking very noticeably in all the numbers but the Moszkowski "Spanische," which went so well it had to be repeated to satisfy the enthusiasm that greeted its first performance. The beautiful Raff symphony, "Im Wald," went off with good rhythm and correct phrasing, but there was nothing to enthuse one in its performance. The thundering hoofs of the Jagers' horses did not excite one in the least, as it did under Fritz Scheel's baton, and Steindorff impressed one more for the correctness of his time than for his musical energy. Perhaps it is too early to criticise, though I have been given to understand that the fifty musicians who comprise the orchestra have been practicing together for some weeks past, and they are the best we have, but many of them played under Scheel, and the work would naturally take care of itself to some extent. Perhaps another concert will develop new and unexpected resources in the leader, this being his first experience, and there may prove to be a wisdom in the choice of symphony leader not apparent at this stage of the work. Another concert is to be given in January, and that will tell the tale more decidedly than the first. Steindorff is a man who is well liked and has done remarkably well with the Tivoli Grand Opera season, but one feels in his leading the impression of absolute correctness and metronome certainty, without one particle of the fire that transmits itself, not alone to the orchestra, but to the audience as well—the magnetism that goes out to the performers and permits a really great leader to use any number of men as one instrument upon which he himself is performing. However, everything must have a beginning, and another concert may have another tale to tell.

The Saturday Club of Sacramento gave their 116th recital on December 7 in the Assembly Chamber of the State Capitol, to a large and enthusiastic audience. As it was "Artists' day," the Minetti Sextet had been engaged to give the program and the result was most gratifying, the Record-Union of that place speaking of the entertainment as "the greatest treat enjoyed in Sacramento for a long time." The program was happily chosen and consisted of a String Quintet in G minor by Mozart, a String Quartet by Mendelssohn, one by Bach and the lovely "Souvenir de Florence" of Moszkowski. The members of the quintet are G. Minetti, first violin; S. Savannah, second violin; L. Kowalski, first viola; C. Trainor, second viola; A. Weiss, first violoncello, and Wm. Wertsch, second violoncello, all of San Francisco.

The second of the Pasmore concerts took place in the Maple Room of the Palace Hotel on Tuesday evening and was attended by so large an audience that a larger hall is contemplated for the next. These concerts are proving very popular, and the programs are of a quality that makes one wish for a repetition of their good things. The Pasmore children acquitted themselves of their numbers, the "Petite Suite" by Mr. Pasmore, and some Hungarian dances by Brahms, arranged by Mr. Pasmore for the trio, in their usual artistic style. The playing of these children gives the listener the most gratifying sense of enjoyment and their improvement is markedly noticeable every time they appear in public. The violin solo of Mary, taken from Godard's "Concerto Romantique," was the best thing she has been heard in so far, and Dorothy, the youngest of the trio, whose 'cello is almost as large as she is, played two Mendelssohn songs with wonderfully warm tone and fine expression. Miss Adelaide Birchler, one of Mr. Pasmore's advanced pupils, sang several numbers in a contralto voice of rare quality and with exceedingly artistic phrasing. I have not heard her before in a year and the improvement she has made in that time is surprising, the voice having rounded out and developed in strength and the interpretation becoming more mature and finished. The quality was always there and I have looked for something unusual from the possessor of so fine an organ. Two of Miss Birchler's numbers were songs from the pen of a local writer, Arthur Fickenscher, whose works have of late attracted not a little attention, and two of whose compositions are to be brought out by Schumann-Heink in the near future. Liza Lehmann's setting of "In a Persian Garden" was given with fine effect by Mesdames Gardner and Basford and Messrs. Nowlan and Pasmore, accompanied by Fred Maurer. In the trios Susan Pasmore, the pianist of the three children, accompanied the instruments in a style that any older pianist might have been proud of. Her improvement keeps pace with that of her sisters who play the strings, and the difficulties in the piano parts were overcome with an ease born of constant and intelligent practice. The future of these children will be something to follow with interest, as it will probably be one far out of the ordinary lines.

Miss Logan Tooley, a pupil of Alyce Gates, the dramatic soprano, not many years ago well known in the musical circles of New York city, sang at the entertainment given in behalf of the Episcopal Old Ladies' Home, at the Maple Room of the Palace Hotel, and made a great impression with her fine contralto voice and her very artistic manner of using it. Miss Tooley is one of our rising vocalists, and is studying with the operatic stage in view. It will probably not be long before she is heard in the musical centres of the East.

The new managerial firm, Bouvier & Greenbaum, announce for attractions in the early part of the year Mme. Lillian Nordica in song recitals early in February and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra also in February. There will be with the orchestra eminent soloists—the Dutch violinist, Jan van Oordt; Franz Wagner, the 'cellist, and Mme. Ragna Linné, the Scandinavian soprano.

Emlyn Lewys, late of the Virgil Piano School, of London, where he was principal, gave a lecture on "Scientific Piano Study" in the Knabe parlor of Kohler & Chase on Thursday afternoon, in which he was assisted by Miss Mary Carrington at the piano. A large audience was present, and both lecturer and pianist were cordially received by the audience. After the holidays, which Mr. and Mrs. Lewys (Mme. Abbie Carrington) and Miss Mary Carrington will spend in Pasadena as the guests of Mr. and Mrs. Walter Raymond, Mr. and Mrs. Lewys will be at home to their friends as usual on Tuesday, December 31, at 1712 Bush street. It is the intention of Mr. Lewys to give a series of lectures early in the new year, the subject being "Scientific Piano Study," which will be followed by short recitals on the piano by Miss Carrington.

Hugo Mansfeldt opens his professional work by a piano recital in San José on next Tuesday evening, and in this city on the evening of the 19th. Mr. Mansfeldt will be assisted in the latter by Mrs. Oscar Mansfeldt, who will take the second piano part in the concertos. As Mr. Mansfeldt is very popular here the recital will doubtless draw out some of our best people, and he will play to a large house. It will be Mr. Mansfeldt's first appearance since his return from Berlin, where he has spent the past year, having but recently returned.

This afternoon saw the dedication of the new Lisser Music Hall at Mills College. A large number of people went from here to attend the exercises, in which Mr. Lisser himself favored the assemblage with a duo for piano and violin, rendered by himself and Minetti, the violinist, the number being a Raff Sonata. Addresses were made by Mrs. Mills, Prof. Thomas Bacon, of the University of California, and the Hon. Horace Davis, former president of the same university. There were songs by Mrs. Edward Schneider, the vocal teacher of Mills College and the choral class.

Mme. Abbie Carrington is to sing at the Mills Lecture to-morrow night "I Will Extol Thee," from "Eli," and Massenet's "Childhood," which she is said to sing very beautifully. Madame Carrington is a newcomer, but is fast winning her way to public favor, having been enthusiastically received wherever she has appeared. Madame Carrington was not long since identified with the companies of Minnie Hauk and Marie Roze, alternating with them in prima donna parts. She comes to San Francisco with the intention of making this her future home, having retired from operatic life for good.

Next week Tuesday we are to have the Loring Club in their Christmas program, which promises to be of more than the ordinary interest. "King Olaf's Christmas," which won so great favor at the last concert, is to be repeated by universal request. Mrs. J. E. Birmingham will be the soloist.

Mrs. A. Wedmore Jones.

Broad Street Conservatory.—A few of the professors of the Broad Street Conservatory of Music gave an interesting recital in the concert hall of the conservatory, 1329 and 1331 South Broad street, Philadelphia, on Wednesday evening, December 18, in the presence of a large and appreciative audience. The program, which was one of marked musical value, opened with Rubinstein's Sonata for piano and violin, which was admirably played by Stanley Addicks and John Witzmann. Mr. Olmsted, one of the vocal teachers of the conservatory, who has a fine baritone voice, was heard in a group of songs rendered in a very pleasing manner. Mr. Addicks, the piano soloist, played his numbers most satisfactorily, as he possesses ample technic and a beautiful touch.

Lecture on the Bayreuth Festivals.—Mrs. Charles W. Rhodes will give after the new year her illustrated lecture on "Recollections of the Wagner Festivals at Bayreuth." Adolph Glose, pianist, will assist Mrs. Rhodes at the piano.

The Schubert Chorus, of Cleveland and Akron, Ohio, is under the direction of Mrs. Mary Arend-Long.

The Schubert Symphony Club, one of the musical organizations that visits the West, was in Anaconda, Mon., recently.

The first concert by the Philharmonic String Quartet was given at Association Hall, Cleveland, Ohio, on December 10.

The first concert of the Beethoven Club for this winter was given on December 4 at Pilgrim Congregational Church, Duluth, Minn.

At the last regular afternoon concert of the Fortnightly Club, Cleveland, Ohio, they were assisted by the Philharmonic String Quartet.

The concert of the Philharmonic Society, at Liederkranz Hall, Louisville, Ky., on December 11, was the last but one of the 1901 series.

"The Messiah" was sung by the Galesburg (Ill.) Musical Union at their concert on December 6. William F. Bentley was the conductor.

The Rubinstein Club, of eighty women's voices, announces the first of its series of two concerts for the evening of January 16, at Cleveland, Ohio.

The first concert of the Cleveland (Ohio) Vocal Society was given in the Chamber of Commerce Hall December 12 to their honorary members.

The Choral Club, of Troy, N. Y., will produce "The Creation" on March 12. As it is fourteen years since an oratorio has been produced in that city much interest is felt.

The Spokane (Wash.) Oratorio Society has just given "The Messiah," with Miss Laura Mueller, Mrs. A. A. Kraft, Charles F. Orr and W. I. Hall as soloists and a chorus of 125 voices.

At Cedar Rapids, Ia., on December 3 "An Evening with Modern Composers and Original Composition" was given by Carolme Dutton Rowley, assisted by Mrs. Frank Watson and Mrs. Lewis Benedict.

The Friday Musicale met at the home of E. Raphael, [illegible], recently. Brahms was the topic of the [illegible] musical numbers were all enjoyed vastly, [illegible] Robertson read a paper on Brahms as a song writer.

Much interest was shown in the recent production of "The Creation" by the Haverhill (Mass.) Society, on December 3. The soloists were Mme. M. Hissem De Moss, soprano, who took the place of Mme. Charlotte Maconda, originally engaged for the soprano parts; Hobart Smock and Arthur Beresford. The society will give its second concert March 25. The work to be presented is Max Bruch's cantata, "Arminius." The society will be assisted by Madame Schumann-Heink, Evan Williams and Gwilym Miles.

Beethoven was the subject of the Woman's Club recital at Burlington, Ia., on December 3, and Linder's Hall was filled with an enthusiastic audience. About forty people came in after the first number was given, and these missed the gem of the program, a paper on the life of the great composer, by Mrs. A. M. Antrobus.

The Houston (Tex.) Symphony Club has just celebrated its first anniversary at the residence of Charles Grumbach, who is one of its few honorary members. Officers recently elected are: President, Frank L. Miller; vice-president, S. T. Swinford, Jr.; secretary, Arthur Skelly; treasurer, Sam Fant; librarian, Harry Swinford; musical director, Prof. E. Lindenberg.

Haydn and Tschaikowsky were the composers whose works were presented at the regular meeting of the Ladies Thursday Musicale, in Minneapolis, Minn., on December 5. The biographical sketches and analysis of their works given by Mrs. W. B. Chamberlain, in place of the regular musical notes, were a pleasant introduction to the program. Two selections were omitted on account of illness. The Haydn compositions were given by Misses Eulalie Chenevert, Zaidee Eaton, Esther Osborn and Mrs. Cleaone Daniels Bregren. Miss Cordelia Paine and Miss Ednah Hall furnished the Tschaikowsky numbers. Miss Gertrude Sans Souci, a new member, filled one of the omitted numbers delightfully with Moszkowski's Waltz. The guest of the morning was Miss Lindsley, of Chicago. Miss Lindsley sang three numbers.

The successful organization of the Woman's Choral Club at Houston, Tex., has been most gratifying from every point of view. The active membership, which is limited to forty, was very quickly filled, and the membership committee holds a flatteringly long list of names of those waiting for vacancies. Here follows the list of active members: Mesdames E. A. Peden, Van Vleck, J. W. Maxcy, H. F. MacGregor, Huber, Baltis Allen, C. W. Welch, Harris Masterson, E. A. Hudson, E. P. Davis, E. B. Mendelssohn Trio Club Concert.

THE Mendelssohn Trio Club, organized this autumn, gave the first of a series of four concerts last Tuesday afternoon (December 17) in the ballroom of the Hotel Majestic. As THE MUSICAL COURIER has before stated, the more good chamber music concerts given the better for music and artists. The personnel of this new club includes Alexander Saslavsky, violinist; Victor Sörlin, 'cellist, and Charles Gilbert Sproass, pianist. All three are young men and musicians of lofty aims. Albert Quesnel, tenor, assisted the club at the first concert. The club played the Mendelssohn Trio in C minor, op. 66, and the Gade Trio in F major, op. 42, two works with strong contrasts. A warm musical tone marks the ensemble of these earnest young artists. Individually each one produces a good tone and therefore the concerted playing proved very enjoyable. The interpretation, too, was delightful. As this new club becomes better known it will be in demand by private societies and for house musicales.

Mr. Quesnel, a singer with a rarely beautiful tenor voice, and one moreover who knows how to use his voice, sang the "Romanza" from "La Giaconda" and a sentimental song, "The Wildflower," by Leoni. He was enthusiastically recalled, and finally sang again, this time a dainty little gem entitled "Jeanne," by Mr. Sprouss, the pianist of the afternoon. Mr. Saslavsky played as a violin solo the Romance from Wieniawski's Second Violin Concerto, and he showed in his modest performance the results of excellent schooling. The piano accompaniments played by Mr. Sproass were discreet and withal very musical.

Considering that it was the last week of the Christmas shopping excitement a good sized audience enjoyed the concert. The next concert in the series will be given Tuesday afternoon, January 7.

People's Symphony Concerts.

THE second of the series of the People's Symphony concerts, which were opened so auspiciously on December 13 at Cooper Union Hall, will be given at the same place on Friday evening, January 17, 1902, and the sales of seats continue at Ditson's music store, 867 Broadway, and at the offices of the People's Institute in Cooper Union, of the University Settlement at Rivington and Eldridge streets, and of the University Extension at 244 West Fourteenth street. It is agreeable to note that the audience at the first concert of the series was one of the largest and most enthusiastic, and the managers are more than ever confident of the wide interest which the concerts are arousing among those for whose educational welfare they have been undertaken. There is every indication of the continuation of large audiences at the remaining four concerts of the series. The prices of admission have been placed at a figure within the reach of all, being from 10 to 50 cents for single concerts, and from 25 cents to $1.50 for season tickets. By this it will be seen that it is possible to hear one of these very attractive concerts for as small a sum as 5 cents.

VIENNA, DECEMBER 2, 1901.

THE Viennese public, momentarily electrified by Paderewski's meteoric passage, have settled down to a somewhat slower measure, and fallen back contentedly enough to the enjoyment of lesser concerts and other amusements.

The first of the Rosé Quartet concerts took place in Kleiner Musikverein Saal before a refined and appreciative, one may add well dressed, audience, on Tuesday, November 26. The numbers on the program were from Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. The personnel of the quartet has been somewhat changed, and the following are the present members: Arnold Rosé, Albert Bachrich, Anton Rusitka and Friederich Buxbaum. On Wednesday, November 27, Henryk Melcer, the Polish composer and pianist, gave a recital in the smaller of the two Verein halls. He played admirably, but surely not inspiringly. His pedaling, shading, touches are all excellent, and he made the best of his task with the meagre Bösendorfer grand. The first movement of the Chopin B flat minor Sonata was to some extent dramatically given; the first movement of the Schumann Fantasia with musicianly understanding and force. But there seemed to be an indefinable lack of climax in all the numbers, and this was especially noticeable in the Adagio of the Beethoven sonata ("Moonlight"). Pianos and fortes well calculated, yet the whole, as it were, impassive, without real crescendo or movement. It may be a matter of taste and Mr. Melcer may be right. Still we find it hard to forgive him for his entire absence of cantabile in the lovely Allegretto which follows the first movement. Two Sinding pieces were remarkably well played, an Impromptu and a Scherzo, but the G flat major Etude of Moszkowski, notwithstanding Melcer's truly virtuoso technic, actually went badly. The Liszt Rhapsodie, No. 15, made little impression. And why should such a composition ever be played on an unoffending piano? In our opinion there is no instrument made equal to the demands of the work. Mr. Melcer is at present busy with an opera on a historical subject.

The Bohemian String Quartet—Carl Hoffmann, Josef Suk, Oskar Nebdal and Hans Wihan—were in Vienna on Friday, November 29. They played the Schumann A major, a new Taneiew Quartet in A minor, and with the assistance of the English pianist, Katharine Goodson, the Tschaikowsky Trio, op. 50—"Dem Andenken eines grossen Künstlers." The Taneiew number, dedicated to the Bohemians, was played with a conviction and fervor which seemed adequate to convey even on first hearing the somewhat obscure meaning of the composer. The Adagio especially was given with a warmth which very evidently communicated itself to the audience. Enough cannot be said in praise of the interpretation of the Schumann quartet. The slow movement was rendered with a serenity and repose well calculated to bring out the indescribable beauties of this admirable Adagio, and almost unexpected in the Bohemians, whose fiery attack of the Allegro made a contrast all the more impressive. The artists, for each one of the four deserves the title, were enthusiastically applauded, and well they may always be; for they are of those who conceive music as a language and understand the difficult art not only of singing but also of speaking with their instruments.

Miss Katharine Goodson is indubitably endowed with much temperament, a good mechanism and a fine sense of rhythm and color. Her delivery of a melody reveals genuine musical and dramatic feeling. Yet, while we cannot but admire her clean and vigorous playing, we must disagree with the learned critic of the Zeit when he qualifies her technic as eminent. If the truth were told, there are many who succeed in bringing out fortes and many who fail in pianos and pianissimos—some through lack of absolute finger control, others through a misconception of values. Which of these is Miss Goodson's case? In general, the piano part of a trio, even a modern trio, should not, we feel, assume the predominance belonging to the solo voice of a composition for piano and orchestra, and accompanying passages lose their charm and meaning if forced into a role entirely foreign to their nature.

Miss Goodson, who comes here heralded by the most flattering accounts of her playing in London, Paris, Berlin, Brussels and other large cities, will afford Vienna the opportunity of judging of her versatility on December 16, when she gives a recital in Bösendorfer Saal.

The third Symphony concert was eagerly anticipated by the patrons of the Philharmoniker, who were to hear for the first time the E minor Concerto by Emil Sauer. On December 1, as early as 12 o'clock, the Grosse Musikverein Saal was rapidly filling and wore that festive air which seems to hang about the Viennese, their concert halls and all their undertakings. The E flat Mozart Symphony, the first number on the program, was greeted with tempestuous applause, and certainly it was well played. Helmesberger, it is true, occupied the director's platform and made divers and sundry movements with the director's baton, but the excellence of the performance was due entirely, we think, to the players themselves. The Sauer Concerto made a brilliant effect, but it was rather due to the virtuosity of the composer's playing than to the excellence of the work. It is true there are in it some dramatic moments. The Scherzo, and especially its Trio, is not without charm; the Cavatina is pleasing, and the Rondo, the principal theme of which is a transposition of the Cavatina melody, is effective. But, as far as can be judged from one hearing, there does not seem to be any particular reason why this new concerto should have been added to the long list already existing. There does not, either, seem to be any special purpose in the charlatan mannerisms that distract from and obscure the intentions of even so great a virtuoso as Emil Sauer. It is a pity that the Bösendorfer grand is so popular in Vienna. Sensitive and refined it may be, but its volume is totally inadequate for the purposes of modern virtuosity.

The interest of the Leschetizky circle at present centres on a volume of the great pedagogue's reminiscences, which will soon find its way to America. The book was written by the Comtesse Potocka, sister-in-law to Leschetizky, and will, no doubt, find favor with the musical world on account of its numerous incidents connected with many of the virtuosi and eminent musicians of the last three-fourths of a century. The gifted author comes from one of the most ancient lines of the Polish aristocracy, and is not only a talented writer, but a musician and painter of no small ability. The intimacy existing for generations between the families of Potocka and Leschetizky, and daily intercourse for many years with the master himself, have admirably fitted the Comtesse Angela for the work she has undertaken. The book treats of Leschetizky's private life, of his singular career, so full of dramatic and romantic incidents; of his relations with distinguished men holding public office in Germany, Russia and Austria; of his personal acquaintance with Wagner, Liszt, Strauss, Rubinstein and a host of artists. It treats also of his virtues and his faults; of his views on progress, art, religion, and in general of the man and musician from a truly many-sided standpoint.

The Wagner cyclus is again on the bills: December 1, "Rienzi"; December 3, "Flying Dutchman," and so on to the end, with at least one merciful day's interval between each performance to give artists and audience a moment's rest and respite. Winkelmann will probably, as usual, take many parts; some that he can still, more that he can no longer play, and he will no doubt receive his wonted curtain recalls.

The most interesting events announced for the near future are: The Joachim Quartet concerts, on December 5, 6, 7, 9; Sauer's recital on December 11; the Bohemian strings again on December 13 for the celebration of Dvorák's sixtieth birthday; the Soldat-Röger Quartet on December 21, and Eugen d'Albert's concert on January 11.

G. S. L.

MISS MARTHA HOFACKER IN STRASSBURG.—The Strassburg Post, of November 29, has the following criticism about Miss Hofacker's Agathe in the "Freischütz": Miss Hofacker, from the beginning of the season having introduced herself so favorably, made a real hit with her well prepared Agathe. The great aria, "Wie nahte mir," was admirably suited to her beautiful, strong, youthful and highly cultivated voice, and gave her a great opportunity to prove her many artistic capabilities. The ever increasing tenderness in the lovely prayer "Leise, Leise," the carefully measured beautiful crescendo in the recitative "Doch wie, täuscht mich nicht," and the jubilant "All meine Pulse" gave a perfect picture of delightful and delicate shading. The musical and artistic certainty of which Miss Hofacker is mistress gives to the listener a feeling of absolute pleasure. He is led to expect new beauties in attack, tone production and thoughtful phrasing.

"BEN HUR" WITH MUSICAL ILLUSTRATIONS.—Miss Saidee Vere Milne gave readings from "Ben Hur" at the Waldorf-Astoria Monday evening, December 16, for the benefit of the Ladies' Helping Hand Association, of 416 West Fifty-fourth street. Miss Milne read, or rather recited, the most dramatic scenes of Wallace's popular book and play, and the dramatic parts were finely enhanced with piano illustrations, played by Mrs. Hadden-Alexander. "The Chariot Race" was skillfully enacted, and the closing scenes, "On the Doorstep," "Mount Olivet" and "Palm Branches," proved very touching, as they almost must when well read or acted.

WATKIN MILLS.—The Birmingham (England) Post of the 6th inst., just to hand, has the following to say of the distinguished basso's interpretation of Mephistopheles in Berlioz's "Faust," given there by the Choral Society on the 5th inst.:

The Mephistopheles of Watkin Mills was admirable. His voice has weight, and he can give it a hard, mocking tone that exactly suits the character. He was dramatic, too, without overstepping the line that divides cynical humor from buffoonery. The various recitatives and dialogue passage were invariably well given, the "Song of the Flea" was a vocal triumph, as was the Serenade, and the Evocation, "Ye Spirits of Inconstant Fire," was grandly given. Impressive was Mr. Mills' part in the ghastly final scene, and in the dialogue with the princes of darkness the recitative was given with an elocutionary power that was impressive.

VOORHIS-KALTENBORN IN JERSEY CITY.

ARTHUR Voorhis, the pianist, assisted by the Kaltenborn String Quartet, gave the first of a series of three concerts last Tuesday (December 17) night at the Jersey City Club. A large number of women prominent in New York and Jersey City society have lent their names as patrons of the concerts, and thus financially, as well as socially and musically, the series will prove very successful. There is truly nothing more encouraging in the advancement of classic music than these chamber music concerts. The more of this character of music heard the better. Mr. Voorhis and the Kaltenborns played a delightful program of classic, romantic and modern composers. Mr. Kaltenborn and his associate string players performed the Haydn Quartet, No. 1, op. 77; a Scherzo by Cherubini, and the Variations of "Death and the Maiden," by Schubert. As piano solos Mr. Voorhis played a Barcarolle by Moszkowski and Liszt's Tarantella, "Venezia a Napoli." As violin solos Mr. Kaltenborn played a Romance by Rubinstein and Hungarian dances by Hubay. Both Mr. Voorhis and Mr. Kaltenborn in their solos were heard with evident pleasure and at the conclusion were heartily applauded. The concert closed with a beautiful performance of the Schumann Quintet, op. 44, a great favorite with all lovers of good music. The same quintet was played by the same artists at one of the concerts in the St. Nicholas Garden last summer.

The patrons of the Voorhis concerts in Jersey City are Mrs. E. Bailey, Mrs. John Bain, Jr., Mrs. Hudspeth-Benson, Mrs. George H. Blake, Mrs. Cornelius Brett, Mrs. Elliot L. Butler, Mrs. O. S. Carré, Mrs. Frank Cavalli, Miss E. O. Conro, Mrs. E. H. Davey, Mrs. Joseph A. Dear, Mrs. Gordon K. Dickinson, Mrs. William A. Durrie, Jr., Mrs. James S. Erwin, Mrs. Garwood Ferris, Mrs. James F. MINNE HUMPHRYES.—The review of music in Brooklyn for this week includes a report of the concert given by Mrs. Minne Humphryes at the Greenwood Baptist Church, Tuesday evening, December 10. All of the Brooklyn papers published reports of this concert, and accorded to Mrs. Humphryes the praise which she justly earned. We add paragraphs from three papers as follows:

An appreciative audience listened last night to the concert given under the direction of Mrs. Minne Humphryes, in Greenwood Baptist Church, corner Seventh avenue and Sixth street. The proceeds of the concert, and they reached a substantial sum, will be devoted to the building fund of the church.

Mrs. Humphryes is a favorite in Brooklyn musical circles, and she added new laurels to her already enviable reputation last night by her masterly rendering of Bellini's aria, "Qui la Voce," "I Puritani."—Brooklyn Citizen.

[illegible] last night for the benefit of the Greenwood [illegible], on Seventh avenue and Sixth street, under the direction of Mrs. Minne Humphryes, proved a complete success. The congregation turned out in full force, and the quality of the entertainment fully justified the large attendance.—Standard-Union.

The first concert in the new Greenwood Baptist Church was given last evening for the benefit of the building fund, and was well attended. The artist for the occasion was Mrs. Minne Humphryes, the well-known oratorio soprano, ably assisted by Miss Henriette Weber, pianist and accompanist; McCall Lanham, baritone, and Charles Russell, 'cello. Mrs. Humphryes' selections were well chosen and rendered in her usual finished manner. Bellini's aria, "Qui la Voce," from "I Puritani," and Bartlett's "Come to Me, Sweetheart," showed the flexibility and breadth of a well trained voice nicely under control, and were effectively sung. "Violets," by Wright, a sweet little song, was sung with much expression and suavity.—Brooklyn Eagle, December 11, 1901.

Jessie Shay.

MISS JESSIE SHAY, the piano soloist at the Kubelik concerts, receives her share of favorable comments. We add criticisms from several cities:

Miss Jessie Shay was the piano soloist last evening. She has a good touch, musical intelligence and a pleasing stage presence. She played Moszkowski's descriptive "Etincelles" with daintiness and finish and an etude of Schloezer with grace. Liszt's Rhapsodie No. 12 was played by Miss Shay with technical accuracy and brilliancy.—New Haven (Conn.) Evening Register, December 11, 1901.

Miss Jessie Shay played the familiar Liszt Rhapsodie No. 12.

It has been done many times before. She showed a clear comprehension of the marvelous bit of composition, and her playing was a delight. She is a splendid foil to the wonderful young Bohemian—not because her technic is less studied, but because her mere presence is a relief from the tremendous nervous strain that Kubelik brings upon his hearers.

After all, it was the performance of two children. Two children who have been given by the favoring Fates the marvelous power of interpretation. Kubelik is a fiend incarnate—playing upon one's sympathies and nerves with a mere instrument upon which some folks play Virginia reels. Miss Shay has the delicacy of the high-strung musician, coupled with the sweetness of a woman. The combination is remarkable for more reasons than one.

Kubelik is the refinement of Fritz Kreisler.

Miss Shay is the refinement of Aus der Ohe and Harold Bauer.

Together they are wonderful.—Springfield (Mass.) Union, December 12, 1901.

The violinist was assisted by Miss Jessie Shay, a young American pianist, who played with neatness and not a little grace Moszkowski's "Etincelles" and a concert etude by Schloezer, which showed a facile technic. Her playing had many excellent qualities, and was justly complimented with an encore, in response to which she played a brilliant etude in repeated notes with skill and finish.—The Republican, Springfield, Mass., December 12, 1901.

Miss Jessie Shay, a very talented pianist, whose prominence in New York is well known, gave for her portion of the concert some delightful numbers, which displayed her beautiful and artistic touch in a most pleasing manner. Miss Shay substituted for her first selection "Rigaudon," by Raff, playing Moszkowski's "Etincelles" for the second selection. Her rendition of the famous Liszt Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 12 was very artistic and her virility in execution was most praiseworthy.—Hartford Post, December 13, 1901.

The assisting artist was Miss Jessie Shay, who repeated the favorable impression created when heard here a week ago. She played compositions by Moszkowski, Schloesser and a Hungarian Rhapsodie by Liszt. Her performance of the latter number was especially agreeable.—Boston Globe, December 15, 1901.

The only assisting artist was the pianist, Miss Shay, who first gave with pretty deftness and bright clarity Moszkowski's "Etincelles" and a concert study, much in the same genre, by Schloesser.—Herald, Boston, December 15, 1901.

Miss Shay played in a graceful, easy fashion, and her performance of the Liszt Rhapsodie was so highly pleasing to the audience that she added another number.—Boston Post, December 15, 1901.

Miss Shay again showed a crisp and brilliant technic.—Boston Journal, December 15, 1901.

Herr Kubelik was admirably assisted in the program by Miss Jessie Shay, whose piano solos were those of a finished musician. Added to the attraction of her music Miss Shay is of so delicate a type of womanhood and was so daintily gowned in white, with a great knot of violets at her breast, as to win the hearts of those who saw her.—The Sun, Baltimore, December 17, 1901.

Miss Jessie Shay had been advertised little, but she did her part more than creditably. Her stage presence was modest and graceful, and the lack of a managerial halo did not prevent the audience from liking her and her playing.—Baltimore News, December 17, 1901.

Miss Shay played Raff's "Rigaudon," which displayed her marvelous technic to excellent advantage, and Moszkowski's beautiful "Etincelles." For her concluding number she gave Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise No. 12. In the lighter passages the pianist was very effective. Her execution was beyond criticism.—Washington Times, December 18, 1901.

Miss Shay played her selections with dash and brilliancy.—New York Press, December 19, 1901.

Georg Liebling's Violin Sonata.

THIS decidedly beautiful work, of which Otto Floersheim wrote last May such an interesting and favorable article in THE MUSICAL COURIER, was played lately in Warsaw, Munich, Berlin, all over England, and on November 25 last for the first time in London at Bechstein Hall by Carl Flesch and Georg Liebling. The sonata pleased immensely. It is one of the rare works which from first to last are full of inspiration. It is extremely melodious, effective, beautifully harmonized—and short. It ought to take in America. We understand from the London publishers, Messrs. Aschenberg, that Schirmer (New York), their agents, have copies in stock. At the same concert Georg Liebling scored another triumph with his Caprice, op. 45, for piano, which is dedicated to Jedliczka in Berlin, and published by A. Stahl, Berlin.

H. W. Greene's Christmas Criticism Class.

THERE is always some definite thought discussed at and carried away from Mr. Greene's classes. Thursday it was the normality of singing as a mode of expression. Before an audience which taxed the seating arrangements of Mr. Greene's ample studio Mr. Greene gave his solution of the question, which was that singing as a mode of expression was not normal when that word means "ordinary" or "average," but that it was normal when that word means "natural" and signifies that which is part of our human endowment. Singing is speech carried to a more exalted emotional plane. That emotional plane is normal, hence singing is normal; for if the cause be so then the result cannot be otherwise.

The following program was given to illustrate this point, as well as other minor ones of tone and interpretation:

Violets ..... White
Butterflies .....
Miss Bessie Hoople.
Love Me If I Live ..... Hahn
Miss Ella Benner.
Arabian Song ..... Max Vogrich
Miss Julia Fackler.
Blanche ..... Kucken
Miss Ruth Wood.
Nativity (Tenor Recitative) ..... Stewart
Claud Selby.
Nativity (My Soul Doth Magnify) ..... Stewart
Miss Cecile Stollberg.
Thou'rt Like Unto a Tender Flower ..... Arthur Farwell
Robert Bruce Pegram.

The improvement in the voices was marked and in one or two cases a delight. Watching the development of the voice gives the same pleasure that the unfolding of a flower does. The subtlety of the process is fascinating.

PREMIERE OF "CHOPIN."

AT the Teatro Lirico Internazionale, of Signor Edoardo Sonzogno, assembled last Monday evening, November 25, the largest audience of the season thus far, to greet and welcome the new opera "Chopin," so long expected. The première of this work attracted an audience immense in numbers, anxiously expectant and curious in complexion, yet cool, discriminating in judgment; fully prepared to receive, but not so ready to believe; an audience at once passive, neutral, negative to a certain extent and critical to a degree. As the opera advanced, however, all this changed, and the public grew warm and enthusiastic long before the close.

The opera "Chopin" is in four acts, and composed by Giacomo Orefici, based upon original music of Frederic Chopin; the story or libretto is written in beautiful verse by Angiolo Orvieto.

To be perfectly frank and candid about this new opera of Chopin's music—I must say that I prefer the music as written by Chopin for the piano. While Chopin's music is singable—indeed very singable—extremely melodious and harmonious, it is more pianistic (to my mind) than it is vocal—not a melody with piano music, but a melody in the piano music—so essentially and peculiarly a part of the piano itself that it cannot be separated from that instrument and be distributed among instruments of different character and color, without being injured and losing its natural, its peculiar charm; this I venture to say from the viewpoints of both singer and pianist.

Chopin's delicate fancies, thoughts and sentiments were all expressed by means of the piano—not by sounds of the human, living voice. Schubert, I should say, found expression more natural through the singing voice, and used it as his exponent, as the vehicle for conveying his feelings, warm and sympathetic.

Many times have I thought that I should be glad to find some of Chopin's lovely melodies, with words underlying, that might be used in song, and at last I was delighted to know that there was to be a text, as well as a pretext, for singing "Chopin."

But after hearing the opera twice I return a second time to my first conviction, namely, that Chopin's music has its home in the piano and there breathes its best life.

All his music, so beautiful, sweet, dreamy, meditative; so caressing, insinuating, alluring, suggestive, seductive passionate; so melancholy, sentimental, romantic, heroic pathetic, poetic and fascinating; exquisite, ravishingly beautiful music of Chopin—call it anything and everything your liking or imagination may picture—but not vocally dramatic, operatic or theatrical!

Nor was Chopin's personality one to lend itself to stage heroism. His character was too modest and retiring—his life too dainty and fastidious. He would shun and shrink from the dazzling, glaring sunlight of publicity and notoriety into the twilight—the shaded lamp and subdued light of privacy and intimate friendship.

Even so his music recoils from the staring, public, promiscuous gaze and treatment over the footlights of the theatre, fleeing to a haven of safety behind the silken folds of my lady fair at the piano, whose dainty, velvety fingers can caress and coax from the ivory keys the marvelous Chopin beauties—this in the natural atmosphere, the perfume of flowers, toned and subdued, softened light and fashionable company; or rather the society of æsthetic, refined, receptive and responsive souls. My instinctive feeling against this sort of thing is strong—bordering on aversion, repugnance—with an undefined idea, or notion perhaps, that it is bad taste; æsthetically wrong and almost a sacrilegious act to thus drag Chopin from where he belongs to where he doesn't.

To make my position, my instinctive feeling against the idea of treating Chopin and his music in this manner more clear, let the reader fancy a drama, entitled, say, "Byron," constructed of Byron's various poems—written on divers occasions, at different times, upon various subjects and for many purposes—all brought together and used to depict a few incidents or an episode in the poet's life; or take Heine or Shelley, using their poems and lyrics for the same purpose and in like manner; or perhaps better still, imagine Shakespeare as a drama of himself—a play in which every expression, every line and phrase, sentences and whole scenes are taken from his "Hamlet," "Much Ado About Nothing," "Romeo and Juliet," "The Tempest," "Midsummer Night's Dream," "King Lear," and from nearly all the great bard had ever written—including his sonnets—all arranged in order to tell a bit of his life story. Would it not be quite natural, I ask, that you should prefer your beloved poets to be let alone and their works to remain integral? However, it is possible that I am unduly sensitive on the subject and that many others will not agree with me.

The fact that the opera "Chopin" is attracting large audiences to the Teatro Lirico does not prove my position wrong in the least—very naturally a new opera would excite expectation and curiosity; that it is all the most beautiful music imaginable I need not emphasize; but the Italians are not a piano playing nation, and therefore not so familiar with Chopin's music as are, for instance, New Yorkers, accustomed to the Vladimir de Pachmann recitals of these charming tone poems. Many, perhaps most of the auditors, do not realize the feast of rich delicacies set before them—a banquet in four great courses of many delicious dishes, all "desserts," as it were—but they listen to the opera more in the sense of its being, simply, a new work of many beauties and without experiencing sentiments of the nature I have endeavored, though somewhat lamely, to describe. Being, therefore, less familiar with the music of Chopin, it follows that they are not so likely to be over or super sensitive about the subject.

That the music, every note of it, is good and beautiful we know. And that Orefici has done his part of the work well is also true. As a musician of talent, of patience and skill he deserves recognition and much credit. His work showed much experience and considerable technical ability, as well as taste in the choice of material.

The story underlying the music of "Chopin" is told by Orvieto in a simple manner, but beautifully and poetically.

Here is the cast of characters and the interpreters:

Federico Chopin.....G. Borgatti (tenor).
Flora.....Cesira Ferrani (soprano).
Stella.....L. Beltrami (soprano).
Elio.....R. Angelini-Fornari (baritone).
Il Frate.....E. Brancaleoni (basso).

Grazia—and other children beloved by Flora—Skaters—Polish country men and women—Fishermen of Majorca, &c.

Conductor.....Giovanni Zuccani.

The first act opens in Chopin's native land at Warsaw in the year 1826 at Christmas-tide; it is a night by moonlight—a wintry scene with snow covered trees and skating.

Chopin, brown haired and curly, is seen there clad in a brown velvet frock coat, with cap and close fitting trousers to match, and high topped boots. His sister Stella and his friend Elio are with him. In the background is seen a chorus of men and women disporting themselves in skating, and later in singing. Chopin already appears afflicted with melancholy and ill health—the beginning of consumption showing itself in slight coughing.

The overture consisted of Polish airs (Mazurka rhythm) found in the Grand Fantaisie, op. 13, and was rather short. The first singing in this scene is by Elio, followed by Chopin, on themes from the Fantaisie, op. 13, and the Sonata in B minor, op. 58, after which the melancholy youth sings the melody of the Nocturne, op. 15, No. 1 (E flat), and then enters the Polacca Fantaisie, op. 61—the same key and movement being maintained—and passes on to the Nocturne, op. 55, No. 2, where he is joined by his friend Elio, taking up the Nocturne, op. 15, No. 1, for a short distance, and then passing to and ending in the Fantaisie, op. 13. Here Chopin sings the Mazurka melodies, op. 56, No. 2; op. 7, No. 3; op. 50, No. 1; again op. 56, No. 2, and op. 7, No. 3; and finishing with op. 41, No. 1. The chorus at this point—skating part of the time—sing in vivace tempo Mazurka, op. 56, No. 2, the composer Orefici here ably combining the imitations among the voices; and above this chorus friend Elio sings to Chopin, using the Mazurka air and passing to Mazurka, op. 6, No. 3. The chorus here dances or skates through the Mazurkas, op. 30, Nos. 2 and 3, singing loudly, and yet louder into Mazurkas, op. 56, No. 2, and op. 41, No. 3; thence to Etude, op. 10, No. 7; Mazurka, op. 41, No. 3; Grand Fantaisie, op. 13; Mazurka, op. 56, No. 2; Mazurka, op. 17, No. 1; Nocturne, op. 15, No. 3; Mazurka, op. 56, No. 2—when Chopin is heard singing softly the Nocturne, op. 9, No. 1, and which then is succeeded, instrumentally, by parts from the Barcarolle, op. 60; the Polacca, op. 44, and the Fantaisie, op. 13, preluding Stella's beginning of a duet with her brother Federico, he joining her on Etudes, Nos. 2 and 3 (from the "Method of Methods"), and continuing together in the exquisite Berceuse, op. 57. Stella then goes on alone in the Etude, op. 25, No. 10, but soon Chopin takes up the melody and passes on to the Prelude, op. 28, No. 21, which he sings to the end. Here he is met by the chorus singing joyously the themes and melodies of the Mazurkas, op. 68, No. 3, and op. 56, No. 1; above which the voice of Chopin is heard sadly. The chorus continues on the "Krakowiak," op. 14, joined by Stella and relieved later by Chopin in the Mazurka, op. 33, No. 4. Chopin continues with Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2, and is joined by his sister Stella on reaching Mazurka, op. 68, No. 3, once more; but after a few steps he is left alone to proceed to Mazurka, op. 6, No. 3, accompanied by the chorus, however. This first act is closed by the chorus with a part of Mazurka, op. 41, No. 3.

After the duet in this act there was much applause, with three curtain calls at the end for the tenor Borgatti.

near Paris, at the villa and gardens of Flora. The scene is one of great charm—a glorious night in the springtime of April, 1837, in the gardens or park surrounding the villa: inside a music room is seen through an open window; without all nature is in blossom, beaming and blooming with delight and loveliness. Here we find Chopin and Flora, Flora's little daughter Grazia and a lot of other children, boys and girls, on whom friend Elio keeps his eye and looks out for their entertainment. Sister Stella has remained in Poland.

To give a close, conscientious account of all the music used in this and the following acts, as I did in the previous one, would, no doubt, be very interesting to many Chopin lovers, but there are other readers who may care less and find themselves bored by it. I shall, therefore, touch more more lightly upon the music source, and not deem it necessary to call attention to every string of Chopin pearls, or to all the precious gems forming this operatic galaxy of charming, graceful and elegant beauties. The act opens with an instrumental prelude formed of measures taken from the First Piano Concerto, op. 11; Scherzo, op. 3; Etude, op. 10, No. 7; Scherzi, op. 54 and op. 39. Elio tells the children (some ten or twelve boys who do the singing, while the girls but look prettily) a story, a legend, on a theme from the Fantasia, op. 49, which melody the children take up and pursue into the Polacca, op. 44. Here Chopin first sings the melody in Polacca, op. 44, and is then joined by Elio in a spirited duet ending in the Mazurka, op. 33, No. 1. Flora, who should be "George Sand" from all we know of her affair with Chopin, at this stage of the story makes her first appearance and is treated symbolically by the author. Her first words, "Chi sa!" attract Chopin's attention, as if they formed a response to his own thinking. She sang with exquisite grace and charm, and with poetic and musical expression the Nocturne, op. 27, No. 2—a song of hope. The children break in here on Scherzo, op. 54, and the Fantasia, op. 49, and Elio relieves them by singing Etude, op. 10, No. 10, and the Impromptu, op. 29. After this we have in the orchestra the Barcarola, op. 60; portions of Scherzo, op. 54; Prelude, op. 45, and Nocturne, op. 27, No. 1, to which latter melody Flora sings of the loveliness and sweetness of the spring night, which is still evening, and in rapturous praise of the music emanating from the villa. Flora, having gone with little Grazia to the garden gate, returns to find that Chopin, always pensive and moody when alone, has entered the house and seated himself at the piano to express his musings and vent his feelings in a tender, dreamy Nocturne (op. 27, No. 1), which we hear played by Signor Franco da Venezia upon a superb Steinway grand piano.

The effect of this, however, fell flat and was absolutely lost upon the vast audience, as were also other beauties allowed to pass unnoticed—not being recognized.

There is a great love duet in this act between Chopin and Flora, sung in genuine Italian style, and this had to be repeated on loud demand of the audience. In fact there are two duets to speak of. During the first or earlier one a bird, a nightingale, is heard singing in the trees. Chopin here has the words:

"Canto di rosignuol, vivido trillo, Anima della notte, * * *"

on the op. 51 Impromptu melody, but the bird just heard had been trilling in the Prelude, No. 1 of op. 28, and this Prelude is then taken up by the lovers, who pass through a part of Mazurka, op. 41, No. 2, after which the orchestra rocks through a short distance of the Barcarola, op. 60, and arrives at the Etude, op. 10, No. 3, where Flora and Chopin later continue their singing together through the Etude. Mazurka, op. 41, No. 2, measures are heard in the orchestra, after which the singers resume their love song and pass through parts of the Polacca Fantasia, op. 61; Mazurka, op. 41, No. 2; Nocturne, op. 9, No. 2; again the Polocca Nocturne, op. 37, No. 2; Ballade, op. 52; Valse, op. 42, and Prelude, op. 28, No. 17, in which they refer to the delicious warbling of the nightingale, the orchestra concluding with Etude, op. 10, No. 3.

These love duets called forth deafening applause at the close of the act, many persons rising in their seats. There were three curtain calls for the happy lovers, Chopin and Flora, and in the fourth call Borgatti and la Ferrani were joined by Conductor Zuccani.

Act III. shows us "una certosa abbandonata" (a forsaken monastery) on the Isle of Majorca, whither Flora has taken Chopin to regain his health; nearby we see the blue water of the expansive lake. A new character is seen in this act—the Frate, brother or friar. In this act a tremendous storm, a black tempest, comes over the lake. The orchestra opens with a prelude, playing the Polacca, op. 22. Voices in the distance are heard singing "Maiorca isola bella," to the music in Ballade, op. 38. The Frate is seen near the certosa digging in the garden, and singing to the melodies in Polacca, op. 22, and the Ballade, op. 38, when Chopin appears upon the scene, sickly looking and weak, indulging in much "Camille-like" coughing. He sings of being "so tired" and he looks it; his under-chin reddish brown hirsute growth and his green-colored jacket add to his paleness of face. He looks troubled and anxious. He sings a great aria here:

"Io sono oppresso da un angoscia muta," being the Ballade, op. 23, followed by Polacca, op. 22, and the Nocturne, op. 15, No. 2—which, however, was received coldly, or rather not at all, as it passed by unknown. The Frate then takes the Ballade melody, op. 38, as his theme, during which Chopin has hallucinations and "sees things." He works himself up into a great state over "those frati" and other things he imagines before him, but is again calmed into singing the Prelude, op. 28, No. 15, and is joined by the Frate through the Ballade, op. 47, when they alternate in the singing of Ballade, op. 38. Chopin then proceeds alone—assisted from time to time by the Frate—singing parts of the Ballades, op. 47 and op. 38; Polacca, op. 26, No. 2; Nocturne, op. 27, No. 1; Prelude, op. 28, No. 24, and again Ballade, op. 38, until he has wrought himself into such a state of agitation, excitement and terror that he falls to the floor, exhausted and helpless; he then has a fit of coughing—leaving him too weak to rise for quite a while. The Frate tries to assist him with the Sonata, op. 4, and appeals to the first movement of Sonata, op. 35, then to the finale of the same sonata for help—but without getting Chopin to his feet. Meanwhile the terrific storm is raging and the orchestral Etude, op. 25, No. 4, has given Chopin enough strength to utter "alas!" (ahimè!) The orchestra continues, playing this time the Allegro Agitato movement of Sonata, op. 35, and the Frate succeeds in urging Chopin to his feet. Shortly after, poor Flora enters sobbing; gazing at each other, they sing in unison—she: "Fritz—ahimè Fritz!" and he: "Flora! o Flora!" upon a theme from Nocturne, op. 62, No. 1, and Chopin, continuing, sings: "But thou weepest? * * * Why? * * *" She answers not. But the chorus of Majorca fishermen and women in their picturesque dress of the isle enter slowly, singing very softly and lento assai, the Prelude, op. 28, No. 6, and bearing the dead body of dear little Grazia, the beloved daughter of Flora, who has fallen a victim to the frightful tempest. Beginning with a grand duet between Flora and Chopin, who are joined later by Elio and the Frate, we have a great ensemble number with the chorus, which is the climax and the finale of this act. With the dead child before them, and the orchestra having played in a slow and very sustained manner parts of the Prelude, op. 28, No. 2, and the Nocturne, op. 62, No. 2, Flora begins Nocturne, op. 48, No. 1,

"Grazia, mia dolce bimba adorata!
Sei morta, fiore della mia vita."

a melodic phrase of four measures, Chopin then singing the next phrase:

"Luce dell' anima, sei dileguata!
L'ombra ci arrolge, cupa, infinita."

After which they continue together this beautiful and touching lament, which soon swells to a quartet and chorus of grand proportions—a finale of stirring, thrilling effect and then dying away in a sotto voce, "Ave, Ave o Grazia," of the chorus on four measures of the op. 51 Impromptu, and an orchestral Adagio movement from the Mazurka, op. 24, No. 4.

Much applause after the curtain fall for the principal singers, bringing out Ferrani and Borgatti twice and the tenor alone a third time.

The fourth act consists entirely of Chopin's death scene in his own apartments at Paris. He is seen there in his bedchamber seated in a great arm chair, attended by his brotherly friend Elio; his sister Stella arriving later, in whose arms he breathes his last. Grief stricken Flora is not with him in these last moments; but he has been dreaming of her—and also of his native Poland.

Prelude, op. 28, No. 4, in E minor, Adagio and Elegiac, forms the orchestral opening of this scene, foreboding, almost announcing, the death of Chopin, who raises his voice in accents tragic, if no longer passionate, to sing the Prelude, op. 28, No. 20, with thoughts of his dear Polonia, his birth land, and of his first love; remembering, too, the more recent events; he wanders in this singing through parts of Etude, op. 25, No. 7; Nocturne, op. 32, No. 1; Fantasia, op, 13; Nocturne, op. 15, No. 1; Etude, op. 25, No. 6; Nocturne, op. 37, No. 1, and returning again to Prelude, op. 28, No. 20, when Elio addresses him with music from the Ballade, op. 52, to wich Chopin responds, "No, no!" taking up the Agitato Allegro of Study No. 1 in the "Method of Methods," which is continued by Elio, and again followed by Chopin until Elio introduces Nocturne, op. 9, No. 1, and a duet is formed between them; this they continue until Stella arrives, when Elio withdraws and Stella sings Fantasia, op. 13. Chopin, again making an effort to rise from his chair, falls back with the words "Stella"—"Sorella?" in Polacca, op. 26, No. 1, and sings until she replies once more with the Fantasia, and in which they embrace in duet form until they reach the Polacca, op. 44, where the orchestra ventures alone with the chromatic run for the basses and then falls into the op. 36, Impromptu, for Chopin. The dying singer takes up this Impromptu, but soon leaves it for the Nocturne, op. 55, No. 1, in which his sister joins him just a bit; alone he passes on to the Nocturne, op. 62, No. 1, but again returns to Nocturne, op. 55, No. 1, singing which Chopin expires in the arms of his sister. This scene is touching, and many in the audience were affected by it. After a descending chromatic interlude in triplet groupings from Nocturne, op. 9, No. 3, the orchestra brings Stella, Elio and an out of sight chorus far away to sing the Prelude, op. 28, No. 9, with which the opera ends.

All through this scene the tenor Borgatti was great; his mezza voce Nocturne singing was most beautiful, expressive and musical. But Chopin was not allowed to breathe and sing his last in peace, being interrupted by thoughtless, senseless, indecent applause and cries of "Bravo!" and "Bis, bis!"

Just imagine "bravo" and "bis" cries during such a scene! At the close of the opera there was an ovation to the principal interpreters, with numerous calls for the conductor, the composer and also for the chorusmaster.

Should Chopin's music, through this opera, become popular, commonplace street property, I should feel grieved and sorry indeed. To have Chopin's gems and precious jewels treated with the favor bestowed upon big-dropped, dangling earrings, and every-finger, all-hand-covering rings so much affected in Italy, would make me mourn.

The ordinary taste in this country is operatic, melodic in expression—sometimes, alas! coarse and vulgar—but generally speaking the Italians are tuneful if not always musical. They can remember and imitate melodies and "tunes" with remarkable facility; and Chopin, you know, is beautifully melodious! DELMA-HEIDE.

VON KLENNER PUPILS' MUSICALE.

MME. EVANS VON KLENNER introduced ten of her pupils—including beginners and professional artists—at a musicale which she gave in her handsome studio, 230 West Fifty-second street, last Friday evening. Everything attempted by this distinguished vocal teacher is logical, tasteful and as orderly as the most exacting could wish. For one thing she is to be congratulated, by giving as few public concerts as possible, preferring instead of a public function a series of studio musicales, where her work may be studied at close range. No reasonable person would want a better illustration of method, style and musical knowledge than that given in the program presented by the ten young girls and matrons. Taking the singers in the order in which they appeared, we must begin with Miss Banker, of Rochester. After only a term of thirty lessons she showed both in her songs and in the duet with Miss Griffen, another beginner, the results of the Von Klenner training. Miss Banker is sympathetic, and with further development she is going to grow into a fine contralto. Miss Griffen's voice is soprano, sweet and naturally flexible. She, too, promises to be an honor to her teacher in a few years. Miss Woodruff, another young soprano, further along than either Miss Banker or Miss Griffen, sings with much taste, and the quality of her voice is pleasing. Miss Carnahan, of Jamestown, is a dainty little girl with a high soprano voice, which with further training will become more flexible. She sings intelligently already, and in the quartets did splendidly. Miss Walbridge, of Buffalo, possesses an even, smooth contralto voice, and she sings with much feeling and taste.

Miss Wheelock is a Western girl. Her home is in Indiana. If she continues her studies faithfully, the world will hear from her, for she has one of those naturally rich soprano voices with a big range, the kind of voice that can be trained to sing all styles of music equally well. Moreover, Miss Wheelock has temperament and a good stage presence. Mrs. Schrader, although somewhat nervous, sang especially well the Chopin song. Her voice is very sympathetic and her singing marked for its sincerity. Mrs. Bonn, of Waterbury, is one of Madame von Klenner's professional pupils, of whom she may well be proud. Mrs. Bonn's singing of the Rose aria from "The Marriage of Figaro" would have put to shame the efforts of some prima donna of world wide fame. Her execution was flawless and the sweetness and purity of her voice a delight to hear. By her singing Mrs. Bonn scored a triumph for herself and her teacher. After Mrs. Bonn, the audience heard the contralto prima donna of the evening in Miss Kathleen Howard, of Buffalo. It is only a few times in a lifetime that one hears such a voice. Contraltos are rare and Miss Howard possesses one of the rarest of contraltos, remarkable for the deep, noble, organ-like tones and also for compass and lovely quality. She sang with intelligence and depth rather unusual in a girl of eighteen. If in a few years Miss Howard does not become known as one of the leading contraltos of the country then are prophecy and the labor of an accomplished teacher vain things.

Mrs. Fiqué, who sang the closing solo, is another of Madame von Klenner's professional pupils who is rapidly mounting the ladder of fame. Mrs. Fiqué's beautiful soprano is remarkable for a rich medium register, and being an artist with abundant temperament it is a pleasure always to hear her sing. Her coloratura is uncommonly fine. Then, too, Mrs. Fiqué is blessed with good looks, which, together with her voice, account for her success in the operettas conducted by her husband, Carl Fiqué.

The concerted numbers sang by the Viardot Quartet added much to the varied character of the program. The voices of the four young women blended well, and in their attack, phrasing and conception proved again the thorough schooling at the Von Klenner studio. Madame von Klenner's musicianship was shown also in the piano accompaniments which she played for all of the singers who appeared. As is her custom, Madame von Klenner made a brief address before the musicale, in which she told the audience that it was not a concert they were invited to hear, but a studio musicale in which the work of pupils in the various stages of advancement would be unfolded. Similar musicales are to follow in January and February and in March will come the Lenten recital. Madame von Klenner received her pupils and guests in a gown of rich ruby satin, draped with Spanish lace. Her mother, Mrs. Evans, who assisted at the reception, wore pearl gray satin, trimmed with point lace. Among the guests at the musicale were William G. Stewart, director of the American School of Opera, and Mrs. Sydney Rosenfeld, prominent in philanthropic and women's club circles.

Madame von Klenner's new studio is attracting many new pupils. The location is decidedly one of the best in New York for a school of music. Resident pupils will find everything provided for their material comfort as well as artistic advancement.

NEW YORK COLLEGE OF MUSIC.—An interesting concert was given last Tuesday night in the music hall of the New York College of Music.

The program comprised a Sonata for violin and piano by Schenck, which was played by David Mannes and the composer; songs by Franz, Foote, Hawley and Wagner, which were sung by Miss Florence Mulford; short violin pieces by Godard, Schubert and Wieniawski, which were performed by David Mannes.

Mr. Schenck's Sonata, which on this occasion was played for the first time, is a composition of merit, being original, well constructed and interesting throughout. It was well played.

Miss Mulford's singing was enjoyed. She possesses a strong and musical voice, which has been judiciously trained. Her accompaniments were discreetly played by Miss Leonora Dally.

"THE AMERICAN DANGER" IN VOCAL ART.

THE following criticisms from Dorpat, Russia, will interest every musical American:

FIRST ARTICLE.

It was a very musical though skeptical and prejudiced audience that gathered to hear the composer Pirani and the, to us, unknown New York prima donna, Frau Alma Webster Powell.

"What can this new America—the land of the dollar and materialism—show to us artistic Europeans? Possibly a cleverly conceived Barnum's White Elephant!" This prejudice, however, melted away like snow before the sun, and unconsciously a new impression swept over us. America is the land of rapid progress in every line, and soon, perhaps, may come the time when likewise in the field of art, which Europe considers her own monopoly, it will be an all-surpassing rival.

It is not every one's forte to sing the songs of Pirani. And to execute with facility and ease parts that have apparently insurmountable difficulties demands an artist, and such a one as is Mrs. Powell.

An artist of song, with such voice material and such an extraordinary schooling as is rarely heard, Madame Powell is positively not to be equaled, and as to a superior, it is absolutely out of the question.

The artist possesses a soprano voice with a compass of not less than three octaves, which, in spite of its wide range and large volume, remains most smooth and equal throughout its entire range.

The very first number, Delibes' "Glöcken" aria, from "Lakmé," made a tremendous impression upon the listeners—and how could it have been otherwise? They were real bells and pure silver bells of most beautiful tone that we listened to. It seemed hardly a human voice.

In the second aria, "Queen of the Night," from the "Magic Flute," Mrs. Powell showed her ability to sing with breadth and deep felt sentiment.

This aria is usually transposed, for singers who can sing the high F of the original key with ease and beautiful tone are great rarities, as rare, indeed, as black diamonds. But even this wasn't enough, for in a composition of Pirani's she reached the high G above high C.

When we add to this phenomenal ability her brilliant appearance and charming manner, then, indeed, must Mrs. Powell be reckoned as the flaming sun among the "stars" of the stage.

It is, indeed, with great pleasure that we learn the artist has been persuaded to appear in a second concert Friday evening.—Nordlivländische Zeitung, November 27, 1901.

SECOND ARTICLE.

The second Pirani concert was a real triumph for Mrs. Alma Webster Powell. A large audience had assembled to hear and admire this unique artist, who stands alone in her virtuosity.

We can only repeat the words of our first criticism, that an artist with such a phenomenally trained, voluminous voice has never before been heard in our midst.

The bell-like intonation, the ease of tone production, which in range goes away beyond the ordinary limit of the human voice, the astounding virtuosity—these are the dazzling accomplishments which will make the memory of this artist remain, never to be forgotten.

The most difficult arabesque of the art of song, trills, runs, turns, salti, staccati passages, all were delivered with a perfect delicacy and grace.

Besides this, the extreme and exceptional height has a brilliancy of quality that fairly dazzles one, while the voice in the lower range preserves its mellowness and purity.

It would seem to us that the compositions of Pirani had been written exclusively for Mrs. Powell, for it is hardly to be supposed that another singer could accomplish such difficulties as these compositions present.

As an opera singer, Mrs. Powell should be capable of the greatest things, for her beautiful stage appearance and wonderful power of mimicry, as shown in the play of expression over the features, are remarkable in themselves.

Added to all this is a most simple and fascinating style, which the "Kinderlieder" displayed, as well as the most novel and original "Tauseuderlei," and an interpretation like the variations on the "scala diatonica in mi," simply wafted us away to fairyland, as if enchanted.—Nordlivländische Zeitung, Friday, November 10 (23), Dorpat, Russia.

It is refreshing to know how a people as musical as the Russians have been compelled to acknowledge that an American, receiving her training solely in New York, from Mme. Anna Lankow, has in schooling and finish exceeded their greatest expectations.

If Mrs. Powell has conquered the Russians against their self-acknowledged prejudice of American art and artists—if also it is true that the American voices are in themselves the most gifted natural organs, to verify which statement we need only to observe the wide spreading réclame of all European voice trainers, and their great effort to secure American pupils—if this is true, then why does not the American nation appreciate this fact and create opportunities for the hearing of their native talent?

What is all this training for—why all this struggle for perfection on the part of these young and gifted voices, if they must go into foreign fields, push their way through every difficulty, jealousy, hatred, prejudice, poverty, foreign customs, foreign languages—all this in order to make our own people willing to hear their own native talent, that some other nation has sanctioned and acknowledged worthy of our approval?

We listen in rapt awe to the broken down, worn out and half incapacitated singers of other countries, because of their past reputation. Were a young artist of no reputation to sing the same roles twice as well no one would listen, for Europe has not told us she is worth our hearing. And why? Are we such fools that we do not know art when we hear it? Can't we distinguish for ourselves what is good and what is bad?

Then why can all of these foreign artists, often with little reputation at home, make fortunes from their American hearers?

If we do love art for art's sake, and can distinguish the artist, why should we be reluctant to hear those of our own voices that, when sanctioned by foreign approval, we rush in great numbers to honor?

For this we have a splendid illustration in Sibyl Sanderson, who, as we all know, is a California girl, and Yvonne de Treville, acknowledged by all art critics to be a young artist of great ability, who, unable to secure an engagement worthy of her ability in her own home, America, without foreign prestige, has been forced to seek acknowledgment abroad, where she now is.

In the past year a number of American artists, and American trained besides, have secured very good foreign engagements, first of whom must be mentioned Mrs. Alma Webster Powell, traveling on a world tournée now in Russia, who, because of her beautiful voice and training, was engaged in the greatest city of Germany, Berlin, at the Royal Opera House, from which she was forced to resign on account of the jealousy of the other singers. Miss Geraldine Farrar, the accounts of whose struggles for acknowledgment among the old and envious prima donnas of the same opera house are appearing just now so frequently in the dailies; Miss Martha Hofacker, also a pupil from the Lankow studio, now so successful in leading juvenile parts at the Strassburg Opera; Miss Parkinson, a Kansas City girl, unable to find a suitable hearing here, now singing with creditable success in France, and Miss Abbott, a wholly American trained artist, who has just made great success in Paris. And was Miss Abbott's success easily bought? What could be more ungenerous or contemptible than Alvarez's refusal "to sing with a débutante"?—and yet this foreign artist is engaged by Americans to sing in America at a tremendous salary.

What does all this mean? How is this going to end? Can there be no outlook for conscientious struggling voice trainers, who, by patience and superior skill, are able to train these same American voices so that Europe's fastidious audiences accord them unanimous praise?

What incentive is there for such struggling if an acknowledgment must be bought so dearly—and, in fact, can only be attained by those fortunate enough to have financial support back of them?

Why has Russia accorded Mrs. Powell such honors? Everywhere they mark with astonishment her wonderful technic and schooling. And yet this schooling was acquired right here in New York by years of patient study in the studio of Mme. Anna Lankow.

In this self-same studio to-day there are twenty artistically gifted young American voices, which in the course of two or three years will be fitted for first-class operatic work—many of them already known to New York audiences.

Let us see what else this one studio contains. In the list of advanced pupils, sopranos, we have among others—Dramatic: Miss Pauline French, Miss Mary Norris Berry, the well-known St. Louis artist; Miss Anah Doob, Mrs. May Harding, Miss Emily Houghton. Mezzos: Miss Edna Stern, favorably known in New York State; Mrs. James D. Livingston, Miss Bertha Shalek. Coloratura: Mrs. Beatrice Flint, Miss Jane Shalek, Miss Ellen Cornell and Miss Beatrice Goldie. Altos: Miss Freda Buesing and Anna Granda, two really phenomenal voices.

For light opera: Miss Marie Ahlers and Miss Violet Wilson. Among the male voices: Andreas Schneider, the favorite baritone; S. P. Veron, basso, now with the Rose Shay Opera company, who receives the most favorable criticisms wherever he appears; Eladio Chaó, basso cantante, who begins his career next season in Italy, and Sylvester T. Ritter, a phenomenally rich and deep basso. These young singers represent all classes of voices, fitted for the most dramatic Wagnerian roles down, through all the varying requirements, to light opera. Besides, many of these singers are trained in dramatic action at the American School of Opera. Those for grand opera are with Theodor Habelmann; those preparing for light opera are under the guidance of William G. Stewart and Mr. Hegemann. This is the report of but one studio! How much glorious talent must there be accumulated in the other renowned studios of New York, such as those of Mme. Evans von Klenner, Oscar Sänger, Madame Courtney, Francis Fischer Powers and many more, equally well known! What is to become of these voices? What chance is there in America for a well trained voice outside of the Metropolitan Opera—where they frankly refuse to engage anyone without foreign reputation. Ah, indeed—there is vaudeville or light opera or burlesque—but excepting the Bostonians, what advantage is a well trained voice in this field? Given a pretty face, slim figure and pleasing manner—an untrained voice will do quite as well.

When are we Americans ever to awaken to the fact of our own ability?

If Europe sees such marvelous ability in our native young artists, why can't our country rise to the opportunity, rally to the support of the efforts already made to have opera in English in all our large cities, and give the native talent a chance at home. Let us hope that this awakening is near at hand. XY.

Katharine Fisk Sings with Nordica.

MRS. KATHARINE FISK, the distinguished contralto, after a brilliant appearance in St. Louis, December 9, with Madame Nordica in song recital, filled an engagement at Colorado Springs, December 13. Mrs. Fisk was accorded the ovation which meets her wherever she sings, as will be seen by the appended press notices:

It is not necessary to say very much for Mrs. Fisk. She is known throughout America and abroad as an artist of the very first rank. There are few concert singers to be compared with her. Her register is remarkable, her intelligence is unfailing as is the variety and sureness of her interpretations. She is at times boldly dramatic and again subtly gentle and has, fortunately, a voice sufficient to the demands of a program whose range is from Brahms to Nevin and the most exquisite of present day ballad composers.

The program last night was admirably selected with a view toward variety. Goldmark's "Ode" was magnificently sung, and roused the audience to enthusiasm.—Colorado Springs Evening Telegram, December 14, 1901.

Mrs. Katharine Fisk last evening gave one of the most enjoyable song recitals ever heard in Perkins Hall. Her voice is a splendid contralto, her training is excellent and her choice of songs very happy. Her voice, which for strength and depth of tone is remarkable, extends into the soprano register as well. Her presence, which is that of a woman as beautiful as her voice, lent an additional charm to her singing.

One of the most enjoyable numbers of the evening was a group of five biblical songs by Dvorák, the first public production of which was given by Mrs. Fisk at the London Philharmonic Society, under the personal direction of the composer.—Colorado Springs Gazette, December 14, 1901.

Mme. De Vere-Sapio's Australian Triumphs.

THE critics of the Antipodes continue to laud the singing of Madame de Vere-Sapio in opera. The following were received recently:

The season of Italian opera at Her Majesty's got an immense "lift" by the appearance of Madame De Vere-Sapio in the name part of Aïda on Monday night. Both in vocal and dramatic sense the new Aïda delighted the big house. Good judges who have seen lately Madame Melba at Covent Garden declare that it is almost impossible to distinguish between her beauty of voice and polished refinement of vocal skill and such a flawless performance as Madame De Vere-Sapio gave us on Monday night. One enthusiast said: "I could fancy I was hearing Melba all the time."—Sydney Sportsman, August 14, 1901.

The feature in the repetition of "Aïda" was the first appearance of Madame De Vere-Sapio in the name part. Besides looking admirably the character of the handsome Ethiopian, Madame De Vere-Sapio sang the part beautifully. Her great success was in the rendering of "Cieli azzurri," which realized all the plaintive charm of the wild melody.—Sydney Morning Herald, August 13, 1901.

Madame De Vere-Sapio, warmly greeted on making her appearance as Gilda, looked younger and even more attractive (this is a spontaneous, not a stereotyped expression of admiration) than she did in 1894. She charmed us all by her beautiful and exquisitely artistic singing, and at the same time won her way into the favor of the critical by her display of easy grace as an actress.—Sydney Punch, August 15, 1901.

The announcement that Madame De Vere-Sapio was to take the role of Santuzza in "Cavalleria" created a keen personal interest in the revival. We were all prepared to hear Santuzza's music finely sung, and most of us were predisposed to an adequate display of intelligent and well studied acting. The surprise was in the perfectly graded emotional feeling, the alternate play of affection, aversion, fervent hope, passionate pleading and consuming, revengeful desire, which characterized the singing and the acting of the "trusting woman basely scorned," from the balmy Easter morn to the final scene.

Without once letting her feet wander into the forbidden paths of exaggeration, Madame De Vere-Sapio gave us a Santuzza in which there were no weak spots and not a touch of insincere slovenliness or false color.—Sydney Punch, August 29, 1901.

HUGO KAUN.

"ON October 8 Hugo Kaun, a German composer who has been artistically active for several years in Milwaukee, gave a concert devoted to his own works, the execution of which he entrusted to the baritone Van Eweyk and the pianist Bos from Berlin, and the Leipsic String Quartet of Hamann, Hering, Heintzoch and Robert Hansen. The performance comprised the String Quartet, op. 41; the Piano Quartet, op. 39, and the lieder 'Das Mondlicht fluttet,' 'Königin der Nacht,' 'Rother Mohn,' 'Wetterleuchten,' 'Schneidermär,' 'Der Sieger' and 'Daheim,' and all the pieces gave brilliant evidence of the unusual talent in composition of their creator and his astonishing mastery of all musical means of expression; in one word, they displayed Hugo Kaun as a real master in this field of composition, who in point of invention stands thoroughly on his own feet, and in all the artistic working out of his thoughts never lets us miss the internal warmth of a deep and truly sensitive disposition. A serious, dreamy mood, which is not quite hidden in the Scherzo of the Quartet and in the jesting 'Schneidermär' (which was redemanded), gives to the works before us a special coloring, and completes the profile of this eminent tone poet.

"The string quartet of only three movements begins with a four voiced fugue that exhibits the composer as a contrapuntist of the first magnitude in its' bold yet always legal development, and in spite of all its learning leaves not a trace of the school dust so often united with such works, but contributes rich nourishment to the soul of the hearer. Equally valuable in its noble fancy and its glowing temperamental contents, but still more effective, is the third movement. The main part of the scherzo flows on with airy lightness, compared with which the middle episode is somewhat inferior in invention and clearness. The four movements of the piano quintet are on the same level of value, not only in the facture and tone blending, but also in inventive power and poetic contents. The first movement, impregnated with deep yet modest feeling, denoting inward happiness, puts a most effective contrast in the finale, with fresh, impetuous joy of life. Of very peculiar, even fabulous charm is the intermezzo in the second place, and a warm outbreak of feeling from the beginning to the end forms the third movement. As a lieder composer Kaun has caught with full congeniality the mood of the poetry, and as regards the declamatory handling of the text and the refinement with which he, without depriving the vocal part of its independence, uses the piano accompaniment to enhance the effect of the whole, he has created cabinet pieces which bear comparison with recognized flowers of German musical lyrics, and, like the chamber pieces just mentioned, adorn any good concert program. Hugo Kaun is once more a melancholy example that composers who have something special and original to say and can utter it in artistic form are able only slowly to attain general recognition, and that they have often to cut for themselves a path thereto by brave pecuniary sacrifices (printing, public performances at their own risk, &c.). May the exertions which Hugo Kaun has also made be not in vain; he is thoroughly deserving of the attention of all givers of concerts who can diffuse the knowledge of a new, highly important composer."—Leipsic Musikal Wochenblatt.

"In Arthur von Eweyk's liederabend in Bechstein Hall, the compositions of Hugo Kaun claim especial interest, because they belong to the rare appearances in the concert hall. But this will in the future be changed if one may judge from the success which some of those heard yesterday gained. The striking 'Der Sieger' was redemanded and given da capo; next to it were especially pleasing 'Das Mondlicht fluttet,' 'Rother Mohn' and the humorous 'Schneidermär.' All the six lieder of Kaun were artistically valuable, but as this does not always conduce to success, let us bring forward with praise their grateful songfulness."—O. T., Berlin Börsen Courier.

"On Thursday Hugo Kaun, of Milwaukee, produced some of his own works at the Beethoven Hall. The concertgiver is remembered from last year, when he presented some of his chamber and vocal music at the Bechstein Hall as an excellent artist struggling toward higher aims. The two new symphonic orchestral pieces, 'Minnehaha's Death' and 'Hiawatha,' form the beginning of a cyclus of instrumental music entitled 'The Primeval Forest,' which the composer intends to write. Their most prominent quality is the way in which Kaun handles the orchestra. Here we have to do with a conductor who thoroughly knows the instruments and the art of handling them, and how to blend his colors. This full, sane 'Klang' is a skillfully made robe, which not only gleams in real beauty but often is woven in a thoroughly characteristic manner. That traces of Wagner can be found is not to be reckoned a defect, for our generation must naturally incline toward him. The themes are clearly divided, and so powerful, melodically or rhythmically, that more extensive movements can be built up with them, and this has been successfully done by the composer, who is full of fancy and thoroughly at home in the technic of counterpoint and movement building. The symphonic character at the same time is happily preserved, so that the thematic work extends chiefly to the main themes and a number of other motives are not forced too far into the foreground.

"Herr Kaun in conducting the Philharmonic Orchestra displayed the sureness which only the practice of years can give. Among the songs sung by Fräulein Polly Victoria Blumenbach are many beautiful thoughts which did not fail in their effect on the public. Two of them were redemanded and Herr Kaun was repeatedly distinguished by recalls."—Franz von Hennig, Berlin Reichsbote.

"Next day, a composer living in Milwaukee, who has, however, enjoyed German training, Hugo Kaun, produced some orchestral pieces and a series of lieder with piano accompaniment. An overture to the opera 'The Painter of Antwerp,' two pieces from a symphonic poem, 'The Primeval Forest,' and a Festival March showed decided talent. The melodic invention and the resulting development of a broadly designed structure, and, above all, the handling of the orchestra, made us recognize an admirable, cultured musician, who directs at the same time with sureness and repose."—E. G. Taubert, Berlin Post.

"The name of Hugo Kaun has been often mentioned by me in these columns, and as readers will remember always with the fullest acknowledgment of the unusual achievements of its owner. Yesterday Herr Kaun showed himself on a new side, as the creator of great instrumental tone poems, of which the overture to the opera 'The Painter of Antwerp,' two symphonic pieces from 'The Primeval Forest,' 'Minnehaha's Death' and 'Hiawatha,' after Longfellow, and a Festival March, in which the 'Star Spangled Banner' is used, appeared in the program. At the very first glance Kaun impresses us by his masterly instrumentation, in which he rivals the most important of the moderns. This orchestration is as characteristic as it is of striking beauty. But what distinguishes this composer honorably from many moderns is that behind the beautiful body of sound there stands the firm framework of precious musical thoughts, and not, as often, any attempt to disguise poverty of thought by deceptive ornamentation. I call the thoughts precious because they are sharply defined and expressive, and, although complying with the musical dialect of the present, still find their origin in the soul of an independent creative artist. Add to this the art of thematic work, which is far above the average. In the presence of such a union of unusual artistic qualities we are, as soon as we are acquainted with the peculiarities of Kaun's orchestral music, drawn into its magic circle. The two pieces from 'The Primeval Forest' especially charmed me. The 'Festival March' is an 'occasional' composition, and as such is musically not on the same level. It compensates for this by its brilliant external effectiveness, and must be doubly great in the case of an American public, for which it was originally written. Between the instrumental number Frl. Polly Victoria Blumenbach sang nine lieder, by Kaun, among which the 'Posthorn,' 'Rother Mohn,' 'Bitteres Gedanken' and 'Daheim' gave great satisfaction and rendered a repetition unavoidable. In regard to the value of these lieder I must refer to the notice of Van Eweyk's liederabend. Herr Kaun conducted the Philharmonic Orchestra and received lively applause."—O. T., Börsen Courier.

The Women's String Orchestra.

THE opening of the sixth season of the Women's String Orchestra Society of New York was signalized by a brilliant concert in Mendelssohn Hall last Wednesday evening. A large and fashionable audience, nearly every one of whom was in evening dress, listened attentively to the judiciously arranged program which Conductor Carl V. Lachmund had prepared. The society was assisted by Miss Florence Muriel Austin, violinist, and Herbert Witherspoon, basso. The following program was presented:

Liebesnovelle ..... Krug
Tristes Amours (aria from Galathée) ..... Victor Masse
Mr. Witherspoon.
Elegie ..... Tschaikowsky
Volkslied ..... Komzak
Adagio (from Fourth Concerto) ..... Vieuxtemps
Second Mazurka ..... Musin
Miss Austin.
Group of Songs—
Ich trage meine Minne ..... Richard Strauss
L'heure exquise ..... R. Hahn
Had a Horse (Hungarian melody) ..... Arranged by F. Korbay
Mr. Witherspoon.
Petite Valse ..... César Cui
Serenade, op. 53 ..... Kienzl
Bourrée ..... Bach

The most important number was that with which the concert was opened, "Liebesnovelle," arranged for string orchestra and harp. This work is divided into four parts, the first movement being the allegretto, the second allegretto con molto, the third andante molto and the fourth andante allegro molto. The orchestra gave an intelligent reading of this composition and brought out its beauties effectively. The "Elegie," by Tschaikowsky, and the Volkslied, by Komzak, were daintily played, the phrasing and tone coloring being admirable. Miss Austin gave a spirited performance of the adagio movement from the Fourth Concerto of Vieuxtemps. She was accompanied by the orchestra and harp. Her second number was the brilliant mazurka of Ovide Musin, which she played with fascinating abandon and commendable accuracy. Mr. Witherspoon was heard to good advantage in the song by Victor Massé and the group of songs by Richard Strauss, Hahn and Korbay. His rich, resonant voice, admirably controlled, filled the hall and delighted the audience. The three numbers—Petite Valse, by César Cui; Serenade, by Kienzi, and Bourrée, by Bach—proved a brilliant close to a most interesting concert.

[illegible] tion of Mr. Lachmund, the Women's [illegible] has reached a high point of excellence. The organization plays with precision, smoothness and spirit, its work being illumined by a musical intelligence. Mr. Lachmund deserves much praise for having trained to this high point of efficiency the talented young women who constitute the society.

THE TWIN CITIES.

MINNEAPOLIS, December 14, 1901

A WEALTH of good music has been furnished the past week by Nordica, Zeisler and the choral societies here. Large audiences have greeted all of the performances. Josef Hofmann will give two recitals here, one in St. Paul, January 13, and the other in Minneapolis January 14. Harold Bauer will assist at the second Apollo Club concert, therefore we shall have some masterly pianists, all told.

Monday evening, December 2, Madame Nordica gave a delightful song recital in the Lyceum Theatre, and was ably assisted by Mrs. E. Romayne Simmons at the piano. The prima donna appeared at her best, and graciously added several encores to a program already of generous length and varied in character. Madame Nordica has sung in these cities on several previous visits, and is a great favorite here, but never did she sing so magnificently as on the present occasion. Her powers of vocalization seem more wonderful than ever, and her ability to reach the hearts of her hearers is greater than ever before. Her songs were mostly dainty and bright in character, excepting the "Hungarian Song," by Erkel, which showed her brilliant dramatic soprano to special advantage.

Music lovers are already aware of Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler's great ability as a pianist, therefore it is needless to remark specially upon the program she presented Wednesday evening, December 4, in the Lyceum. A house crowded to the doors was present to assure Mrs. Zeisler of appreciation. Her masterly technic, sympathetic expression and exquisite tone coloring delighted her audience as of old. The program showed refined musical taste, and was given uniformly well. One number especially, an encore, was characterized by some wonderful left hand work. It was an arrangement of the Sextet from Donizetti's opera "Lucia" for the left hand alone, and was almost entirely new to musicians here.

The Kilties, Toronto's well-known band, made their first appearance in this city December 1, and were obliged to give three concerts to supply the demand for tickets. The Scottish people were out in full force, and other nationalities as well were moved by such stirring strains as "The Campbells Are Coming," "Highland Laddie" and "The Hundred Pipers." The Kilties' reading of popular and national airs could not be surpassed; however, the more classical numbers were not up to the standard.

"The Messiah" was presented with great success by the Philharmonic Club, Monday evening, December 2, in Wesley Church. Emil Ober-Hoffer, the musical director, conducted the performance with much enthusiasm, which was shared by the large chorus and even the soloists, Mrs. Genevieve Clark Wilson, Miss Mabelle Crawford, Glenn Hall and Joseph Baernstein. This was the first concert of the twelfth season, and the associate members helped to open the season auspiciously by completely filling the auditorium. Mr. Ober-Hoffer has proved a very efficient director and has brought out the musical talent in the active members. The chorus was evenly balanced and sang with good expression throughout, and especially in the grand "Amen" chorus. The orchestra warmed up to the spirit as the oratorio progressed and played to the best advantage in the Pastoral Symphony. Mrs. Wilson has a clear soprano voice, light and brilliant. Mr. Hall's tenor is sweet, with good intonation, but showed a slight lack of control at times, which, however, may have been due to nervousness. Miss Crawford possesses a beautiful contralto voice, smooth and rich, especially in the lower tones. She sang the aria, "He Shall Feed His Flock," with unusually good expression. Mr. Baernstein immediately renewed his acquaintance with the audience, which was much impressed with him when he appeared with the club last year. He has a magnificent bass voice under good control and of excellent timbre and he sang with perfect enunciation. The aria, "Why Do the Nations Rage?" gave him unusual opportunities for expression and was sung so well that it was redemanded.

The Apollo Club gave the opening concert of the season, Wednesday, December 11, in the Lyceum, assisted by Signor Campanari, baritone, and Miss Mae Louise Campbell, soprano. The new musical director, Mr. Graninger, from Cincinnati, has much magnetism and force, and is apparently interested in the work before him. The large male chorus was well trained and their voices blended well. The program was an excellent one, and showed much care in the artistic finish. Signor Campanari sang with his customary dramatic expression, beautiful tone color and masterly poise. He became such a favorite that several encores were demanded, and he finally came out and sang the Toreador song from "Carmen," which took the house by storm. Miss Campbell gave much pleasure with her thoroughly artistic reading of "Vilanelle," by E. dell' Acqua. Her voice is flexible and of fine quality.

St. Paul.

The St. Paul Choral Club presented "The Messiah" on the evening of December 10, under the direction of George Normington, and was assisted by the same well-known aritsts as the Philharmonic, of Minneapolis. The large auditorium of the People's Church was crowded to the doors, and the same kindly reception was accorded Mrs. Wilson, Miss Crawford, Mr. Hall and Mr. Baernstein as Minneapolitans had given. The club's interpretation of Händel's masterpiece was much to be admired, showing care in every small detail. Mr. Baernstein's bass voice found especial favor because of its power.

The Schubert Club Society presented Fannie Bloomfield-Ziesler, who was given a most cordial greeting at her recital Thursday evening, December 5, in the People's Church. She displayed wonderful technical power and much fire and brilliancy in some numbers, and in others exquisite precision and delicacy.

Madame Nordica received an ovation here on her appearance in the People's Church, Tuesday, December 3, in song recital. She sang the German selections wonderfully well. Also the number "Voi che Sapete," by Mozart, which was rendered perhaps in the most artistic manner of any selection on the program, although it was not encored. E. Romayne Simmins proved himself a capable soloist, as well as an unusually good accompanist.

Madame Nordica's program was as follows:

Elsa's Dream (Lohengrin) ..... Wagner
Si mes vers ..... Hahn
Ariette ..... Vidal
Les Filles de Cadix ..... Delibes
Voi che Sapete ..... Mozart
Polish Dance ..... Scharwenka
E. Romayne Simmins.
At Parting ..... Rogers
Angels Ever Bright and Fair ..... Händel
Song of Thanksgiving ..... Allitsen
Ich Liebe Dich ..... Grieg
Stille Sicherheit ..... H. Franz
Serenade ..... Richard Strauss
Brünnhilde's Call (Walküre) ..... Wagner

The Kilties were well received here, and their matinée and evening performances on November 29 were much enjoyed.

The Whitney Mockridge Grand Concert Company presented an excellent program in the People's Church, December 13, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A.

Hotel Bellevue,

Boston, Mass., December 21, 1901.

ARTHUR HUBBARD'S studio is like a beehive and has been since September. All his hours are filled for every day in the week. His pupils are meeting with success in their respective positions, many of them singing in prominent churches and many others teaching in different parts of the country. Miss Ruby Cutter, who has been heard in many concerts in the past two years and who filled the position of soprano for two years and a half in the Union Church, Worcester, left in October to pursue her studies in Paris. She is comfortably settled there with her mother and has already been heard in the best salons, meeting with the most cordial appreciation. A brilliant career is predicted for her by Madame Marchesi, who has praised her highly for her attainments and assured her that she can prepare her for an operatic début in a short time.

Miss Margaret Roche is another advanced pupil who has attracted a great deal of notice for her beautiful contralto voice and its rather extraordinary range, as well as for her broad and spirited style of singing. She is gifted with a fine stage presence and has met with unmistakable appreciation wherever she has appeared in concert.

Miss Harriet Goddard, who made her operatic début in Modena last winter, is another of Mr. Hubbard's pupils who was trained entirely by him before going to Europe. She is in Paris with her husband, John Wood, and is expected to sing again in Italy in the spring.

Paul Savage is also in Paris studying French repertory. He has a fine, well poised and ringing baritone voice. He has been heard in Parisian musical circles and has received a great deal of praise and encouragement for his artistic work.

Mr. Harrison, still another pupil studying abroad, is in Rome with Cotogni. He has a baritone voice of extraordinary range and size.

Clarence Chuts, basso of the Union Church Quartet, Worcester, has a fine voice and sings with authority.

There are many other promising voices in Mr. Hubbard's class who will undoubtedly be heard in public eventually.

Mme. Caroline Gardner Clarke gave the third in the series of afternoon musicales on Tuesday, and, as usual, every seat was occupied by an audience that greatly enjoyed the program given. Madame Clarke was assisted by the following artists: Miss Katherine Ricker, contralto; Mrs. J. E. Tippett, at the piano; George Edmund Dwight, baritone; J. Hoffman, first violin; J. Theodorowicz, second violin; F. Kahn, viola; C. Barth, 'cello; G. Gerhardt, double bass; E. N. L'Africain, cornet.

Madame Clarke, in addition to singing at the Christmas services in the Central Church, will sing solos from "The Messiah" at the New Old South in the evening.

"The Nativity" will be sung at Trinity Church on Thursday evening, December 26, under the direction of Dr. H. J. Stewart, organist of the church. The solos will be by the regular quartet, and the chorus will be augmented for the occasion.

Frederic Martin has been engaged by the Choral Club, of Troy, in the production of "The Creation," which is to be given on March 13.

Frank H. Hyatt, a young Ohio musician now studying in Boston, is surprising his friends by his compositions. Some of his recent songs, "For Thee," "Dreaming," "When Sweet and Low" and "The Bird and the Rose," are being sung in concert by Mrs. Jeannie Crocker Follett and Theodore Schroeder.

The prospectus of the Salem Oratorio Society has been issued for the present season. The only well-known soloist announced is Gwilym Miles, of New York.

An organ recital was given on Tuesday evening at Berkeley Temple by Mrs. Florence Rich King, pupil of Everett E. Truette, when an interesting program was played.

The recital at the New England Conservatory of Music on Wednesday evening was by students of the advanced class.

There will be special music in all the churches at Christmas time, the choir at the Central Church to be augmented by players from the Symphony Orchestra in the morning, and by a chorus of seventy voices in the afternoon.

The pupils of W. Archibald Willis gave a recital last week at Waltham.

The Nashua Oratorio Society—100 voices—announces "The Messiah" for December 27. The soloists are all from Boston. Henri G. Blaisdell's orchestra of twenty-four pieces will furnish the music. Mr. Blaisdell is the concert manager, E. G. Hood conductor and Miss Anna S. Melendy pianist.

FREDERIC ARCHER'S SUCCESSOR.

E. H. LEMARE, organist of St. Margaret's Church, Westminster, London, who was recently on a visit in this country and gave a number of recitals, has been selected as the successor of the late Frederic Archer as organist at Carnegie Hall, Pittsburg. The American organists are making such huge salaries in the church positions they occupy that a paltry $5,000 a year at Carnegie Hall, Pittsburg, with a few thousand dollars added by way of special recitals and teaching, did not tempt any of them.

Harvey-Pelton-Bacheller-Bromberg at Roseville.—This quartet sang at the Roseville Avenue (N. J.) Presbyterian Church last Sunday evening (F. W. Riesberg, organist-director), this being the Christmastide musical program:

Soprano solo, In Bethlehem's Ancient City.....West
Alto solo, O Holy Night.....Adam
Tenor solo, The Birthday of a King.....Neidlinger
Baritone solo, A Dream of Paradise.....Lane
Anthem, Like Silver Lamps.....Barnby

The church was crowded, and there has probably never been a more satisfactory Christmas service there in the dozen years this special regular Sabbath evening music has been given. Mr. Riesberg played a Pastorale by Metcalf, and Lachner's "Marche Célèbre."

ILMA DORE.

THIS young coloratura singer, a picture of whom embellishes the cover of this week's paper, will make her début the evening of February 4 in Mendelssohn Hall.

Miss Doré was born in St. Petersburg, Russia, sixteen years ago. When a child she gave evidence of the possession of a remarkable voice, and showed a passion for music. Her parents decided wisely to make the most of her talents, and placed her in charge of a capable voice trainer. Her teacher declared that he had never heard a purer and stronger voice in a child, and had never found a brighter musical intelligence than she disclosed. Under the loving and painstaking guidance of this preceptor little Miss Doré made rapid and sure progress. The flexibility and sweetness of her voice astonished all who heard her sing, and her bird-like singing delighted them, too. It was predicted that some day she would become a famous prima donna.

A few years ago the parents of Miss Doré moved from St. Petersburg to New York, and she was at once placed in charge of Madame Serrano, the experienced voice builder, who was incontinently charmed by the youthful singer. Since then Miss Ilma has been studying diligently and her development has been surprising.

Miss Doré purposes to go to Paris to complete her studies, and will probably spend some time in Italy before returning to America. Previous to her departure from New York she will appear in a song recital in Mendelssohn Hall, being assisted by Emile Levy, the accompanist.

Miss Doré is endowed with an exceptional voice, a high soprano of dramatic quality, which she controls like a mature artist. She is wrapped up in her art, and is brimful of ambition. Competent critics, who have heard her sing, do not hesitate to extol her to the skies and indulge in the most roseate prophecies touching her artistic career.

SOUSA'S RETURN.

IN the Herald Square Theatre last Sunday night John Philip Sousa and his band, fresh from their successes in Great Britain, were given a rousing welcome. This theatre, not a very large one, was wholly inadequate for the accommodation of the throng of music lovers who wished to hear the concert. And what hall but Carnegie will hold the audience that crowd to hear Sousa? Sousa and his men were given a cordial reception

In reviewing a Sousa concert it is useless to publish the printed program, for that gives but an inadequate idea of the entertainment. The scheme Sunday night included several novelties, such as intermezzo, "Salut d'Amour," by Elgar; "Witches' Dance" from "In Fairy Land," by Cowen; Bourrée and Gigue from "Much Ado About Nothing," by German, and "Hail to the Flag," a national anthem, by Richard Mansfield. As usual Sousa was gracious in the matter of encores.

The soloists were Miss Maud Reese-Davies, soprano; Miss Dorothy Hoyle, violinist, and Arthur Pryor, trombone player.

Estelle Harris for University Glee Club.—Miss Harris has been engaged by the New York University Glee Club to sing at the concert at the Astoria ballroom January 25. Christmas evening she and Mr. Riesberg furnished some appropriate Christmas music at the handsome home of Mrs. McGowan, 11 East Sixtieth street, and December 26 she sang in "The Messiah" at Goshen.

Opera in New York.

"TRISTAN und Isolde" for the first night of opera at the Metropolitan last Monday! There's a pretty pearl to cast before the bediamonded first tier crew. Of what is Mr. Grau thinking that he imagines to reward all the gorgeous gowning with a sombre music drama? But he, most harassed of mortals, is not to blame. Stars rule the operatic firmament. And so the management compromised and gave a society version of this opera, with the house well illuminated that the box holders might recognize each other's gowns. The loges looked like the row of jewelers' windows on the famous Rue de la Paix, and the good folk in them disported themselves in exactly the same manner as such good folk do on just such occasions. They came in at the end of the first act, chattered and yawned behind their fans during the second, and having exhausted their store of gossip left early in the third act. Whether or not this gave the cue to their humbler sisters below or whether the uninspired beat of the man at the desk sent them out to hunt a lobster and some table d'hote music is a more serious consideration. But to the opera.

Ternina was the Isolde. And she is easily the most subtle Isolde seen and heard here. Her first act is a marvel of interpretation; she knows not only the fullest meaning of the lines, but also what lies between them; and more than knowing this, she is easily able to express it. Be it frankly confessed that her voice is not a great one—if it were neither heaven nor earth could withstand her operatic assault. There are a few tones in her lowest register which thrill—not with beauty, but because of their haunting quality. For the rest her singing is the sheerest exposition of brain possible. She welds her mood to fit the text and leaves in the minds of her listeners not an iota of doubt as to her conception of the part. Her wrath and her passion are real enough to be true and she, when necessary, tears her voice to shreds to make them sound. There are moments in Ternina's first act when the canniness of her singing sounds diabolical. When, for one instance, she is wooing Tristan, her wonderful phrase, "Warum ich dich da nicht erschlug," and the following, "Wie sorgt ich schlecht um deinen Herren," are simply alive with double meaning, and between them the contrast of emotions creates tremendous climax. In act second her impatience is disgracefully unbridled and the meeting with Tristan is not for the eyes of oratorio singers and conductors. And for the tone of absolute finality her "Liebestod" is wonderful. Instead of following the trend of most Isoldes and sitting astride this opportunity to make a brilliant vocal display, Ternina reads into her Liebestod resignation; it is not at all the climax of the work as so many of the unthinking suppose—it is merely the end. With Ternina this, as almost all of the points which are necessary to raise the Wagner version above the level of very bad poetry, is illuminated with meaningful touches. Hers is a marvelous Isolde.

Van Dyck's Tristan is vocally impossible. Whenever he can do so he substitutes declamation for singing and lets the orchestra do the rest, which under Mr. Damrosch the orchestra does not. Van Dyck's entrance and his acting in the cantharides episode are the few enjoyable moments in his work. As for the second act he prowled around [illegible] the various tonalities like a cat after a mouse which [illegible] catch. His final scene was rather brutal, with an absence of all finer shadings.

The Brangaene of Schumann-Heink was the most mediocre we ever have heard from this estimable mother. During the entire evening she stalked through her part on vocal stilts, trying to reach the notes; and she frequently took little excursions into the land of foreign keys—just as they do in Bayreuth.

Bispham's Kurwenal is his best role and his work last night was as usual.

Nor is there anything new to record about Eduard de Reszké's portrayal of Marke; he acts and sings the part of this marié complaisant with a great show of the milk of human kindness, and condones in truly operatic style. His voice sounds vigorous, and on this occasion his German was free from the usual exaggerations of pronunciation which so often have marred his Marke.

Muhlmann's Melot was too lusty for words; the Shepherd, sung by Reiss, knew much more about pitch than any of his tribe before him in Mr. Grau's flock, and Bars' voice of the Seaman was nicely kept in tune by the audible aid of an organ.

This brings us to the last consideration: The orchestra and the man who cannot conduct it. Whether the men in the band were fatigued by traveling or whether they were not matters little—the sound that came out of the pit was one of weariness, and it easily could be imagined that the players were thumbing the pages to count how many yet remained to be fiddled and tooted through. The violins sounded thin, the 'cellos not at all, and the woodwind played passages quite beyond the pale of musical notation. All this did not affect Mr. Damrosch in the least, for he continued to wave one arm and then another, and sometimes both, with his eyes glued to the score. The extravagantly beautiful Prelude was read with all the passion of a mackerel, and if there were any climaxes in it they remain yet to be found. The entire work of this amiable conductor was as uninspired as a white porcelain plate. In his accompaniments he managed carefully to count beats quite irrespective of any tempi of the singer, and at crucial moments he simply postponed the orchestral situation until his metronomic cue came round. Of course, such things are absurd, and would not merit discussion if they were not so important a factor in this game of opera: but a conductor has it in his baton to level all of the singer's efforts and make commonplace every effect. And in most of these sins Mr. Damrosch succeeds admirably. There was much yawning among the audience last night, and the third act was well nigh unbearable—it dragged to endless, dreary lengths, and, like Bob Acres' courage, one's enthusiasm for Wagner's "Tristan" began to ooze out at the finger-tips. The men played badly, it is true, but what incentive have they to do otherwise? The orchestra is at best an instrument in which so many players sink all their individuality. Now it remains for the conductor to absorb this, and with a comprehension of the score, together with a sense for the musically beautiful and some show of temperament, to play upon this instrument. Were Mr. Damrosch only a piano virtuoso instead of only the kind of a conductor he is, his public playing would be laughed out of existence; but with an orchestra he is able to mask his disability. He has but to wave his arms and let God and Mr. Grau take their course. Mr. Damrosch is old enough to know better. His youthful appearance is no excuse for such childish work, and if he has decided to remain an opera conductor it is about time that he begin to regard the matter a bit seriously and try to get a shadow of the composer's meaning into his conducting. At present his work lacks everything it should possess to make him eligible for the position of a third conductor in a small German opera house. Let him remember that a father's reputation may cover only a multitude of musical sins—not all of them.

DEAR MR. KLEIN:

I have received your letter of November 8, announcing your approaching departure for New York, and your intention of settling in that city as a teacher of singing I think the Americans are to be most heartily congratulated, and I feel sure they will appreciate your excellent method and your great musical ability. I remember quite well studying two of Wagner's songs with you some years ago.

Wishing you every success; and hoping to see you in London before you sail, with kind remembrances from myself and my husband, believe me,

KREISLER MAKES REAPPEARANCE.

THE distinguished Austrian violinist, Fritz Kreisler, made his reappearance with the Philharmonic Society on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of last week. His appearance was greeted by an enthusiastic audience, wherein were a whole regiment of violin players. For his introduction Kreisler chose the Second Concerto of Bach, in E major. His playing of this noble work brought out frenzied applause from the violin contingent, and in which the whole audience joined, compelling Kreisler to bow his acknowledgments a half a dozen times. The critics in their way applauded him by the following acknowledgments of his skill as a virtuoso:

Fritz Kreisler, athletic, broad shouldered, with the air of a conqueror—has he not just subdued musical Berlin?—set other visiting violinists an example by playing the E major Concerto of Bach. That such a giant as Ysaye prefers this music is not surprising; and Kreisler, one time a boy wonder and still a master of Paganini "pizzications," follows a noble example. The second movement, an adagio in chaconne form, would have revealed the imaginative poverty of some "fiddle fairies" who dazzle groundlings with their tricky acrobatics on one string; but gave us Kreisler at his best. That long, pure melodic line, truly a Gothic line in tone, of Bach's, drew from Kreisler's instrument music that enmeshed the soul as well as senses. He was vigorous in the opening allegro, fiery in the closing. He substituted an antique and jolly Fugue in A by Tartini, the Italian, once given to trills and diabolical visions. This Mr. Kreisler delivered with infinite gusto and perfect musicianship. He is a rare combination of virtuoso and artist. The applause was abundant.—The Sun.

The solo performances of Mr. Kreisler yesterday were most interesting. He was down on the program for a caprice of Guiraud as his second number, but without notice he substituted for it the Tartini selection. He played with great warmth, with vigorous style, with big tone and with unusual finish. He was applauded to the echo, as he well deserved to be. It was a pleasure to hear such violin playing after the exhibitions of musical immaturity and technical precocity which have lately been offered to us as samples of real art.—Times.

Herr Fritz Kreisler played Bach's E major Concerto and a fugue for violin solo by Tartini. In both pieces he gave a fine exhibition of noble violin playing, technically masterful, intellectually fascinating and emotionally compelling.—Tribune.

RICHARD STRAUSS is slowly but surely making his way. In a few years he will need no propaganda. He is a genius of the first rank, the greatest of living composers.

LILLI LEHMANN announces a farewell recital. The program is to be devoted to composers she has met during the course of her long career. As the announcements in the daily papers have it the range is from the years "1750 to 1901."

THIS interesting news was cabled to the Sun: "BERLIN, December 20.—Part of the manuscript of Wolfram von Eschenbach's 'Parsifal,' which was written in the middle of the thirteenth century, has been found, forming the cover of a book in the Provincial Library at Arnberg, Bavaria."

SAME old Christmas, same old "Messiah," same old Damrosch. We are lucky to escape a supplementary performance of "Elijah" with the chorus yapping at Andrew Carnegie's heels. But we are fain to believe that the canny Scot will not be tempted by the bait displayed so eagerly. Hasn't the multi-millionaire had his eye teeth skinned more than once by various musical enterprises?

THE music critic of the Philadelphia Ledger, in his remarks on Eduard Zeldenrust's playing in that city, said that "Herr Zeldenrust proceeded to pound the life out of a Chopin nocturne." Pounding the life out of a nocturne may be a classical or literary expression in criticism with certain papers, but even then the statement should accord with facts. Mr. Zeldenrust played the Chopin Etude, op. 25, No. 7—the well-known C sharp minor Etude—but that made no difference to the critic; it was all the same to him, so long as the life was pounded out of it.

DICTION is in such close alliance with language as applied to song that (apart from other important considerations) this paper is justified in reprinting an extraordinary editorial that appeared in the Sun of last Sunday on the French and other languages, entitled "French the Dominant Language?" It is in substance a résumé of a series of articles recently given to the world from the talented pen of H. G. Wells, whose erudition entitles him to a foremost position among contemporaneous writers. We recommend the editorial to the careful study of the readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER.

THERE are two items of news on the opera that are of interest, the one being the decision of Jean de Reszké to return to New York to sing next season and the other is that with the help of good health and good fortune Mr. Maurice Grau will continue ad infinitum to manage the opera at the Metropolitan. It is an excellent idea on Mr. Grau's part to insist upon certain modifications and concessions; he will get them and he will remain the manager just as long as he pleases; and pray, why not? The opera question, the superabounding influence of the foreign vocal star is not a managerial question; that is something for the people and will be decided by them. At present they want the foreign vocal star; that is self-evident. Mr. Grau, like any other opera manager, gives them what they want. If the American people had a desire to hear American vocal artists Mr. Grau would furnish them—if he could find any. There has been such emphatic and impressive discouragement that the supply is gradually diminishing to the disappearing point.

Mrs. Mapleson, widow of the impresario, has been left practically unprovided for. She is an elderly lady, and, indeed, one of her children is upward of fifty years of age. She has hitherto been helped by a granddaughter, but this assistance cannot be long continued, and as Mrs. Mapleson is now upward of seventy years of age, and is nearly blind, it is proposed to form a committee with the object of helping her. One would think that Patti and other singers whom Mapleson gave a chance to earn millions would come forward on such an occasion.

THIS is from the Evening Post of last Saturday, and is a continuation of the appeal made by this paper. Patti and other foreign singing stars do not view the matter as does Mr. Finck or THE MUSICAL COURIER, for they are under the impression that they did all they could do for Mapleson when they permitted him to manage them, and that he should have made money or saved money from the vast opportunity that came to him per forza as their manager. It was because he was their manager that this money making opportunity came to him. They really did more than their duty when they signed with him. It is not their fault that he failed or that he had not the quality to put aside money for a rainy day if or when he made it out of their engagements. Then why help the widow? It is none of their affair—that is the argument of the stars.

The Herald's European edition publishes the following:

The Preyer collection of pictures which Senator W. A. Clark, of Montana, has bought is the celebrated private gallery formed by Herr Preyer, the late organist of the Cathedral Church of St. Stefan, at Vienna. It consists of about sixty pictures, got together during the late owner's lifetime.

Among the paintings are works by Boucher, Ruysdael, Van Goyen, Du Tardin, Claude Lorraine, Vigée, Lebrun and Greuze.

It also includes one of the best works of Franz Hals.

The collection was sold for 1,500,000 kronen ($300,000), which sum of money, by the will of the late owner, will be applied to the foundation of an orphan asylum.

AN organist who can collect such gems is a gem himself. Jacob Ruysdaels are very rare and valuable. Greuzes are increasing in value every hour, the Wallace Collection in London, a formidable rival of the Louvre Greuzes, giving opportunity to study this painter to advantage. There are Ruysdaels, Claudes and Greuzes in this country—Chicago, Philadelphia, and here in Greater New York. There is a Hals of the best period in the gallery of the Brooklyn Institute (never mind what it cost); but Hals' portraits and pictures are scarce. Boucher does not rank as high as these, nor does Lebrun, who painted a vast mass of canvas to order. The interesting feature is the fact that an organist collected the gallery; he must have had an income independent of his salary.

Another cablegram to the World says:

VIENNA, December 21.—Senator Clark, of Montana, in purchasing the famous Preyer collection of pictures probably made a record in point of rapidity.

He arranged to arrive in Vienna on the afternoon of December 7, and asked that arrangements be made to light the apartment by electricity, which was specially done at his expense, so that he might view the pictures without delay. Within twenty minutes of the arrival of the Orient express Mr. Clark was in Herr Preyer's apartment, accompanied by Director Bredins, of The Hague Gallery, on whose advice he acted.

The sixty-seven pictures were inspected in ninety-five minutes and a contract for purchasing them for $300,000 was immediately signed.

Herr Preyer was choir conductor of St. Stefan's Church and a born collector. He never would part with any of his treasures, and left injunctions that they were only to be sold as a whole, the proceeds to be devoted to an orphan asylum. His executor, Lawyer Fuchs, carried through the sale.

Dr. Bredins believes that Mr. Clark has made a great bargain, and that if the pictures were sold individually they would fetch a far larger sum than he paid.

But Dr. Bredins declared that Herr Preyer's two supposed greatest prizes, a peasant scene by Rembrandt and a portrait of a woman by Holbein, are falsely so attributed, although very fine pictures. All the remainder are genuine examples of some of the best work of the Dutch and French masters, including a splendid Magdalen by Rubens and a magnificent carnival clown by Franz Hals, as well as striking examples of both Ruysdaels, Memling, Albert, Cuyp, Vandyke, Gerard, Dow, Pieter de Hoogh, Gabriel, Metsu, Ostade and Wouvermans; in fact, all the great Dutch masters.

Senator Clark spent three days in Vienna, devoting two hours of each to inspecting his new treasure, paying for them before leaving.

His purchase is considered here to be far better value and much more interesting than J. Pierpont Morgan's.

THE ABDUCTION OF MISS STONE.

A PERIOD of three months or more has passed since brigands hovering in the spurs of the Balkans succeeded in capturing and abducting an American female Christian missionary and her companion—another missionary—and yet the prisoner has not been ransomed, although this Imperial Government has descended to the disgraceful attitude of bartering for her release instead of giving her the opportunity of martydom, the goal of all honest missionaries. Leaving aside entirely the moral question involved as to the right of civilization to pay a bonus to brigands for the release or exchange of a captive and thereby stimulating the European system, it must appear to every sane mind that Miss Stone and her associates could not have made a very successful propaganda in the section in which they operated if, as a result, Christian society is compelled to recognize brigandage officially, as was done in the very act of negotiating. Miss Stone has not even succeeded during her sojourn with the brigands in converting them to an appreciation of Twentieth Century Christianity; they still hold her and demand money for her release. Consequently that missionary mission must be put down as lamentable a failure as those in China and Japan.

The brigands in the Balkans (who by this time would have been lynched out of existence here in approved form under the Christian methods prevailing at headquarters whence our missionaries are sent forth) are only one type prevailing in Europe. In the very centres of art there exist social brigands into whose hands many of our American girls who were sent to Europe to study music have fallen and who are beyond the stage of ransom. It is readily understood that before a début can be made in opera or under influential circumstances the social brigand of Europe must be consulted, if he has not already taken the subject in hand, subsequently to negotiate with the authorities that grant the début. In some cases it is hardly worth while to ransom the victims, for they are beyond salvation.

So long as this European fad continues the various kinds of brigands all the way from Paris to Constantinople will flourish. Our Christian missionaries, instead of wasting their time and efforts on the regeneration of foreigners and (irony of fate) running the risk of illustrating the hopelessness and futility of the scheme, as Miss Stone's case illustrates, should remain right here at home and take in hand the parents and guardians of the young girls who are affected with the fad that impels them to send their American children to Europe to fall into the conscienceless grasp of the social brigands of the boulevards and the so-called artistic dens of the Continent. That kind of work would soon be effective; but to go to Macedonia or Abyssinia or Ceylon or Nanking or Paoling-fo to convert people who are happy to continue in a religious state which is thousands of years older than any Bible religions, simply to illustrate that they are further away from dogmatic Christianity than ever; that they do not hesitate to fire into Christian legations, murder missionaries in the country districts, where they are supposed to be still more unsophisticated and bland than in the cities, and finally winding up by abducting female missionaries and then compelling Christian society to recognize them officially by negotiation on a money basis—to do this and bring about such results should show us that the missionary scheme, as it appears to us to-day, is an inglorious failure.

Right here is the country where the most approved missionary field can be most successfully cultivated, and the beginning can be made by inducing our American girls to remain at home instead of risking abductions and other ductions at the hands of European brigands. When the missionaries themselves, instead of converting brigands, fall into their power and remain prisoners and fail to secure voluntary release through the intervention of their own divine mission, the situation comes near the appearance of a huge joke. Our isolated train robbers are, in comparison with European brigands, mere amateurs, and at least would not abduct female missionaries. Furthermore, by this time we would have had the whole lot bagged and behind the bars, whereas the European brigand, even much further west than in the Balkan States, is constantly in evidence. It is indeed a joke when the whole situation dawns upon our intelligence. Christian missionaries from the United States abducted by European brigands in Europe and unable to convert them even so much as to secure a release—and women missionaries at that! Oh, for an Offenbach! There is sufficient material in the Stone case to make two delicious acts of the new opera bouffe of the Twentieth Century.

WAGNER AND — NOT REMBRANDT.

IN a glibly written article, "Rembrandt and Richard Wagner," appearing originally in the Musician, and recently reprinted in "Studies in Music," Hugues Imbert considers these divergent geniuses as brothers in art; and though one may admire each of them, yet there is in this article nothing but food for disagreement.

Consider the viewpoint of these two men: Probably no great artist was ever so free from the theatrical aspect of life and incident as was Rembrandt; he presents his subjects with the most masterly simplicity. Wagner, on the other hand, saw life only across the footlights. For him the sun was but a huge calcium, to be turned off or on at will; and out of nature he took only what, according to his scheme, could be turned to account—the forest, the water, birds, fire, storm, the rainbow, lightning and what not else. Into all these he read theatrical meanings, and then put them to purely theatrical uses. And why not? That was his life's hobby, and he died thinking all the world a Wagner stage.

It would be psychologically interesting to know just how much of Wagner the French admirer of his music hears, and just how much is lost in hysteria; for the Frenchman takes his music, as his pleasures and his politics, madly. Most unreasonable is it to ask that the Gaul hear his music through the ears of anyone else, but is it possible to suppose that he would bear the Teutonic stolidness of the music made by Richard of Bavaria if he were to listen to it in an unfrenzied state of mind? Certainly not. He would immediately adjudge it another "péril," and hold public meetings to denounce it.

This brings us to M. Imbert's parallel of Wagner's "Parsifal" and Rembrandt's Christ in the "Pilgrims of Emmaus." Was ever there a Biblical figure contorted more than the one used so impiously by Wagner to fill in the gap between Kundry and Amfortas? George Moore's honest characterization of Parsifal as a "stuffed Christ" is much truer than it sounds. Not only stuffed, but stuffed with German sawdust at that. And does one ever feel in the Rembrandt limning of this wonderful character that the artist has striven for aught save a homely, human representation? Consider the remarkable "Descent from the Cross" and ponder for a moment if in it there is a single trace of the theatrical, a solitary stagy effect. Why even the weight of the body seems too real to be missed. And as for the scene at Emmaus it is too simply outlined ever to give the impression of the mock-real with which all things of the theatre are cloaked.

Imbert finds resemblances between the two artists in the manner that they mass their lights and shadows, and quotes as an example the etching depicting the raising of Lazarus: "He masses the shades behind Christ and projects the stronger light upon Lazarus rising from his coffin and upon the bystanders." Now this is precisely what Wagner would not have done had he treated the incident as he has others in the same vein. Never for an instant would he have allowed his Christ to have escaped the full benefit of a very strong limelight, never would he have allowed his character to sink his individuality in the deed performed. Everywhere with him must there be stage play, stage effect. This crops out again and again. It leads him into the sublimely ridiculous; tempted him to introduce in the Ring a balking horse which usually succeeds in spoiling at least two scenes; induced him to encumber Nibelheim with a redundant dragon. In some things Wagner never grew beyond the nursery.

And the comparison of light and color effects will scarcely bear discussion at all. Think of Rembrandt's eloquent shadows, how he makes his light values "sing" and how it all gets into one's inner self without even forcing a single bar of the imagination. And then turn to Wagner. The "Parsifal" scenery was probably painted according to his orders, and, save for the fact that he was constitutionally displeased with everything except himself, he found in it a carrying out of his ideas. Yet was there on any stage at any time anything half so hideous in coloring, anything so far removed from even the limits of taste in art? The garden of Klingsor resembling some gross wall paper design and the Grail Hall a Turkish smoking room. Mrs. Malaprop spoke better than she knew: Comparisons are odorous.

It is a difficult matter to reduce any one art directly to the plane of another; no two branches of it are governed by even approximately the same conditions. Resemblances, of course, are obviously there, but only resemblances. And if a comparison must be drawn between one and another, the limitations of such should be set forth at the same time. M. Imbert is not the first one to have attempted to find a parallel of Wagner in painting. Ehlert did it, and while the resemblance is greater between his two examples, the experiment does not result in much credit for Wagner. Ehlert has likened him to—Makart. Here the comparison sounds likely and many sane points in common are quotable. But there arises the indubitable objection that Wagner was too great a man to be compared at all with one of Makart's talents. Better leave each one of the greater men to make and hold his own place in his own chosen art.

COMPARISONS.

By Otto Floersheim.

EVERYBODY seems agreed upon the platitude that comparisons are "florodorous," and yet in no country in the world are comparisons indulged in more obstinately and persecutingly than in "God's own." Whether it is the general sporting spirit rampant in the United States, and which finds an outlet in speculations of gigantic size, such as the Standard Oil Company, or the Steel Trust or Amalgamated Copper, or in a smaller degree in the wagerings upon the prowess or powers of endurance of Young Corbett against McGovern, or the greater skill and precision of eye and touch in an 18-inch balk line game of billiards between Schaefer and Slosson, one question is always uppermost, viz., comparison, with its final search after the so-called "world beater." More than a dozen times since my present temporary sojourn in New York I have been asked that one unanswerable question: Who is the greater conductor, Nikisch or Weingartner? Why just these two are selected for comparison is probably because Nikisch is remembered here as one of the world's recognized orchestral interpreters, while Weingartner, who has an equally great reputation in Europe, is talked about as a probable visitor to the United States during the coming season. As for myself I don't believe that the scheme of bringing him over with the Munich Kaim Orchestra can be realized, for, together with the shrewdest and most successful of concert impresarios, Hermann Wolff, of Berlin, I went over the ground repeatedly when it was a question of bringing the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, with Nikisch, over to this country, and the closest calculations always demonstrated that it could not be done with any degree of safety, let alone with a prospect of making money, as the expenses connected with such a transatlantic trip and the necessarily short duration of the tournée would seem to make the financial risk too large, and the chance of a financial success an almost illusory one. What is true for the Berlin Philharmonic must also apply to the Munich Kaim Orchestra, and hence I do not believe that people here will have a chance of making comparisons between the conducting of Arthur Nikisch, as they think they remember it, and Felix Weingartner, which might prove a revelation to them.

Conductors are not racehorses, which may be started off together and upon arriving at the judge's stand get a verdict of superiority one over the other. If the latter were the case the odds would be greatly in favor of Weingartner, simply because he owns the longer pair of legs of the two chefs d'orchestre. It might seem strange that one has to resort to such a simile, but I assure you that it was the one answer which I could find for an inquirer of whom you would think that he ought to know better. He is a chap who conducts several choruses himself, and hence one would not have expected the question, "Who is the greater conductor, Nikisch or Weingartner?" of such a man. It is humiliating for a writer to think that he has taken trouble, time and some brains to explain to his readers over and over again that Weingartner gives carefully worked out, finely finished and reverential readings of the classics; that he is in sympathy with the symphonies of later writers only up to and including Mendelssohn, he being somewhat of a disguised Mendelssohnian in his own compositions, and that a Wagner and Berlioz and Liszt only appeal to him and find adequate reproduction at his hands almost exclusively from the outside, viz., by means of the virtuosity with which the brilliant, coloristic, orchestral garb of their works is brought into prominence by Weingartner, who himself is a virtuoso nature. Brahms to him is a sealed book, and the sorrows of a Tschaikowsky find no echo in his somewhat superficial musical breast. These on the other hand are the strongest interpretations of Nikisch, who is visibly affected when conducting the last symphony of Tschaikowsky, and whose readings of Brahms are replete with the revelations which only closest intimacy with the works of the greatest contrapuntist and symphonist after Beethoven vouchsafes to the loving student of his works. Schumann also is a specialty of Nikisch, for with his keen sense of color he knows, like nobody else I ever heard, how to touch up the defects in the orchestral canvas, make clear the "muddy" spots, bring into prominence what is of thematic value and tone down dynamically what is of secondary importance. How can one compare two such men and say who is the greater conductor of the two?

The question asked almost equally often of me as to the merits of Kubelik as a violinist, and whether the Berlin or the London judgment passed upon this virtuoso was the correct one, has since been decided in favor of Berlin and has become a matter of history. Boston corroborated Berlin, and if New York in a financial and social aspect still seems to support London, it can at least not be denied that the critics did not coincide with the public, but that they one and all found Kubelik's playing "exhibitions of musical immaturity and technical precocity," as William J. Henderson so admirably expressed it in the Times, and in a nutshell.

The third most mooted question, "How do the Berlin orchestras compare with ours?" was the comparatively easiest to answer. As far as the regular and evidently most welcome visitor to New York, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is concerned, I stated once before, that for euphony of sound, for Wohlklang, it outrivaled any orchestra I ever heard, and this comprehensive statement includes all of the principal orchestras of Europe, with the exception of Russia. In virility and decisiveness of utterance, however, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has retrograded, and not even to an inconsiderable degree, since I heard it last under Nikisch more than nine years ago. Gericke's left hand is the cause of it, for that quickly upraised member of the conductor's graceful anatomy dampens and deadens all efforts at enthusiasm which may spring up in the orchestra. "Nipped in the bud" is the most descriptive term for the abortive attempts of the band at making a climax. They missed it every time during the "Siegfried" music in their Wagner program of a fortnight ago, and their reproduction of the cyclopean and heathenish Funeral March was the most dwarfed reading I ever heard or deemed possible.

"But how about our Philharmonic? How does it compare with the Berlin Philharmonic, of which you speak so often in terms more superlative in praise than even of the Royal Orchestra?" Well, a comparison between these two orchestral organizations, the Berlin and the New York Philharmonic societies, must of necessity redound in favor of the former for two reasons. First of all, they are a band of musicians who play together almost daily all the year round. During the entire musical season they give three popular concerts every week, on Sundays, Tuesdays and Wednesdays, at the Philharmonie; then they have their cycle of ten subscription symphony concerts, under Nikisch, with whom they also play at Hamburg and Bremen and travel during spring. In the summer they give three concerts daily at Scheveningen, and they form the assistance at most of all of the soloists' concerts with orchestra that are being given in Berlin. Hence they also have rehearsals most every day all through the season, and as a result of all this they have acquired an amount of routine, ensemble and orchestral technic which no orchestra like the New York Philharmonic ever could possibly gain or could be expected to possess; for these gentlemen meet only a few times every fortnight in order to rehearse the respective programs of their concerts.*

But there are other reasons which likewise make the superiority of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra a foregone conclusion. First of all, young musicians from all other cities of Germany throng to Berlin eager to become members of the renowned organization which offers them fame, ample remuneration and a position for life. Hence the committee, which consists of musicians only, has the pick from among the young musicians all over the country, and, of course, they select only the very best of material, while the New York Philharmonic for its recruiting is limited to such musicians as may chance to live or settle in New York. The recruiting process, however, is also in another way the weak point of the New York Philharmonic, namely, for its lack of weeding out, be it from disinclination to part with old and once valuable members, or be it because the new crop is not forthcoming. And here it is where the difference in German and American institutions of the artistic order becomes most potently apparent. With the Royal Orchestra the Government subvention takes care of such musicians who have served the allotted number of years, and who either through accident or age have become invalidated. In the Berlin Philharmonic the Pension Fund takes the place of Government subvention, and all members in good standing who have grown too old to serve as first-class orchestral musicians can retire from their seats without fear of losing their daily bread. Hence neither Weingartner nor Nikisch is handicapped with such material as the one Emil Paur has to labor with. The New York Philharmonic Orchestra was an excellent body of musicians a quarter of a century ago. They were growing old and stale, however, a decade ago, and now many of them are fast becoming senile. William Henderson calls them "the fathers"; from their efforts at the concerts I attended here I should be inclined to dub them "the grandfathers." How could a just critic blame Paur for the lack of brilliancy and effectiveness in the performance of the Tschaikowsky sixth, last and suicide symphony, when he saw how tremendously the conductor worked for better and more telling results without being able to achieve them simply because his material was irresponsive, wooden and aged? The woodwind did not even possess the technic necessary to perform accurately or in the tempo desired by the composer the passage that sweeps like a gust of wind through the woods in the midst of the march movement. The tremendous call to battle, which, without being as cacophonous as Richard Strauss' same motive in the "Heldenleben," is just as bellicose and stirring, sounded absolutely tame, and the march itself, this marvel of rhythmic pregnancy, which under Nikisch or Safonoff the Moscow conductor's baton seemed to shake the very rafters of the Philharmonie, passed by as haltingly and lame-backed as would Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette."

Under the circumstances you will believe me, therefore, when I state that I did not attend last Saturday night's Philharmonic concert because I had a craving for the "Fidelio" Overture, or

* It may be well to mention here that rehearsals for the Philharmonic concerts are reduced to two or three for each program, and that the members disperse after each concert and rejoin their respective orchestral associations, theatre orchestras and otherwise. We learn that a considerable number of the members of the Philharmonic on Thursday night played up to a late hour Friday morning at different balls and receptions given in this city; and that on Friday night also another considerable number played until early on Saturday morning at balls given in private houses and elsewhere in this city. Such engagements and work in the field of dance music and performances in restaurant and theatre orchestras are not considered compatible with membership in the Berlin Philharmonic.

The conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic is elected in the same way as is the leader of the Philharmonic Orchestra here, by the organization, with this difference, that a large number of the members of the New York Philharmonic are not voting members, and have no voice in the selection of a conductor, there being an inner organization that owns the Philharmonic charter. At some concerts where a larger orchestra is required the Philharmonic of New York engages outside players. This is also sometimes done in Berlin.

Strauss' best symphonic poem, or rather tone painting, "Death and Transfiguration," a veritable Boecklin, by the way, nor yet that Fritz Kreisler drew me to Carnegie Hall, although he "compares" favorably with most any other of the world's famous violinists. No, I had gone thither simply to hear a work which had won such distinction as had not before been conferred upon any other composition in the history of music, viz., a symphony doubly prize crowned. That such honor had never before been achieved by mortal was perhaps due less to the fact that no other symphony was ever more worthy of two prizes than Mr. Hadley's than to the circumstance that no composer before him ever had the—let us say inspiration, to send one and the same work simultaneously into two prize competitions. There is nothing in all the Code Napoleon, nor yet a single paragraph in the new German Civic Law to forbid such a proceeding, but it represents all the lack of innate feeling of ethical law to hit upon such an—inspiration.

From the very fact that Mr. Hadley's symphony, "The Seasons," had carried off both the Paderewski and the New England Conservatory composition prizes, it was well-nigh a certainty that the work contained nothing extraordinary. Extraordinary works will not gain the favor or joint verdict of a single jury composed of various judges, let alone of two such bodies working independently one of the other. The only other supposition permissible would be that the remainder of the works sent in for competition were one and all so inferior in quality and structure that this one was of necessity the one-eyed king among the blind subjects. I suppose, however, that it was the very structure of Mr. Hadley's symphony which made him a double winner. The work is smoothly written, carefully mapped out as regards form, with the exception of the last movement, which incloses a real scherzo episode sandwiched in between "falling leaves" of no musical nor even mood description, but acceptable as a background upon which something might have been painted which remained unpainted. This so vastly planned program is vapid music, a program which might have appalled many a stronger man, and before which even a Richard Strauss would probably have hesitated. To paint the four seasons in four orchestral canvases of ordinary sonata movement form Liszt would have been the only one who had the supererogation to undertake, if the idea had ever struck him. Luckily it did not. Hadley however, rushed in where Strauss would [illegible] to tread. He does so in the first move[illegible] with a theme which is neither bold nor original, but is in the manner of Mascagni, and is announced with great pomposity and treated somewhat in Goldmark's not over difficult canonic style. The orchestration is good here, and more effective still in the scherzo, which up to the trio religiously adheres to Mendelssohn. In the trio, however, which stands in D, the composer falls far short of the greatest of Jewish composer's religion, which knows stupidity as little as theft. This trio is puerile.

The slow movement in D flat shows a principal theme purloined from Grieg, and a "fragment from an Indian love song," which sounds to me more Dvorákian than Indian, especially in the orchestral coloring. Of the finale I spoke before, and as a whole the symphony seems to me not worth half the amount of ink and comment that have been spilt over it by others and myself. I cannot blame Mr. Hadley, however, for having carried off his two prizes, and I cannot even wonder at the fact that he was able to achieve this double victory, for the conditions still prevailing in this country are not apt to produce numerous composers of importance. So far the chase after the almighty dollar is still the principal occupation of this young nation, which has as yet generated no art atmosphere, just as it cannot boast of art traditions. Herein lies the chief difference in the art life of the United States as compared with that of the "effete monarchies" of ancient Europe.

THE amount received by Jan Kubelik as his share of the first week's proceeds from three concerts and a private recital was $4,620, Daniel Frohman taking the other half, from which, however, the expenses had to be deducted.

A GIFT FROM KUBELIK.

Kubelik sent $2,000 of this money to the Philharmonic Society of Prague, Bohemia, as a Christmas present, and received the following cablegram last Friday from that city, via Mr. Frohman's office, Daly's Theatre, here:

33hd Prag 43

Daly's Theater, N. Y.

Jan Kubelik dear friends many hearty thanks for your kingly Christmas box. The benevolent act of your noble mind and generous heart has caused great enthusiasm throughout the country. Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year to you. Ceska Filharmonie.

This is a kind of American Invasion not very distasteful to the people of Europe, but it is not unusual, as, for instance, recent statistics issued by the Post Office showed that close to $1,900,000 was sent from the Money Order Division of the New York Post Office alone to Europe—all in small sums—as Christmas presents. No money is recorded as coming here from Europe. When the American Invasion is discussed these aspects of it seem to be overlooked; but it is probable that an average of a million dollars are taken each year to Europe by artists who come here to play and sing, and this is a low estimate. Paderewski is the first of these artists who has made use of his receipts for charitable and artistic purposes, and Kubelik is apparently following in his footsteps.

The foreign singers to whom millions of American dollars have been paid have not yet shown any inclination to use any part of these millions either for charity or art. The money they make is their own and they are certainly entitled to its disposal as they deem fit; so is this paper entitled to illustrate the difference between the conduct of the vocal artists and Paderewski and Kubelik's royal gift to the Prague Philharmonic. To give 10,000 marks to a Continental musical organization is an unprecedented proceeding; hence the adjectives in the cablegram are justifiable.

King Ludwig of Bavaria possessed the MSS. of Wagner's early works, and three of his early operas will shortly be revived at the Munich Opera House. These are "Rienzi," which at one time was in the Carl Rosa repertory; "Die Feen," which was experimentally revived in 1887, and "Das Liebesverbot," which has, it appears, not been seen on the stage since the remarkable performance at Magdeburg in 1836, when a forgetful tenor eked out his part with reminiscences of "Fra Diavolo" and "Zampa," and half an hour before the curtain rose the prima donna's jealous husband so severely thrashed the second tenor that the luckless man could not appear at all.

The "strafzettel"—a document indicating that a fine has been imposed upon the singer—has been enforced in Mayence, in a case which we believe must be unique in the annals of opera. A singer who was enthusiastically applauded in Rossini's "William Tell" pertinaciously refused, despite the entreaties and commands of the stage manager, to go before the curtain to acknowledge the call. On the Continent fewer than twenty recalls almost constitute a failure; so that, unless it be a magnificently audacious advertisement, this singer's modesty seems to establish a record.

Dr. Martin Blummer, director for many years of the Berlin Singakademie, died November 16, aged seventy-four. He was one of the few survivors of the old school who energetically opposed modern tendencies in music.

Some Richard Strauss Poems.

WE have heard without protest much music of Richard Strauss recently. A few years ago it would have been otherwise; but the human ear is an accommodating organ: what it first rejects with violent scorn it eagerly absorbs later. Strauss has ever offended. I recall the shudder he caused with "Death and Transfiguration," and the names hurled at him for the brutal brilliancies of "Don Juan." Yet he is the greatest living musician. Wagner is a classic, Brahms a demi-god, while Tschaïkowsky came into his own only too quickly for permanence of fame. So the sceptre is passed over to Richard II. That he is not dreaming in that strange-colored atmosphere—evolved magician-like—is proved by his enormous activity. Germany just now is wrangling over his "Feuersnoth"—"The Famine of Fire"—and judging from the vocal score I can't wonder. Strauss in it avenges the indifference displayed toward his "Guntram."

The vogue of this composer is a recent one. His F minor Symphony was composed in 1883; "Italia," 1886; "Macbeth," 1887; "Don Juan," 1888; "Tod und Verklärung," 1889; "Till Eulenspiegel," 1895; "Also Sprach Zarathustra," 1896; "Don Quixote," 1897; "Ein Heldenleben, 1898.

"Italia" is an early work—it contains in solution much that we recognize in the Strauss of to-day. When it was first heard here it was pronounced noisy and unmusical. To-day it sounds as clear as a Mozart rondo. Here is a chance for the anti-Strauss contingent to wag wise heads: "If Strauss had but adhered to this brilliant and comprehensible style"—and in ten years some of us may groan over the decadence of a Strauss whose "Don Quixote," "Also Sprach Zarathustra" and "Ein Heldenleben" were miracles of music, pure and undefiled! The world moves quickly in its musical grooves, for music is but a disporting dream mirror always in advance of ourselves.

The score of "Death and Transfiguration" is prefixed by a poem written—so Otto Floersheim tells me—by the late Richard Pohl, and written after hearing the work. This disposes of the composer's alleged attempts to depict the repulsive physical details of a sick room. But even suppose this had been Strauss' original idea! How about the death scene of "Tristan"? Is there anything quite so realistic in music? Critical objection here is baseless. The poem deals with the struggles of a human soul, and because it is an unnamed one it is none the less heroic. It might be Napoleon's or Amiel's. The soul is the thing to catch the conscience of a composer; one's own soul is the most interesting thing on earth. In "Death and Transfiguration" there is a battlefield of good and evil, death against belief. "He is saved" is uttered Goethe-like at the close. This music is optimistic, not pessimistic, not decadent. It voices anew the eternal query: What does it profit a man if he gains the whole world and lose his own soul? Here is the prose poem Englished by W. F. Apthorp:

"In the necessitous little room, dimly lighted by only a candle end, lies the sick man on his bed. But just now he has wrestled despairingly with Death. Now he has sunk exhausted into sleep, and thou hearest only the soft ticking of the clock on the wall in the room, whose awful silence gives a foreboding of the nearness of death. Over the sick man's pale features plays a sad smile. Dreams he, on the boundary of life, of the golden time of childhood?

"But Death does not grant sleep and dreams to his victim. Cruelly he shakes him awake and the fight begins afresh. Will to live and power of Death! What frightful wrestling! Neither bears off the victory, and all is silent once more!

"Sunk back tired of battle, sleepless, as in fever-frenzy the sick man now sees his life pass before his inner eye, trait by trait and scene by scene. First the morning red of childhood, shining bright in pure innocence! Then the youth's saucier play—exerting and trying his strength—till he ripens to the man's fight, and now burns with hot lust after the highest prize of life. The one high purpose that has led him through life was to shape all he saw transfigured into a still more transfigured form. Cold and sneering, the world sets barrier upon barrier in the way of his achievement. If he thinks himself near his goal, a 'Halt!' thunders in his ear. 'Make the barrier thy stirrup! Ever higher and onward go!' And so he pushes forward, so he climbs, desists not from his sacred purpose. What he has ever sought with his heart's deepest yearning, he still seeks in his death-sweat. Seeks—alas! and finds it never. Whether he comprehends it more clearly or that it grows upon him gradually, he can yet never exhaust it, cannot complete it in his spirit. Then clangs the last stroke of Death's iron hammer, breaks the earthly body in twain, covers the eye with the night of death.

"But from the heavenly spaces sounds mightily to greet him what he yearningly sought for here: deliverance from the world, transfiguration of the world!"

The time is not afar when the symphonic poems of Richard Strauss will be given in a specially devised opera house; when one will occupy an evening, and send home with nerves unstrung, brain and soul on fire the devoted disciple of the greatest living composer, the greatest master of orchestration that has thus far appeared. And Mr. Paur might do worse things than play us an entire Strauss program, beginning with "Don Juan" for the first Allegro of this gigantic symphony, "Till Eulenspiegel" for the Scherzo, and "Also Sprach Zarathustra" for a thunderous Finale.

Despite the fact that it is preceded only by "Italia," "Macbeth" and "Don Juan," "Tod und Verklärung" gives us in esse all the overpowering qualities of Strauss, chiefest of them being imagination without the obscenities and ugliness detected by sensitive natures in later compositions.

"Death and Transfiguration" is a masterpiece. The nineteenth century, with its devotion to the material, nevertheless produced some poets and prose masters for whom death had a peculiar predilection. There is the mystic Maeterlinck, with his sobbing shadowgraphs of Death the Intruder; Tolstoy, with his poignant picture of the Death of Ivan Illyitch; Arnold Böcklin, that Swiss master, who sang on elegiac canvas his "Toten Insel"; and have we not all read Walt Whitman in his matchless threnody "When lilacs last in the door-yard bloomed"? It is not strange, then, that Strauss, a lyric philosopher of the same passionate pattern as Friedrich Nietzsche, should wrestle with a problem old as eternity. He does it in this symphonic poem—does it by the use of large symbolism, free from the morbidities of the minor decadent poets; accomplishes it in a way that wrings the very heartstrings.

Yet it is but the spectacle of a sick man in "a necessitous little chamber" reviewing his struggles and defeats as the fever cracks his veins and throttles his life. He has failed as failed Balzac's Louis Lambert, as fail all men with lofty ideals. He has reached that "squat tower" of defeat, death, which Robert Browning chanted in "Childe Roland." To the dark tower he goes, and dauntless at the last he sets the slughorn to his lips and blows victory in the very teeth of Death. Perhaps this most modern of poems gives the key to the Strauss music better than any other in the English tongue. The dying man sunken in lethargic slumber, his heart feebly beating in syncopated rhythms, recalls his childhood, his lusty youth, his mad passion for life in its thickest.

He toils and reaches summits only to hear the implacable "Halt!" of destiny. Yet he continues to combat Fate, only to be laid low. And dying, he triumphs; for his ideal lifts him to the heights, to "Sun-Smitten Sunium." He has dared, and daring conquers. The fable is old—as old as the Prometheus myth. In music we have it incarnated in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the tonality of which—C minor, C major—Strauss has adopted. Liszt, too, in his "Tasso," a symphonic setting of Goethe's tragedy, attempted the same task, accomplishing it in a brilliant, spectacular fashion. He is not a dramatic psychologist of the Strauss calibre. If Richard Wagner had completed the "Faust" trilogy it might have matched "Tod und Verklärung."

The thematic grouping of the Strauss poem is simplicity itself when compared to the towering architectonics of "A Hero's Life" and "Thus Spake Zarathustra." After a lengthy prologue in which mood, atmosphere, Stimmung in a word—and echoes of childish babbling are subtly contrived, the bolt of destruction is let loose, and fever, a hideous spectre, courses through the Allegro. The Ideal motive sounds but in gasping, broken accents. It is only after the delirum has reached its climax that a period of repose, an analogy of the lyric period is attained. The childhood of the man is lisped naïvely; youth and its frolicking unconsciousness are aptly portrayed; manly passion and conflict end the section, for the ominous "Halt!" is blared out by the trombones. The development—as in all developments of this composer—contains miracles of counterpoint buried in passages of emotional splendor. With cumulative power and pathos we hear a climax of imposing sonorities; the march-like motive of the Ideal is heard in all its majesty, and in a C major of rainbow riches the poem finishes.

Strauss has never surpassed the plangency of coloring, the melting sweetness of this score. He is more philosophic in "Also Sprach Zarathustra," more dramatic in "Don Juan," more heroic in "Ein Heldenleben," but never has his message been so consoling, never has he set so vividly over his orchestra the arc of promise. That such music came forth from his potent youth is a prophecy of astounding future. He is the only living issue in music to-day; no other master has his stride, his stature.

That merry old rogue's tune "Till Eulenspiegel" is a scherzo-like rondo picturing the crazy pranks of the historic Tyll Owlglass; it has been played here by Mr. Paur and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its grotesque, passionate melancholy, tender violence, its streaks of broad humor interrupted by mocking pathos, its galloping down a narrow avenue, at the end of which looms the gibbet, its mockery of custom, flaunting of the Philistine and the unrepentant death of Till make it a picture unparalleled in music literature. Scored brilliantly the rondo leaves in its trail a whiff of sulphur and violets. It is fantastic music, fantastically conceived, fantastically executed.

"Don Quixote," op. 35, being a theme with variations on certain episodes in the life of Don Quixote de la Mancha, was first played in America by Theodore Thomas, January 6, 1899. It is yet to be heard here or in Boston. Arthur Mees has written a descriptive study of the work, and there is an analysis in German by Arthur Hahn. Strauss in character drawing, his profound powers of psychology are at their best in this extraordinary composition. In the introduction we hear the gallant knight, his brain fired by chivalric deeds of derring-do, reading from his beloved volumes of adventure. Fancy a muted tuba! By muting the brass in the conflict with the giants Strauss shows them to be the figments of the Don's imagination. His own "knightly" theme, caricatured in dissonances with a wild harp glissando, reveals his madness and also marks his entrance into the real world accompanied by the doughty Sancho Panza. Ten variations follow, beginning with the windmills, ending with his death. The knight and squire ride through the air on their wooden Pegasus, blindfolded, the wind whistling about their ears—chromatic flute passages, harp, kettle drum and a specially devised wind machine—only to realize later that their steed has never left the ground—this fact being impressed on the listeners by the continued trilling of the brasses throughout the movement. But I leave you to read Mr. Mees' admirable analysis. The poem is philosophic, humorous, ironic, genial and musical—do not forget that, with all his deviations from the normal, Strauss is always musical. His inventive skill, his feeling for the characteristic phrase, his characteristic harmonic hue are exhibited here in their happiest.

Of "Also Sprach Zarathustra" and its titanic profile I have nothing new to say. Readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER, December, 1897, may remember the study made of this work. Thanks to Mr. Paur, we remember the Nature theme with its mighty transition from C major to C minor; the [illegible] he Credo; the dwellers in the [illegible] and the sensuous thrilling sweep of the joys and passions. Science and its crawling fugue, the dance—O, most exacerbating of dances—the night song and the daring dissonances at the close, all these remain images of eternity. It is music the like of which has never before been heard on earth. That alone constitutes a claim for originality quite irrespective of liking or disliking it.

"No mask! NO mask!" cries the terrified Camilla in "The King in Yellow." As we may remember, Robert W. Chambers relates the tale of a terrible play which poisons the minds of its readers. There are many to whom Richard Strauss' tone poem "Ein Heldenleben" proves as musically baneful. What many have thought and still think is not true. Strauss wears no mask. His own musical lineaments, convulsed in passion's grimace, exultant with grandiose dreams, or distorted by deadly rage, are the naked expression of his fantastic soul. And to the orthodox his contempt for clear tonalities, his mockery of the very harmonic foundations of the art, his juggling with bizarre rhythms—in a word, his avoidance of the normal, the decent, the facile, the smug and the unoriginal is as great a crime against ethics as the lucidly insane proclamations of the Master Immoralist, Friedrich Nietzsche.

Yet further hearings convince one regarding Strauss' sincerity. He is working out his own artistic salvation on his premeditated own lines. He is the solitary soul of Hauptmann, and he is doomed to mockery until he is understood.

It is impossible to escape the compelling magnetism of the man from Munich. He is still young, still in his storm and stress period. When the time for clarification comes Strauss in this final analysis will emerge a very big man. His "Hero's Life" has its ugly spots—critics and criticism are objectified in a cruelly sardonic fashion—and that battlefield will remain for this generation either sheer brutal noise or also the forefront of the higher æstheticism in music. One way or the other it matters little: the reputation of Strauss will not stand or fall by this poem. He has written others—"Also Sprach Zarathustra" and "Tod und Verklärung." The main thing to record is the overwhelming impression of power, anarchistic if you will, that informs "Ein Heldenleben." And all the more disquieting is the discovery that this Pied Piper of Dreams wears no antique musical mask—his own is tragic and significant enough.

And let it be said here that for conventional program music Strauss has ever manifested a violent aversion. The only clue he gives to his work is the title. Highly imaginative commentators do the most mischief, for they read into this music every imaginable meaning. It is then as absolute music that "Ein Heldenleben" must be criticised, though the names of the various subdivisions give the hearer, if not a key, at least notion of the emotional trend of this composition. This is the way Richard Strauss has outlined the scheme of his E flat Symphony, op. 40, his "Eroica":

I.—The Hero. II.—The Hero's Antagonists. III.—The Hero's Consort. IV.—The Hero's Battlefield. V.—The Hero's Works of Peace. VI.—The Hero's Retirement from Worldly Life and Strife and Ultimate Perfection.

It must be remembered that this is a purely arbitrary arrangement, for in the formal sense the ground plan of the symphony would be thus: The first three sections contain the thematic statements; the next two—parts four and five—are devoted to the exposition or free fantasia; the last is a highly elaborate summing up or Coda. Here is the symphonic form in an attenuated shape, the chief novelty being the introduction in part five—or second division of the working-out section—of new thematic material, modest quotations from the Strauss earlier symphonic works.

There can then be no doubt as to the identity of the protagonist of this drama-symphony—it is the glorified image of Richard Strauss. This latter exploitation of personality need not distress us unnecessarily; Strauss but follows in the footsteps of Walt Whitman and of his own contemporaries—Rodin, the sculptor; Gabriel d'Annunzio, in "Il Fuoco"; Nietzsche, in "Zarathustra"; Tolstoy, in all his confessions—despite their inverted humility; Wagner, in "Meistersinger"; Franz Stuck, the Munich painter, whose portrait of his own eccentric self is not the least of his powerful work. Strauss might appreciatively quote Walt Whitman: "Am I of mighty Manhattan the son?" as a justification of what paradoxically could be called his objective egotism. But the composer not only deifies the normal man, he shadows forth Nietzsche's supernormal humanity. He is a very Victor Hugo in his colossal egotism, yet he names it the ego of mankind. So, putting aside all this welter of philosophy and æsthetics, one is forced to return to the music as absolute music.

The Hero theme is Beethovian in its majesty—the entire section has a Beethoven color, despite its dissonantal interruptions—while the second section, an amiable picture of the composer's adversaries, suggests in a tricturated manner the irony, caricature and burlesque spirit of "Till Eulenspiegel." His critical adversaries are represented as a snarling, sorry crew, with acrid and acrimonious souls, duly set forth by the woodwind instruments, chiefly the oboe; there is also a horrid sounding phrase, empty fifths for tenor and bass tuba. Then the hero's wife is pictured by the solo violin, and it must be confessed that her theme is banal. It mounts in passion and interest after the duologue. After that—chaos! It is but the developing of the foregoing motives. And such an exposition, it is safe to say, has never been heard since saurians roared in the steaming marshes of the young planet, or when prehistoric man met in multitudinous and shrieking combat. Yet the web is polyphonically spun—spun magnificently.

It is all too intricate to grasp at several hearings, though it may become child's play for the next generation. Richard Wagner's case must not be forgotten at this point. So complex is the counterpoint of Strauss that one of his commentators recommends the all but impossible feat of listening to it horizontally and vertically. In the fifth part we hear themes from the composer's "Don Juan," "Macbeth," "Death and Transfiguration," "Till Eulenspiegel," "Zarathustra," "Don Quixote," "Guntram" and his lovely song, "Traum durch die Dämmerung." With the Coda, after some sinister retrospection of an agitated life, comes peace, pastoral, soul renewing.

There is some repellent music in the score, but then the neo-realists insist on truth, not on the pursuit of vague and decorative beauty. It is the characteristic versus the ornamental; and who shall dare predict its future success or extinction? One thing must be insisted upon—the absolute abandonment of the old musical rubric, else Strauss and his tendencies go by the board. The well sounding, the poetic—in the romantic sense—are thrown to the winds in this monstrous orgie—an organized orgie in the Balzac meaning of the phrase—for Strauss is only mad north-northwest, and can always tell a harmonic hawk from a hernshaw. In his most delirious moments he remembers his orchestral palette. And what a gorgeous, horrible color scheme is his! He has a taste for sour progressions, and every voice in his orchestral family is forced to sing impossible and wicked things. He owes much to Beethoven, Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner—the Wagner of "Tristan" and "Parsifal"—and at times he compasses both beauty and grandeur.

And he is one of the greatest masters of his art by virtue of his profound science, fantasy, heaven-scaling audacity and tremendous musical temperament.

Of "The Famine of Fire," Carl Söhle writes in Musikalische Wochenblatt. And he is by no means a Straussian: "The eagerly awaited one act opera 'Feuersnoth,' by Richard Strauss, was brought out by von Schuch with all the brilliancy of a Dresden première, but unfortunately achieved only a succès d'estime. Is 'Feuersnoth' better adapted for the stage than 'Guntram'? Despite the fact that in the former Strauss steps merrily in the footprints of the 'Meistersinger,' the public in its 'compact majority' drew a long face when the curtain fell. Of course this is no criterion; one knows the reception usually accorded works which break away from the conventional order of things—yet 'Feuersnoth' does not seem to be a revolutionary work in any particular—Strauss does not show any new phase of himself in it. One would imagine that, given an acquaintance with Strauss' originality in music, this new work should not be difficult to comprehend, and that his orchestral compositions are growing in popularity is proven by the constantly increasing demand for repetitions of these.

"In 'Feuersnoth' there are satire, foolishness and the 'Beckmesser'-'Eulenspiegel' idea in the variation, of which he does not tire. Whence all this gall and spleen in Master Strauss? In view of the early recognition of his genius, this role as a martyr of progress ill becomes him. Recall the cases of Wagner and Liszt, where in the one instance the plenitude of glory came to him late in life, and in the case of Liszt honors as a composer were denied him until after his death.

"To give a general idea of 'Feuersnoth' is to describe it as the kernel of 'Meistersinger' and 'Till Eulenspiegel' transposed to a one act opera.

"The composer has used for the groundwork an idea taken from a Netherland saga. With all respect for Wagner, I applaud the fact that Strauss possesses so much self-denial as to have the book of this opera prepared by a professional librettist—perhaps he recalled the soggy libretto of his 'Guntram.' 'Feuersnoth! Minnegebot!' Kunrad der Ebner—relative of the well-known young knight from Franconia—young, handsome and irresistible, sees and loves his Evchen, and the row begins. Here, too, the time selected is 'Johannistage.' Evchen—now called 'Diemut'—daughter of the Burgomaster, is full of tricks; the kiss stolen in public makes her revengeful of love, and she traps the loving swain and imprisons him in front of her window. The tricky woman leaves suspended in midair the provision basket containing her lover, who had planned this means for ascending to the beloved one. To insult now is added injury—the scorned love above and from below the taunting chorus of Philistines—all this needs be punished. And, see, the spell works, for instantly all light, all fire, in the town dies out. Feuersnoth—Dearth of Fire. And in the wake of this famine naturally much complaint and distress; punishment awaits the sinner: 'Down scoundrel! No fooling. We'll hang you much higher.' But Master Kunrad has by this time climbed to the overhanging joist, and settling himself drops his stage name, and as Richard Strauss, the Hofkapellmeister, in life size, reads his beloved city of Munich a very severe sermon:

"Im Hause, das ich heut zerhaun,
Haust Reichard einst, der Meister,
Der was kein windiger Gaukler, traun,
Der herhe Herrscher der Geister.
Der warb um eure Herzen lang,
Gewann der Grossten Gunst—
Allein euch Kleinen macht er bang,
Blieb all sein Werben umsonst.
Hat sich wacker mit euch geplagt,
Der Stadt gross Ruhm gebracht,— Schmählich habt ihr ihn ausgejagt
In neidischer Niedertracht. * * *
Da triebt ihr den WAGNER aus dem Thor—
Den bösen Feind, den triebt ihr nit aus—
Der stellt sich euch immer aufs Neu zum STRAUSS."

"This the good residenters of Munich must calmly put in their pipes, and in answer can only bleat like the lambs in 'Don Quixote.' So they do anything to get back their fire again, and the lovers are given each other in happiness. Be it remarked that the old Burgomaster is a strangely complacent father, and does not interpose the slighest obstacles. And at the end it reads—though sadly labored the words—

"All Wärme quilt vom Weibe,
All Licht von Liebe stammt—
Aus heiss-jungfräulichem Leibe
Einzig das Feuer euch neu erflammt."

"The libretto of Ernst von Wolzogen is, as might have been suspected, reeking with the atmosphere of the 'Uberbrettl'; and according to the above quoted ending several virtues might be wrecked on it; at any rate, it is nothing for the 'Dresdener Pensionate,' which has its Bungert. Throughout this threadbare text the psychological consideration is kept fresh and humorous. Great was the expectation to see how the liberally used Munich dialect would sound with the Strauss music. But alas! the flood of music washed away all of this; music remains an ideal speech in which the character of dialect is an impossibility. In this case even the realism of a Richard Strauss has met unsurmountable obstacles—here this is plainly proven.

"The music to 'Feuersnoth' is well worthy of Strauss, both in imagination and content, and displays all the marvels of the Strauss orchestration. Unprecedented 'geniality' of coloring, and in addition to this an abundance of fresh and national melody such as Strauss himself has never before equaled. Most prominent is the charming waltz, later the airy love scene with the gracile nightingale woodwind polyphony. The latter is probably the richest, but it would seem to be a bit out of key with the situation, inasmuch as the entire work can only be reckoned as a farce; and so this sudden Tristan-like outburst of the lovers—or to be more accurate, the betrothed ones—does not seem to be in keeping. But when the fire dies out, and again when it rekindles, there sounds the lost wonderful music which expresses the mood entirely; all this with the most daring combination of motives and with tremendous climax. For the chorus there is much work and to these numbers Strauss has devoted much of his skill. Treatment of the voice is the weakest part of 'Feuersnoth,' as it was of 'Guntram.' The orchestra tells everything. True, in the 'sermon,' beautifully sung by Scheidemantel, there are traces of more singable moments.

"That Strauss can compose in every branch, even opera—not to forget his glorious songs—this he proves with 'Feuersnoth.' But the field particularly his own remains that of instrumental composition."

THE DUSS CONCERT BAND.

MANAGER JOHNSTON has definitely arranged for the appearance of the Duss Concert Band in New York at the beginning of the summer season. This organization, assisted by soloists, will give a concert in the Metropolitan Opera House Sunday night, May 25. Immediately thereafter a three months' tour will begin. The band will visit all the principal summer resorts.

The announcement in a recent issue of THE MUSICAL COURIER that Mr. Johnston had become the manager of the Duss Concert Band has aroused interest. There is a desire to hear this body of musicians, led by Mr. Duss, who holds a unique position in the world of music. Capable critics who have heard this band and seen Mr. Duss wield the baton concur in the opinion that the combination is an interesting one in many respects.

The repertory of the band is large, embracing compositions in various forms and illustrating the classic and the modern in music. In this repertory are many taking compositions of Mr. Duss, for he is a composer as well as a conductor. These works have been played to immense audiences in Pittsburg, Cincinnati and other cities and have been well received.

Mr. Duss anticipates with much pleasure the forthcoming tournée of his band. This promises to be very successful.

The Allentown (Pa.) Morning Call said of William Bauer's appearance there recently with Leonora Jackson, in the annual fall concert of the Euterpean Club: "William Bauer, the pianist, added greatly to the delightfulness of the program by his accompaniments, as well as his solos, which were characterized by delicacy of touch and much depth of feeling."

Silence Dales' Success.

THE violinist Miss Silence Dales, of Lincoln, Neb., who is well and favorably known in the West, and who scored a signal triumph for herself and for her State at the Pan-American Exposition at Buffalo, is now on a professional visit to Salt Lake City and the adjoining region. Recently she was one of the assisting artists at the Tabernacle choir concerts in Salt Lake and also in recital with Miss Carrie Bridewell, of the Grau Grand Opera Company.

The following press notices attest her success:

* * * Miss Dales fairly captured her hearers. Her bowing and technic are far in advance of other girl violinists, and she shows great improvement since her appearance here with the Orpheus Club in January, 1900. Then the Tribune said: "She is the best girl violinist ever heard here," and to-day that can be accentuated. She has a winsome appearance, is careful in all her movements, and puts her whole heart in her work. She finely rendered the Bruch G minor Concerto; Romance, by Rubinstein, and "Bee," by Schubert-Liszt. * * * —Salt Lake Tribune.

* * * She is a violinist of rare attainments, and plays with a feeling and depth rarely witnessed even in the most accomplished male performers. She gave several numbers last night, and was warmly applauded after each.—Deseret Evening News.

* * * Miss Dales, the violinist, created a furore in her number, Bruch's Concerto in G minor. * * * She has the faculty of getting tone volume out of a violin such as is possessed by few performers on that instrument. * * *.—Salt Lake Herald.

The following are extracts from an article written for the Deseret Evening News (Salt Lake) by Prof. J. J. McClellan, the accomplished organist of the Tabernacle and professor of music in the University of Utah:

* * * For a young woman to so sway her audience and hold its complete attention by her fine technic, musicianly phrasing and superior bowing is a rare occurrence in these parts. Miss Dales is not a "girl violinist." She is a mature artist upon the violin, one that breathes through it, makes it a thing of life and thrills every hearer. A more graceful bow arm is seldom seen; in fact, this is one of her strong points, and her bowing is an object lesson to our violin students. * * * Miss Dales plays upon a seemingly famous violin and brings from it all there is in it. Thoroughly mature and thoughtful, she is an artist bound to be known the world over if she continues on her upward course. All in all, Miss Silence Dales is a superb artist, and I am happy not only that I have had the privilege of accompanying her but of hearing her charming work.

Miss Dales plays a grand old violin built by Alexander Gagliano, pupil and contemporary of Stradivarius. In 1702 the same maker made a violin especially for Corelli, which instrument has come down to the present time through the hands of a number of the world's most famous players, and is now owned by William Worth Bailey. Experts to whom both instruments are known adjudge the specimen owned by Miss Dales to be a close second if not fully equal in tone quality and carrying power to the now historic Corelli violin.

Charlotte Maconda.

MME. CHARLOTTE MACONDA has returned from her successful tour to the far West. From time to time we have published enthusiastic press criticisms about her singing, and we here add two more opinions:

Mme. Charlotte Maconda, a singer who has never before been heard in Denver, delighted an appreciative audience at Trinity Church last night, where she gave a recital, assisted by the College of Music Choral Union.

Madame Maconda was in fine voice and rendered each number on the program with a spirit, grace and delicacy which has seldom been equaled in this city.

The program opened with the march and chorus from Wagner, which was well executed by the Choral Union. Madame Maconda sang a generously lengthy program, rendering vocal gems in French, Italian, Spanish and English. A little group of simple ballads, including Foote's "Irish Folksong" and Nevin's "'Twas April," seemed to especially please the audience. Perhaps, however, the gem of the evening was the Polonaise, which Maconda sang with such sweetness, charm and flexibility that she was encored again and again. The high notes had the purity and clearness of the song of a bird, while the trills and staccato notes fell like perfect pearls upon the ears of the audience. She was accompanied by Frederick Schweikher. We have not had in the city so fine a concert singer as Madame Maconda.—Denver (Col.) Times.

Mme. Charlotte Maconda made a most agreeable impression. Professor Torrens unhesitatingly says of her that she is the coming soprano singer of the land. Her voice is one of surpassing richness and is used exquisitely. In quality and style it is much like Sembrich's, and it reflects a most careful and intelligent coaching. Finer singing one could not ask to hear and her delighted auditors are quite ready to agree with Professor Torrens concerning her future. Madame Maconda sang a selection from Verdi's "Traviata" and the Polonaise from Thomas' "Mignon," and the solo with the chorus number (Gounod), "From Thy Love as a Father." In each she was superb and the applause which came from the delighted audience left no doubt as to her triumph.—Morning Star, Rockford, Ill., December 17, 1901.

Oscar Franklin Comstock will give his third studio recital in Washington, D. C., next Wednesday. He will sing two of Berenice Thompson's "Three Songs from Some Verses," the words of which are by Helen Hay, the daughter of Secretary of State John Hay.

FRENCH THE DOMINANT LANGUAGE?

(From last Sunday's New York Sun—See Editorial.)

IN the eighteenth century French was spoken currently, if not exclusively, at almost every court on the Continent of Europe, and was accounted indispensable, not only by English diplomatists but also by English travelers. It then bade fair to become the medium of universal intercommunication. There has been so marked a change in this respect that the prospect of French becoming a world tongue, so far as civilized peoples are concerned, is commonly looked upon as extinct, even by Frenchmen themselves, who since 1870 have taken a gloomy view of their future under all its aspects.

A very different forecast is made by H. G. Wells, the author of the remarkable series of articles entitled "Anticipations," which have been in course of publication in the Fortnightly and North American reviews. In a recent number of the Fortnightly the conviction was expressed by Mr. Wells that neither English nor German, but French, has the best chance of becoming a world language; that is to say, the language which educated persons in all countries will be most powerfully incited to learn in addition to their own.

It is pointed out that among persons not actually subject to British or American rule, and neither waiters nor commercial travelers, the inducements to learn English rather than French or German do not increase but actually decrease. The decisive factor in the matter is the amount of science and thought which the acquisition of a language will open to the man who learns it. It is, therefore, pronounced a fact of great significance that the number of books at present published in English is less than that published in French or German, and that the proportion of serious books is very greatly less.

Moreover, the existing conditions of book production for the English reading public offer no hope of any immediate change in this particular. Mr. Wells directs attention to the fact that there is neither honor nor reward —there is not even food or shelter—for the American or the Englishman who devotes a year or so of his life to the adequate treatment of any spacious question; and so small is the English reading public with any special interest in science that a great number of important foreign scientific works are not even translated into English. Such translations as do see the light are made only to sell, and are too often the work of ill-paid women and girls, who have no special knowledge of the matter to be translated. English publishers do not care to bring out serious books, alleging that these do not pay, which is but another way of saying that there is no reading public for such productions. There is no body of great men either in England or the United States, no intelligence in the British court, that might by any form of recognition compensate the philosophical or scientific writer for poverty and popular neglect.

In fine, the more powerful a man's intelligence, the more distinctly he must see that to devote himself to increasing the scientific or philosophical wealth of the English tongue will be to sacrifice comfort, the respect of the bulk of his contemporaries, and all the most delightful things of life, for the barren reward of a not very certain [illegible] self-applause. Mr. Wells concedes that [illegible] if they were merely the grievances of the [illegible] well enough be allowed to rest there. He insists, however, that they must be recognized in any forecast of the future of the English tongue, because the intellectual decline of the literature published in English involves ultimately the decline of the language, and of all the political possibilities that go with the wide extension of a language.

Mr. Wells has no doubt that German will be disseminated beyond its natural limits during the coming years, but not to the same extent as French. It is admitted that there are more books published in Germany than in France, just as there are more books published in France than in England; but it is pronounced questionable whether the reader of German has quite such a catholic feast spread before him as has the reader of French. Whatever may be said of French fiction on some grounds, it is indisputably attractive to foreigners; on the other hand, there is a mass of German fiction that is probably as uninteresting to a foreigner as are the great majority of English and American novels.

Then, again, German, as compared with French, is unmelodious and unwieldy; and, in print, it is cursed with a blinding lettering that the German is now too patriotic to sacrifice. Before the War of 1870 there was a growing tendency to print German books, that looked forward to an audience wider than a national one, in the Roman type which is used by Englishmen, Frenchmen, Italians, Spaniards and Portuguese; but there has since been a reaction in favor of the Gothic type, which is so trying to read. A similar patriotic tendency has checked the development of new words of classical origin. By insisting upon the evolution of scientific terms from Teutonic roots the Germans have obstructed the international use of such terms. The indigenous German technical word is clumsy, and remains compromised by its every-day relations, to the end of time dragging a lengthening chain of unsuitable associations. The shade of meaning, the limited qualification, that a Frenchman can attain with a mere twist of the sentence, the German must either abandon or laboriously overstate with some colossal worm cast of parenthesis. That the German and French tongues will come into conflict for ascendancy in Continental Europe Mr. Wells feels assured, and he is disposed to believe that French will become preponderant in the great urban region that will arise about the Rhine.

We have said that the number of books published in French is greater than that published in English. This fact of itself demonstrates that the French reading public is something different and very much larger than the existing French political system. Other facts, often overlooked, are noted by Mr. Wells, to wit, there is a critical reception for a work published in French that is one of the few things worth a writer's having; and, again, the French translators are the most alert and efficient in the world. One has only to see a Parisian bookshop, we are told, and to recall an English one, to realize the unattainable standing of the French. The English shopful is either brand new fiction or illustrated narratives of travel, or gilded versions of the classics of past times, done up to give away. The French bookshop, on the other hand, reeks of contemporary intellectual life; the serried ranks of lemon covered volumes cover the whole range of human thought and interest.

Then, too, as we have said, the Frenchman has with the Englishman and the Italian a certain community of technical, scientific and philosophical phraseology, so that it is often easier for an Englishman with some special knowledge of his subject to read and appreciate a subtle and technical work in French than it is for him to read a French novel. Morever, French technical terms, being derived from the Latin or the Greek, are not so immediately and constantly brought into contrast and contact with their roots as they would be if, like so many patriotic German technicalities, they were derived from native radicals. They are, consequently, free to qualify and develop a final meaning distinct from their original intention. In the growing and changing body of science this counts for much.

As between French and German, it is finally to be noted that against the former tongue are arrayed hostile frontiers. Germany has hostile neighbors who fear her ascendancy, and have set their hearts against the use of her language. Among the Slav, Bohemian and Hungarian peoples, and in Roumania, French will attack German in the flank, and will have a clear prospect of predominance.

NATIONAL CONSERVATORY

Aids the McKinley Memorial Fund.

A MODEL program was presented at the concert which the National Conservatory of Music gave at the Madison Square Concert Hall last Wednesday evening for the benefit of the McKinley Memorial Fund. This conservatory, founded by Miss Jeannette L. Thurber, has now a world-wide reputation. Men and women of international fame are at the head of the departments. The work of four of these departments, by the way, was shown to great advantage at the concert, namely, the orchestral, directed by Leo Schulz; the piano, directed by Rafael Joseffy; singing, directed by Eugene Dufriche, and violin, directed by Leopold Lichtenberg. The National Conservaotry Orchestra is composed of students and teachers of the conservatory. For special concerts, professionals are engaged sometimes to assist the wind choir.

The playing of the orchestra last Wednesday night was excellent, and no end of the credit belongs to the conductor, Mr. Schulz, for the smooth performance. Evidently there had been more than one rehearsal. The numbers played by the orchestra were Mendelssohn's Fourth Symphony in A major and the overture to Beethoven's "Egmont." The orchestra also accompanied Miss Grace Halleck, who played the first movement of Schumann's Piano Concerto, and Master Julius Casper, who played Vieuxtemps' Fantaisie Appassionata. Miss Halleck, who is now herself a teacher at the conservatory, is a pupil of Miss Adele Margulies. After Joseffy, Miss Margulies is the power in the piano department. Miss Halleck's playing proved a strong feature of the concert. She has the musical tone and clean cut technic of the Margulies pupils, and some of her own individuality as well.

Master Casper managed his violin skillfully and surmounted the technical difficulties of Vieuxtemps' composition with comparative ease. Casper is a pupil of Lichtenberg. A career is predicted for the gifted boy. Besides his solo, young Casper occupied the seat of the concertmeister during the performance of the orchestral works. The vocal soloist of the evening, Harry T. Burleigh, sang the Romanza to the "Evening Star," from "Tannhäuser." His sympathetic baritone was heard with pleasure. After no end of recalls Mr. Burleigh seated himself at the piano and accompanied himself while he sang one of his own songs, a pathetic plantation melody. Mr. Schulz accompanied the singer at the piano in the "Tannhäuser" Romanza. Mr. Burleigh, who is a graduate of the conservatory, is now one of the assistant teachers in the singing department at the conservatory. He is the baritone soloist in the choir of St. George's Protestant Episcopal Church, where Mayor-elect Seth Low and J. Pierpont Morgan are communicants.

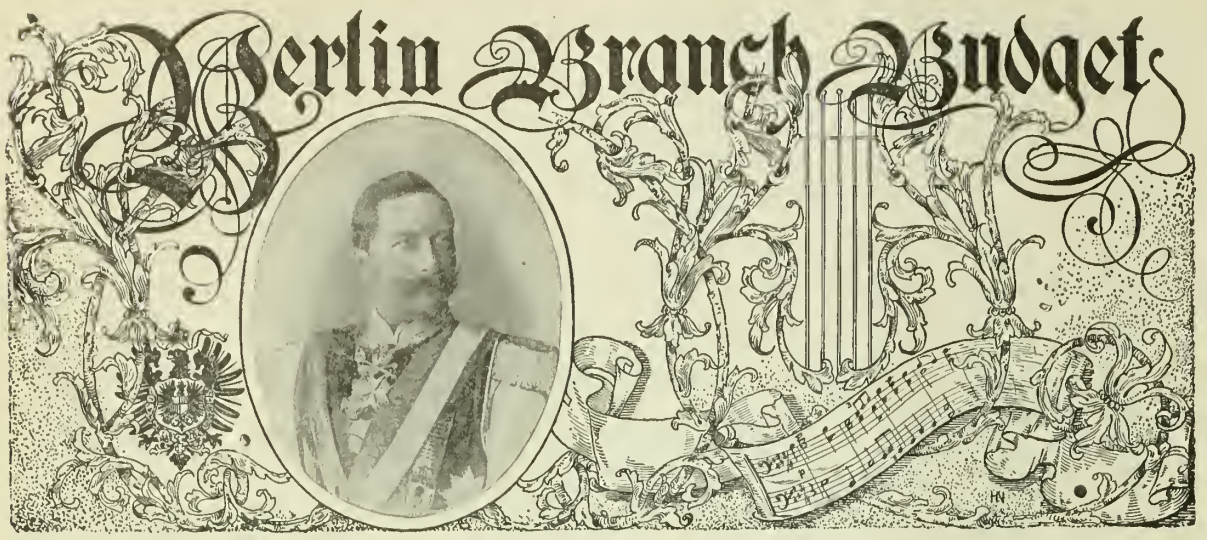
CARL'S SPECIAL SERVICES.—The congregation of the Old First Presbyterian Church, together with a throng of visitors, were treated by Organist William C. Carl to exceptionally fine musical services last Sunday. A specially prepared program was given in the morning, and in the afternoon parts of "The Messiah" were sung. Mr. Carl gave in his musicianly and impressive style several organ selections. At the morning service his beautiful anthem, "The Decennial Te Deum," was sung.

PADEREWSKI'S

TOUR IN AMERICA

SOLE AGENT: Mr. W. ADLINGTON, London.

TOUR MANAGER: Mr. C. E. ELLIS.



GERMAN HEADQUARTERS OF THE MUSICAL COURIER,
BERLIN, W., LINKSTRASSE 17.

December 2, 1901.

MY recent contribution to these columns, entitled "Herr Professor," has called forth some peppery comment in Berlin. I have received several letters, signed and unsigned, from local teachers and their pupils. The letters were in the highest degree complimentary. Summarizing their contents, I find that I am young, that I know nothing, and that I am unfair.

To the first of these charges I might reply with the famous words of Burke, "The crime of youth is one that I can neither palliate nor deny." The second accusation I pass over in modest silence; against the third I herewith set down a protest loud and long.

One man writes: "You parody the hard working music teacher. How about your American compatriots—particularly female—who come to Berlin and help render the life of the piano teacher a burden? Has the picture no reverse? Is there no other side? Are you blinded by patriotism or prejudice?"

The picture has a reverse, and there is another side. I tried to present it elsewhere, some time ago, and I present it again here, now. We might call the picture.

Ma and Miranda.

[PERSONAGES: Prof. X., a prominent piano teacher in Berlin. Miranda, from Oatville, U. S. A. Ma, from the same place. SCENE: The Professor's studio.]

PROF. X.—"Come in." (The door opens, and Ma sweeps in, followed by Miranda.)

MA—"Are you Professor X.?"

PROF.—"I am." (Bows and waits expectantly.)

MA (Bustles up to Prof. X. and shakes his hand effusively)—"I'm so glad to see you. I've come all the way from Oatville, U. S. A., just to speak to you."

PROF.—"Indeed! Won't you be seated, Madame?"

MA—"Well, Miranda, aren't you going to shake hands with the Professor, your new teacher?"

PROF.—"My dear Madame, it seems to me—"

MA—"Shake hands, I say, Miranda." (Miranda timidly approaches Prof. X. and shakes hands with him.)

MA—"So, there. It didn't hurt, did it, Miranda?"

MIRANDA—"No'm." (Both laugh loudly.)

PROF.—"If you would permit me to—"

MA—"Of course you've heard of my daughter?"

PROF.—"I cannot say that I have. If you will allow me to—"

MA (With rising voice)—"You haven't heard of Miranda Jones, known to all the papers as 'Musical Miranda'?"

PROF.—"You see, here we read only important—er—that is, I should say, large—"

MA—"Why, it was in both Oatville papers."

PROF.—"Might I ask—"

MA—"They said Miranda is the most musical genius in our State."

PROF.—"I'm glad to hear it, I'm sure, but—"

MA (Severely)—"The Messenger called her the first flowering bud of our sprouting musical tree."

MIRANDA (Correcting)—"Plant, Ma."

MA (Witheringly)—"That was in the Witness. 'A rare musical plant that in our fertile musical atmosphere has developed like new potatoes under the early spring sun.'"

PROF. (Meekly)—"Just one moment. I should like to know—"

MA—"Are your hands warm, darling?"

MIRANDA—"Yes, Ma."

MA—"You might play something then for the professor."

MIRANDA (Opens piano, and preludes on the C major arpeggio).

MA (Beaming)—"She always does that before she plays. Here are your notes, dear."

PROF. (Sinks into chair.)

MA—"Hasn't she a fine position?"

PROF. (Wearily)—"Very good."

MA—"She's nervous playing for such a great man as you."

MIRANDA (Whose start has not been very successful)—"It always takes me some time to work into a piece right."

MA (Nervously)—"Take it easy, sweetheart; there's no hurry."

MIRANDA (In serious difficulties, but struggling bravely)—"I don't understand it; this part went fine at home."

PROF. (Rises)—"Never mind that passage."

MIRANDA (Tearfully)—"Only yesterday I did it great."

MA (Soothingly)—"Let it go, darling. I always said that mean run don't really belong in the piece. Play something else. Play your own composition for the professor."

PROF. (Hurriedly)—"One moment. Allow me a few questions first. I should like to test your ear. (Seats himself at piano, and strikes chord.) "What is that?"

MIRANDA (Promptly)—"Notes."

MA (Triumphantly)—"You can't corner my Miranda."

PROF. (Smiles)—"They are notes indeed, but what particular combination of notes; that is the question. Is this the chord of C major or C minor?"

MIRANDA (At random)—"C major."

MA (Observing Prof. X.'s face)—"Think, Miranda. You are always so quick with your answers."

PROF. (Kindly)—"Come, now, C major or C minor?"

MIRANDA (Confidently)—"C minor."

MA (With anticipatory look at Prof. X.)—"I knew she'd get it right."

PROF. (Dryly)—"It happens to be wrong. It's the chord of D major."

MA (Flustered)—"You have such a funny way of asking questions."

PROF. (Plays E flat scale)—"What is this?"

MIRANDA—"A scale."

PROF.—"Correct."

MA—"Isn't she just fine?"

PROF.—"Which scale is it?"

MIRANDA (Gazes blankly at Ma).

MA—"Would you play it again, please, Professor?"

PROF.—"Certainly." (Plays it.)

MIRANDA (Begins to cry)—"I never—boo—hoo—could remember—boo—hoo—the names of those scales."

PROF.—"With whom did you study, Miranda?"

MA (Quickly)—"She never had a lesson in all her life. She learnt it all herself."

PROF.—"How long have you been playing, Miranda?"

MA (As before)—"Ever since she was two years old. Used to climb on her father's knee so that she could reach the piano, and she was so musical she played on the black notes, too."

PROF. (Really)—"Really? Quite astonishing. Tell me, Mrs. Jones, why did you come to me? I take only advanced pupils, and I charge 20 marks per lesson."

MA (Gasps)—"Twenty marks? Why, that's $5! Old Prof. Crabcider used to teach Miranda for 50 cents an hour."

PROF.—"I thought you said Miranda never had a teacher?"

MA (Confused)—"Well, she—she never really took lessons. He just showed her things. We can't pay your price. I'll give you $1 a lesson."

PROF. (Stiffly)—"I never teach for less than 20 marks. Besides, I could not take your daughter under any circumstances. She is not advanced enough, and what is more, she never will be. She hasn't one grain of musical talent, and she—"

MA (Hysterically)—"Miranda, Miranda—did you hear that? Not advanced—no talent; well, I never, really, that's what we paid $120 for; to come here and be told by a long haired, chicken faced foreigner—and you stand there and say nothing, Miranda?—that's the reward of playing in concerts and being told that you are a potato that buds—a bud that buds in the—the impudence of some people is too much for words, and I only hope that your pupils are as talented as Miranda, who has played in thirty-one concerts, fourteen of which were for charity and one for George Washington, that is on his birthday, and then asking $5 for a lesson—why don't you ask $50; it's the same thing, and you'd be as likely to get it, and—and—you ought to be ashamed of yourself."

MIRANDA—"Come, Ma."

MA—"I'm only too glad to. Here's your music. You better not forget it or you won't see it again. Come, darling."

Berlin Concerts.

Musical activity has slackened a bit here after the rush of the early season. Critics and performers are sparring for wind, professionally speaking.

Godowsky's piano recitals at Beethoven Hall are, without any doubt, the most important series of musical events now taking place in Berlin. The repertory of this artist seems absolutely limitless. He commands the entire range of piano literature, and from it he selects with consummate musical taste. Some of our great pianists are not always fair toward themselves and toward our great composers. Certain recital programs have too close a connection with the public and the box office. In that respect Godowsky is sternly dignified. He chooses his program to suit himself, not his public. He is one of the few musicians for whom Art—writ with a capital—comes first, and everything else afterward.

To those who have an eye for such things, Godowsky's latest program is an index to his absolute knowledge of all piano music. I append the program herewith: Prelude and Fugue, op. 35, No. 1, E minor, Mendelssohn; "Davidsbündlertänze." Schumann; Nocturne, C minor, Field; Rondo Brillante, Weber; Ballade, Grieg; Six Studies, Chopin-Godowsky; "Islamey," Balakireff.

I reached Beethoven Hall in time for the Chopin transcriptions. It is in these ingenious and eminently musical arrangements that Godowsky shows us his very best qualities. Some of our critics have taken to waving these monumental works aside with the cool comment, "Pooh, a profanation of Chopin." It is rather late in the day to break a lance with these gentlemen. Godowsky's Chopin adaptations have already won for themselves a permanent place in piano history. But I should advise these reverent commentators to beg, borrow or steal a few of the "Studies," peruse them carefully and note particularly the manner of Godowsky's "profanation." It would be a valuable lesson in harmony and counterpoint.

On this night the pianist's success was unbounded, and he played as encores Rosenthal's "Papillons," Chopin's G sharp minor Study, and the same composer's B flat minor Prelude.

Miss Zudie Harris, of Louisville, Ky, U. S. A., gave a most interesting and successful concert at the Singakademie. Her program consisted of two concertos, Mozart's, in D minor, and Chopin's, in F minor, works of widely divergent character and scope, requiring on the part of the performer extreme musical taste and a comprehensive technical equipment. With these qualities Miss Harris is blessed in abundance. She possesses, besides, poetry and versatility. With rare intelligence she differentiated between the simplicity of Mozart and the passion of Chopin. The touch, tone and manner of attack were adapted to each. Mozartian naïveté is not easy of interpretation on our modern grand piano. The tenderness of the [illegible]ement in the D minor Concerto and the [illegible]htness of the third were achievements [illegible] the ordinary. Impressive, also, were Miss Harris' firm rhythm and her straightfoward method of playing, free from any and all mannerisms.

The Chopin Concerto was done with spirit and splendid technical mastery. The soulful romanza received a sympathetic reading, and the brilliant last movement sparkled with animation.

Small wonder that Miss Harris was enthusiastically applauded, repeatedly recalled, and finally forced to play an encore, Rubinstein's G minor Ballade, read with exquisite tonal and pedal effects.

The fourth Nikisch concert, with the Philharmonic Orchestra, brought no startling surprises of any kind. We are thoroughly familiar with the Leipsic director's interpretation of Beethoven, two of whose works, the "Coriolanus" Overture and the "Pastorale" Symphony, began and ended an entire scheme of program music. In both these numbers Nikisch was sympathetic, precise and vital. His depiction of the thunder storm episode, in the symphony, was a most effective piece of orchestral, or shall I say directorial, virtuosity.

Richard Strauss' "Death and Apotheosis," one of the grandest of modern symphonic poems, was given an authoritative and impressive reading. At times, however, there was lacking some of the verve and convincing power which I have heard Strauss' stick draw forth in performances of this work. Nikisch does not seem fond of crass colors, glaring contrasts, and screaming climaxes; he is the great orchestral refiner, the gentleman of the bâton.

The soloist was Erika Wedekind, of Dresden, an oldish, pale-blonde person, attired in a picnic gown of anæmic blue. She sang two coloratura arias, Mozart's "No che non sei capace" and "A vos jeux, mes amis," from Ambroise Thomas' "Hamlet." Her voice is a worn, monotonous soprano, devoid of all freshness and charm. The middle register entirely lacks vocal quality and the high tones are shrill and strained. The coloratura passages were uneven and unclear. The staccati were done without a semblance of art. Such things as breathing in the middle of a solid phrase, and "sliding" descending portamento passages proved Miss Wedekind to be without musical intelligence or artistic tact. Her pronunciation of French, at least, was original. In the face of this formidable array of faults it is but fair to mention that the singer has a rapid, sustained trill which persistently wanders from the key. Nikisch's selection of this soloist was a mistake. She did not fit into the frame of acceptance to which he has accustomed us.

Gertrude Peppercorn did not repeat her good performances of last season. Excessive nervousness marred most of her numbers, and in nearly all there was the kind of technical flaws that should not occur in a well-prepared program. Some of the Chopin numbers were played in the style that last season made Miss Peppercorn appear to be one of our best female pianists. The Barcarolle, the octave study, and the C sharp minor Etude were deserving of all praise. The same composer's Etude in sixths is yet far beyond the young lady's technical grasp. Only Godowsky and de Pachmann have ever played this study satisfactorily. Chopin's F minor Ballade lacked in breadth and passion.

Arthur de Greef, a professor at the Brussels Conservatoire, made a decided hit at his concert in Beethoven Hall. De Greef is a pianist of absolutely reliable technic and most refined artistic instincts. In three concertos, by Bach, Mozart and Beethoven, he revealed a ripe musicianship that was as satisfying as it is rare. De Greef is evidently a man of intellect, for in his performance there was revealed a distinct, logical purpose, the purpose to present an art work objectively, to expose clearly its form, construction and content, without drawing the listener's attention from the piece to the performer. De Greef should be an ideal pedagogue.

The Henri Marteau Quartet, from Geneva, consisting of the famous fiddler, Henri Marteau; Eugene Reymond, Woldemar Pahnke and Adolphe Rehberg, gave an exceptionally successful concert at Bechstein Hall. The program contained Mozart's F major Quartet, César Franck's D major Quartet, and a new Quartet, G minor, op. 54, by Joseph Lauber. Marteau's beautiful tone, his dignity and firm rhythm make him an admirable leader of chamber music. Untiring practice evidently did the rest, for these four gentlemen play with a degree of precision and accuracy that is barely reached by such old Berlin quartets as those of Halir and Joachim. The Lauber work is skillful in workmanship, but conventional in thematic and harmonic content. An allegretto scherzando, dainty and graceful, was by far the best part of the piece. A large audience was most liberal in its applause, and gave convincing proof that frequent and regular visits of the Marteau Quartet would be most welcome here.

Vita Gerhardt and Anton Witek, two musicians well known in Berlin, are giving a series of sonata evenings, for piano and violin, at Bechstein Hall. Their first program presented works by Rubinstein, B minor; Beethoven, E flat, and Richard Gompertz, G minor (new). The performances were splendid, Madame Gerhardt's reliability and Witek's supreme musicianship forming a combination that is bound to produce high artistic results. I did not hear the Gompertz work. The papers praised it warmly.

The celebrated Bohemian Quartet visited us last week and met with the same enthusiastic reception that has always distinguished its many Berlin appearances. The artists were as fresh, as spontaneous and convincing as ever. They gave a wonderful reading of Gernsheim's E minor Quartet, op. 66, a ripe work that is most unjustly neglected. Dvorák's characteristic F minor Trio and Schumann's A major Quartet, op. 41, completed the interesting program. Edouard Risler, the assisting pianist, must not be forgotten. In fact, he could not be forgotten, for he played so muscularly that we were constantly reminded of his presence.

Other excellent chamber music concerts were given recently by the Berlin Chamber Music Association (Septet, op. 7, by Fritz Steinbach), by the Georg Schumann Trio (Quartet, F minor, op. 29, Georg Schumann), Joseph Debroux (sonatas for violin and piano, by Benda, Genciniani, Tennaillé, Bach, Händel, &c.), Professor Markees and Otto Hegner (Sonata for Piano and Violin, op. 54, E flat, by H. von Herzogenberg) and Piano Quartet of Messrs. Egidi, Seuffert, Werner and Dechert (Quartet, op. 3, E flat, by Ivan Knorr).

Foreign violinists have rained down upon us so far this season. The latest week brought three, two from France, one from Russia; respectively, Jean ten Have, Joseph Debroux and Michael Zacharewitsch. Of the three, ten Have is easily the most important. He has a sure, brilliant technic, a fair sized but very sympathetic tone, and refined musical taste. He achieved decided success in Saint-Saëns' B minor Concerto. Debroux is a better musician than virtuoso. His technic is lacking in many essential points. Double stopping and purity of intonation did not seem to be his chief artistic virtues. Nevertheless, he displayed a certain intellectual grasp of his program and fine talent for characterization. Zacharewitsch is too young and too wild to be taken very seriously. He seems to have temperament, but it is all extraneous. His technic, too, he uses merely for empty show. In three or four years Zacharewitsch might have something worth while to say on the violin.

Dr. Ludwig Wüllner gave one of his interesting song recitals at Beethoven Hall. The program was devoted solely to Brahms. Wüllner is specifically a German product. He is the great voiceless singer. Outside of Germany he would hardly be appreciated. With him the texts of his songs are the songs themselves. He declaims them with wonderful art. He has a large following here, and his success is always enormous.

Bernhard Dessau is one of our best violinists. He has tone, technic, taste and temperament, the four important T's in the make-up of an artist. Besides, he is a first-rate musician, with experience and authority. His performance of Mozart's A major Concerto was superior to Halir's. The audience rewarded Mr. Dessau with much applause, and he responded with several encores.

Martha Schley is a singer who takes herself far too seriously. Adelheid Helm, another singer, should go to hear Miss Schley. Else Gründlich, pianist, wore a tasteful white frock; Heinrich Scheden, tenor, didn't.

Siegfried Wagner was in town, and conducted part of the Wagner Society concert, and all of his opera, "Bärenhäuter." Some authorities agree that Wagner societies are superfluous nowadays. The same opinion has been expressed about Siegfried's operas. Criticism, then, is superfluous, too. Besides, I heard neither the concert nor the opera.

The following works were performed last week at the Royal Opera House: "Hänsel und Gretel," "Die Puppenfee" (ballet), "Marriage of Figaro," "Der Bärenhäuter," "Prophet," "Rheingold" and "Walküre." The Theater des Westens gave "Rigoletto," "Marriage of Figaro," "Undine," "Wildschütz" (Lortzing), "Don Juan," "Beggar Student" and "Carmen." HARMONICA.

DOLORES IN OCEANIA.—Mlle. Antonio Dolores sang at Sydney, New South Wales, on the 17th, the last one of a series of song recitals. We have seen a number of the local criticisms of a high order, referring to her artistic demonstrations of vocalism, her purely legato style and her distinct enunciation by means of which every syllable received its due value, and it is said of her also that she has flexibility, accuracy and execution, as well as a temperamental nature. Bizet, Grieg, Mascagni, Haydn, Kjerulf and Saint-Saëns are the composers whose songs she sang on that occasion. Evidently she is a singer who is an artist.

KINDERGARTEN MUSIC BUILDING.

Views of the Science of Music for Children by a Correspondence Student.

IT appears like presuming when one attempts to write on "Kindergarten Music Building." Such grand work gives forth pure, heavenly thought, and any expression that falls short of embodied harmony will be like a cloud before a star. The beauties of nature, the purity of child life are revealed in so natural a manner that the question presents itself: How could one have been, heretofore, so blind to many blessings that the Heavenly Father has scattered around and about all? The writer has lived long enough in this world to discover that she does not possess any genius for composition, and this attempt, therefore, is the practical result of the influence "Kindergarten Music Building" has had upon one of its many students. At least, there will be the effort, and if success is still far distant, will try, try again. The beautiful study appears to the untutored mind somewhat rugged and unyielding at times, and at first I was nonplused over various problems, but I have been creditably conned through the profound though simple study by my patient guide, Mrs. N. K. Darlington, the originator of the system, who has taken every opportunity to remind me that the glad new century is rich in golden opportunities for those who are willing to accept them, and ready to work for sufficient intelligence to gain an impression of their presence. Human nature owes Nina K. Darlington a debt of gratitude for that which she has uncovered in her wonderful system, and "Kindergarten Music Building" cannot fail to gain world-wide fame in the coming age. Heretofore the interest of child expression in relation to music has been greatly neglected, but with the combined efforts of the faithful workers in this new idea it will reach the zenith of its glory. During my life as a teacher I have been vainly seeking to discover some means to plant and stimulate the germ of truth in the young mind. Under the system of "Kindergarten Music Building" the growth of the child's mind is greatly advanced, and this during the early period of his life, when the memory accepts lasting impressions. To quote of this period from Jean Paul: "Man learns more in the first three years of childhood than in the three years of college life." The children keep a lively interest in the work throughout, and every lesson brings forth some new and beautiful thoughts. Each idea, as it unfolds, sounds a responsive chord in the little hearts, because in the method known as "Kindergarten Music Building," the cultivation of the youthful mind is so gradual and natural that the child soon gains independence of thought, the foundation of all higher mental development.—Norma Draper Baugh, in the Boston Times, February 23, 1901.

TONKUNSTLERS GIVE A BEETHOVEN NIGHT.

NO one could picture greater contrasts than those attending the Beethoven night by the Tonkünstler Society. The members have had much difficulty in seeking a suitable meeting place for the Manhattan nights, there being also Brooklyn nights every month. After a few meetings at the Aschenbroedel Club house, the committee, not being quite satisfied with the arrangements, voted to return to the former meeting rooms, 114 East Fourteenth street. This number stamps the gay and Bohemian character of the neighborhood. While the members of the society may not be able to do better for the present in the matter of a clubhouse, they should not rest until they have found a place that is conducive to the advancement of art. The Beethoven evening, Tuesday, December 17, was arranged in commemoration of the anniversary of the great man's birth, which occurred some time in or about the middle of December, 131 years ago. An evening with the sublimest of composers would be more in keeping with the subject if performed under different surroundings. It is doubtful if the members of the society themselves relished the clinking of beer glasses in the near distance, the clang of horse car bells, and occasional whiffs of smoke through the open door as an accompanist to Beethoven. Then can anyone imagine hearing good music in a room three times longer than it is wide?

Henry Schradieck, the violinist, and Miss Katharine C. Linn, the pianist, played the "Kreutzer" Sonata as the opening number. It proved a thoroughly musical performance, and certainly there was no suggestion in the music or in the playing of it of anything to arouse the baser nature of man. Poor Tolstoi; he simply selected the wrong music to adorn a tale. Messrs. Bendix, Bauer, Altschüler and Schulz played one of the early string quartets, the one in G major, No. 2, op. 18. Mr. Bendix is an excellent concertmeister, but in ensemble music of this kind he is less convincing. His violin was too prominent and his conception was not in accord with the best Beethoven readings. Leo Schulz is a solo player, but he has mastered the art of effacing himself in quartet playing. Nothing could be more beautiful than his 'cello tones in the second movement of the quartet.

The vocal numbers of the evening were contributed by Miss Martha Wettengel, a talented young contralto, and Anton Schott, of operatic fame. Miss Wettengel, a pupil of M. J. Scherhey, sang sympathetically and with much taste three of the songs by the great composer, "Busslied," "Ich Liebe Dich" and "Mailied." Mr. Schott, who was in remarkably good voice for a veteran, sang the song cycle "To the Distant Beloved," and he sang it with wonderful art. It was a pleasure to hear this sterling artist once more. Louis V. Saar accompanied for Miss Wettengel, and Josef Weiss for Mr. Schott, and both pianists are entitled to a share of the success of the evening.

KREISLER AND SCHUMANN-HEINK IN RECITAL.—Tuesday afternoon, December 31, Madame Schumann-Heink and Fritz Kreisler will be heard in a violin and song recital in Mendelssohn Hall. This will be the first appearance of either of these artists in a recital here this season.

THE Grau Company presented five operas in Music Hall during the week—"Tannhäuser," "Romeo and Juliet," "Meistersinger" "Manon" and "Aida." They were unfortunate in breaking faith with the public—not perhaps of their own choosing. "Carmen" was promised with Calvé, but Calvé being on the sick list, "Huguenots" was announced. Upon the arrival of the company "The Huguenots" was cancelled and "Romeo and Juliet" substituted. Madame Sembrich, upon being advised of the death of her son, left for New York. Sibyl Sanderson got on the sick list, too, and she was substituted by Seygard. Van Dyck also retired on the sick list, and his place was taken by Dippel. The latter did some heroic work, and appeared as Tannhäuser, Walther and in "Aida." Edouard de Reszké was one of the redeeming features. The honors were carried off, besides him, by Madames Eames and Hauser, both American singers. It is strange how thoroughly Americans can be enjoyed when the foreigners are absent! The attendance was fairly good for "Tannhäuser" and "Meistersinger"; otherwise it was frostbitten, quite as much as the prevailing weather. The Grau Company pulled out of the city with no profits, if little loss.

"The Messiah" was illustrated on the evening of December 20 in the Recital Hall of the Conservatory of Music by Arthur J. H. Barbour, in charge of the organ department. Mr. Barbour as an organist is an authority whose experience in London, where Händel is still the revered master at Yuletide, made his remarks exceptionally interesting. The solos were sung by Miss Ada Ruhl and Miss Annabelle Ambrose, sopranos, and Miss Esther McNeill, contralto. The violin parts were filled in with artistic sense by Leroy McMakin. Mr. Barbour's lecture was informal and thoroughly enjoyable. Miss Ambrose sang "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth" with much expression and fine feeling. Miss Esther McNeill has a beautiful contralto voice, singing with clear enunciation and no uncertain degree of warmth. Miss Ruhl sung "Come Unto Him" with that simplicity and repose that belong to oratorio. The choruses were given with good volume and quality by the choir of the Second Presbyterian Church, under the direction of Hugo Sederberg.

On the same [illegible]ng "The Messiah" was presented in Suite[illegible] car Ehrgott Vocal School. It was [illegible] the following program:

[illegible], tenor, Comfort Ye My People; air, Every Valley.
Walter C. Earnest.
Chorus, And the Glory.
Recitative, bass, Thus Saith the Lord; air, But Who May Abide.
Asa Howard Geeding.
Recitative, alto, Behold! A Virgin; air and chorus, O, Thou that Tellest Glad Tidings.
Miss Arabelle Crane.
Recitative, soprano, There Were Shepherds.
Mrs. Charles S. Wheaton.
Chorus, Glory to God.
Air, soprano, Rejoice Greatly.
Mrs. Charles S. Wheaton.
Recitative, soprano, Then Shall the Eyes of the Blind; air, He Shall Feed His Flock.
Miss Helen Cowen.
Chorus, Behold the Lamb of God; air, alto, He Was Despised.
Miss Mayme Ellis.
Recitative, tenor, Thy Rebuke Hath Broken His Heart; air, Behold and See.
Walter C. Earnest.
Chorus, Lift Up Your Heads; air, soprano, I Know that My Redeemer Liveth.
Mrs. Blanche Berndt Mehaffey.
Chorus, Worthy Is the Lamb; air, bass, Why Do the Nations Rage?
Leroy Tebbs.
Quartet, Since By Man Came Death.
Mrs. Mehaffey, Mrs. Miles, Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Hoskins.
Chorus, By Man Came Also.
Quartet, For as in Adam All Die.
Chorus, Even So in Christ.
Chorus, Hallelujah.

An appreciative audience crowded every inch of space and was warmed into enthusiasm by what was a performance of the "Christmas" Oratorio far above the ordinary. The chorus filled the stage completely, and was altogether made up of pupils of the school. All the soloists with the exception of two were pupils of the school. Oscar Ehrgott directed, showing his matured familiarity with the work, as well as uncommon ability in training a body of students to a standard higher than what one is accustomed to hear. Particularly good were the choruses, "O Thou That Tellest Good Tidings" and "Glory to God," which were sung with cohesiveness, precision of attack and quality. The "Hallelujah Chorus" was given with splendid volume and power. The solo parts were taken by Walter C. Earnest, Asa Howard Geeding, Arabella Crane, Mrs. Charles S. Wheaton, Miss Mayme Ellis, Mrs. Blanche Brendt Mehaffey and Leroy Tebbs. One of the most enjoyable numbers was the quartet sung by Mrs. Mehaffey, Mrs. Miles, Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Hoskins. Mrs. Oscar Ehrgott played the accompaniment with taste and judgment.

There is no doubt that the educational element of this city is alive to the importance of cultivating oratorio and keeping up the traditions.

Theodor Bohlmann and Pier A. Tirindelli, of the Conservatory of Music Faculty, will give a concert on the evening of January 3 in Portland, Ind.

"Pax Triumphans," the symphonic festival prologue of Mr. Van der Stucken, was brought out with great success by the Court Orchestra in Brunswick, under Herman Riedel, November 16, and was given December 14 at the Court Orchestra concert in Hanover, under the direction of Hof-Kapelmeister Josef Katzky. Musikdirector Joachim Andersen is to bring out Van der Stucken's "Idylle" at his Palais concerts, Copenhagen.

The musical department of the Cincinnati Woman's Club, Miss Martha Allen chairman, presented an attractive Christmas program Thursday afternoon. The program was devoted to Haydn and Mozart. Mrs. Alexander Hill, assistant chairman, prefaced the musical illustrations with a short sketch of the composers.

Quite an elaborate Christmas program was presented by the Ladies' Musical Club this afternoon. The numbers included selections from Bach's Christmas Oratorio—the duo, "Lord, Thy Mercy," sung by Miss Antoinette Werner and Oscar Ehrgott; aria, "Keep, O Lord, My Spirit," Miss Dell M. Kendall; aria, "O Lord, My Darkened Heart Enlighten," by Oscar Ehrgott. Two violin solos, Andante, by Ries, and "Hungarian Rhapsody," by Hauser, were played by Miss Marie Louise Wright. Gade's "Christmas Eve" will be given, conducted by Hans Seitz. The soloist was Mrs. Nina Pugh Smith, and two choirs assisted.

"Carmen" is to be the opening opera of the Rose Cecilia Shay English Opera Company in Music Hall December 31. It will be a brief season of grand opera in English.

The eighth soirée musicale of The Cable Company in the Cable Company's warerooms, Seventh and Elm streets, was attended by a cultured audience and presented the following varied program:

The soloist for the Symphony concert next week will be Hugo Kupferschmid, violinist, who met with such tremendous success in London last season. Mr. Kupferschmid was born in Aurora, Ind., and is a Cincinnatian by early association and training. J. A. HOMAN.

PELTON SONG RECITAL.—This occurred in Flushing, L. I., December 18, in the series of the "Good Citizens' League" entertainments, assisted by Miss Florence Gale, solo-pianist; Charles Russell, 'cellist, with F. W. Riesberg at the piano. Miss Pelton sang a series of nineteen songs, old English, German, French, with several American composers represented. The charming appearance of the singer, coupled with a voice of wide range and artistic finish, enabled her to please greatly, and she received several recalls.

Miss Gale played with superb swing the Moszkowski Concert Waltz in E, also giving an encore, and 'Cellist Russell played with extreme refinement; Popper's Mazurka especially brought tokens of admiration from the audience, which was large and dressy.

The artists were afterward entertained at the home of a prominent member of the club.

MUSIC IN BROOKLYN.

Institute Christmas Concert.

THE Children's Christmas concert which the Brooklyn Institute arranged for last Saturday afternoon attracted indeed many more grown up people than it did juniors. Two of the most popular singers, Mrs. Katharine Fisk, and Gwilym Miles, appeared in a program that appealed quite as much to older people as to boys and girls. Many of the children of Christendom may love music, but three or four days before Santa Claus Day they are thinking more about dolls and sleighs and the goodies than they are about music. Still it was not the fault of children that more of them were not taken to the concert. The Saturday before a day like Christmas is a busy one for mothers, and considering this the audience which assembled to hear this interesting concert was one of fair size. It is a pity that the committee neglected to decorate the bare stage for such an occasion. At its best, Association Hall is an ugly auditorium, and giving a Christmas concert in a place unadorned with a single tree or holly berry rather emphasized the cheerless character of the place and caused more than one person to comment upon the lack of Christmas cheer. But the two magnetic singers soon changed the depressing atmosphere. Mrs. Fisk was radiant in a gown of Nile green shimmering silk, with cut jet and silver white fringe. To the rows of boys and girls seated near the stage in the centre of the hall the charming singer sang three groups of songs, fourteen altogether, counting one encore, and many of these delighted the older people as well.

The first group of songs sung by Mrs. Fisk included "The Walking Bell," by Schumann; "Sandmänchen" ("The Little Dustman"), by Brahms; "Noël," by Thomas, and "Butzemann," by Lambert. The songs in the second group were "The Dandelion," by Chadwick; "Little Boy Blue," "Violets" and "An Open Secret," by Woodman. The third list began with "The Minuet," by Fairlamb; then followed two songs by Brewer, "The Little Bird" and "There Was an Old Woman," and then two songs by Jessie Gaynor, "The Discontented Duckling" and "The Gingerbread Man." For an encore, Mrs. Fisk sang Brewer's cradle song, "Rockaby Dearie." The little folks beamed upon the singer, and she in turn smiled at them, and enunciated most distinctly the words of the songs intended especially to convey the excitement and surprises attending Christmas. Her voice never seemed sweeter or fresher than it did last Saturday while singing for those fortunate Brooklyn boys and girls.

Mr. Miles sang only one number for the juveniles, an "Animal Song," by Shelley, in which the singer enumerates the gamut of dumb creatures in Noah's Ark in a most amusing fashion. The remainder of Mr. Miles' solos were familiar Christmas songs, "The Birthday of a King," by Neidlinger; Gounod's "Nazareth," "It Came Upon the Midnight Clear," by Meyer-Helmund, and Adam's "Noël." The last two Mr. Miles sang to harp accompaniment, played by Miss Avice Boxall. Mr. Miles was in good voice, and his resonant baritone and manly style suited well the lofty music by Gounod, Adam and Neidlinger. Miss Boxall played three harp solos, unaccompanied, "Winter," by John Thomas, and two Welsh melodies, "David of the White Rock" and "The Bells of Aberdovey," and particularly pleased the young people with her music. Mrs. Fisk and Mr. Miles closed the concert by singing Arthur Goring Thomas' beautiful duet, "Night Hymn at Sea." Miss Sally Sherwood Betts played the piano accompaniments, and played them sympathetically.

Poor Brooklyn, like poor Manhattan and dear old London, must endure "The Messiah" during the Christmas season. The Brooklyn performance was given at the Academy of Music last Thursday evening, under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute. Händel wrote this oratorio in twenty-four days, and it would seem that in one respect a musical composition resembles a literary production—that which is quickest done is hardest to perform. Easy writing makes hard reading; easy composing makes hard singing. It took the poet Thomas Gray seven years to complete his "Elegy in a Country Churchyard," and this immortal poem is one of the easiest to read and remember. Musical Germany naturally prefers Bach to Händel, and that is why perhaps the German critics and musicians generally would walk several miles out of their way to escape hearing "The Messiah." The music for the airs "Rejoice Greatly" and "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth" is ridiculous when studied from the standpoint of sacred music, and no matter how well sung, the sublime import of the text cannot be made to fit the florid character of Händel's score. Even that moving aria for the contralto, "He Was Despised," is set in too many notes. But then no one can help this now. It's a hard thing to change the fashion, and so singing societies in English speaking communities will go on singing this threadbare oratorio until the end of time.

The oratorio in Brooklyn last Thursday night was sung by the Brooklyn Oratorio Society, under the direction of Walter Henry Hall. The soloists were Miss Estelle Liebling, Mrs. Marian van Duyn, Paul Dufault and Whitney Tew. Ellison van Hoose, who was the tenor announced for the performance, was prevented by illness from filling his engagement, and since Mr. Dufault was called upon at the eleventh hour to replace Mr. van Hoose, it would seem unfair to criticise his singing. Miss Liebling continues to surprise her admirers. She is probably the youngest singer who ever sang the soprano solos at a public performance of "The Messiah" in Brooklyn. Her idea of oratorio is correct, as she plainly showed by the broad style of her singing in the two recitatives, "There Were Shepherds," and "The Angel of the Lord." The florid air, "Rejoice Greatly," she sang brilliantly, as was to be expected of her. Mrs. van Duyn's voice has the real oratorio quality, and being a contralto, there is no reason why she should not become one of the leading singers in the country. Her recitatives were beautifully delivered at the performance last Thursday, and into her air, "He Was Despised," she put the moving note of sadness. Although suffering with the grip, Mr. Tew distinguished himself as an oratorio singer. Turning around from the conductor's stand, Mr. Hall asked the indulgence of the audience on behalf of the basso. But for an occasional huskiness there were no apparent shortcomings in the singing of the bass solos. The assisting orchestra, with Gustav Dannreuther as concertmeister, was better than usual. William H. Norton, at the organ, also helped in giving smooth accompaniments. Lastly, too much cannot be said in praise of the choral singing. It was splendid. For the first time the names of the members of the oratorio society were printed upon the house program. The membership list is as follows:

WHITNEY TEW

In America
November,
December
And January.

The London Press says of Mr. Tew's singing:

The Stage—"Mr. Whitney Tew proved himself a singer of excellent capabilities. His voice, which is a bass of great compass, is delightfully sympathetic—now full of tenderness, now instinct with passion and joy. He could not have been surpassed in his rendering of Schumann's 'Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn' and Liza Lehmann's curiously weird 'Myself when Young.'"—July 4, 1901.

London Musical Courier—"Mr. Whitney Tew's singing was marked by a high order of intelligence. He is one of the few singers now before the public who possesses the many qualifications that mean success. Besides a voice powerful and sympathetic he has a remarkable memory, and he never fails to display an intuitive knowledge of the poetic and dramatic significance of the text. In four songs by Bach, Brahms, Schubert and Schumann he exhibited great powers of vocalization and expression, and a style in singing German so thoroughly Teutonic that it was hard at times to realize his American origin . . . Three songs in English were equally impressive."—July 5, 1901.

Ladies' Field—"That fine bass singer, Mr. Whitney Tew, gave the first of his recitals in Steinway Hall. Madame Lehmann's 'In Memoriam' was a great test of Mr. Tew's manner and inflection, and he sustained the interest of his audience well throughout it; and it is a supremely hard work for a single voice—fragmentary, passionate, moody, with its pedal-note of acute sorrow. . . . Mr. Tew is fortunate in possessing a powerful voice of fine quality, and he has both the voice and brains for success."—May 25, 1901.

Daily Telegraph—"Mr. Tew is an artist who commands attention and deserves praise Especially has he the gift of feeling and the power of conveying it to others, while in point of intelligence he leaves but little to desire. Mr. Tew essayed last evening songs of widely contrasting kinds and of various countres, but the manner and spirit proper to each were easily revealed, and the result was a conspicuous success."—May 23 1901

Howard W. Connelly is secretary of the society and Henry C. Knight is the treasurer. At the spring concert, the society will present Verdi's Requiem.

Last Wednesday evening Wissner Hall was crowded with music students and their parents for the second in the series of joint recitals given by the pupils of Alexander Rihm and Henry Schradieck. An excellent program of violin and piano music was performed. Miss Minnie Müller and Miss Georgina Walsh played the Beethoven Sonata in G major, op. 30, No. 3, for piano and violin. Miss Johanna Wolz played as a piano number the first movement of Hummel's Concerto in A minor, her teacher, Mr. Rihm, playing the orchestral part on a second piano. Mr. Schradieck accompanied his talented pupil, Miss Walsh, in her violin solo, Saint-Saëns' "Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso." Miss Betty Trier played as a piano solo the Schubert Impromptu in A flat. A brilliant performance of Weber's "Jubel" overture was played on two pianos as the closing number by the Misses Müller, Wolz and Horle and Mr. Rihm. January 22 is the date of the next recital.

Mrs. William E. Beardsley gave the first of her musicales for this winter at her pleasant studio in the Pouch Gallery last Tuesday afternoon. The hostess in the musical program was assisted by Claude Madden, violinist; Miss Genevieve Brady, soprano, and G. Charles Kunz, pianist. The guests greatly enjoyed the program, which Mrs. Beardsley arranged as follows:

From Suite, op. 44, for piano and violin.....Schütt Claude Madden and Mrs. Beardsley.

Soprano—
A May Morning.....Denza
Still Wie Die Nacht.....Bohm
Dein.....Bohm
An Open Secret.....Woodman
Miss Genevieve Brady.

Piano, Concert Etude.....Grünfeld
G. Charles Kunz.

Violin, Berceuse.....Godard
Mr. Madden.

Trio, Morire!.....Papini
Miss Brady, Mr. Madden and Mrs. Beardsley.

Miss Brady sang her songs very sweetly. The parts from the Schütt Suite were charmingly played. Both the piano and violin solos added to the attractiveness of the program. The trio by Papini was sung and played in a most musical style and proved altogether a unique number for an informal musicale. For these musicales Mrs. Beardsley issues no cards, but she sends out personal invitations for each day.

The Hoadley Musical Society, which claims to be the oldest amateur orchestra in Greater New York, gave a public rehearsal at Crosby Hall on Classon avenue last Tuesday night (December 17) under the direction of Theodore John. Carl Venth is one of the former conductors of the society and his drilling is reflected in the playing of the orchestra. Mr. John, the present conductor, showed wisdom by not attempting ambitious works. The compositions played included some of Brahms' "Hungarian Dances," Schubert's "Serenade," Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, "Dream After the Ball," by Czibulka; a Waldteufel waltz, a Reverie by Bottesini and other popular selections.

In the analytical piano recital which Dr. Henry G. Hanchett gave in the Assembly Hall of Adelphi College last Monday night (December 16) it was discovered that there were periods in the man's journey from the cradle to the grave for which there does not appear to be illustrative music. Dr. Hanchett, who is always original, undertook to portray the "Seven Ages of Man," and to give illustrations on the piano. He covered five ages, and then could not find anything to suit "The Judge" and "The Old Man." It was of course not difficult to dispose of "The Baby," "The Boy" and "The Lover." To glorify babyhood Dr. Hanchett played Grieg's "Cradle Song." The "Whining Schoolboy" the pianist depicted by playing "The Knight of the Hobby Horse," by Schumann, and that same composer's "Bird as Prophet." Six numbers were played to illustrate the "Lover Period": Wagner's "Spinning Song," from "The Flying Dutchman," transcribed by Liszt for the piano; the first movement from Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata, the Rubinstein Barcarolle, the Chopin Ballade in A flat, the "Bridal Procession," by Grieg, and the Pastoral from Guilmant's First Organ Sonata. The career of the soldier was boldly shown in the playing of the Schubert-Tausig "Military March." "The Judge," or as Shakespeare writes it, "The Justice," is the "fifth age"; the sixth is "The Old Man," and the closing period is childish old age, and Dr. Hanchett not finding anything, as he explained, to illustrate the justice or the elderly man, he played to portray the closing chapter of mortal existence Gottschalk's "Last Hope" and "The End of the Song," by Schumann. During the lecture Dr. Hanchett interrupted himself in order to play certain bars to illustrate the parts, and after he finished speaking he played the entire list of compositions through as at a regular recital. The audience greatly enjoyed the evening, which was held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Kindergarten Union.

The Brooklyn Institute will give two concerts during Christmas week. Kubelik and Miss Jessie Shay appeared Monday night (December 23), and Madame Schumann-Heink and Emil Fischer will give a joint recital Friday evening, December 27. A report of the Kubelik concert will be found on another page of this issue of The Musical Courier. Monday evening. December 30, the Institute will give its closing song and violin recital. The singers announced are Mme. Suzanne Adams and Sidney Preston Biden. Leo Stern, 'cellist, and Isidore Luckstone will assist.

A New Interpretation Class.—Dr. Henry G. Hanchett's announcement of his new interpretation class is one that should interest many young artists and advanced students of the piano. The repertory mentioned contains only standard works, which should already be known in part by many embryo pianists, who will find this a favorable opportunity not only to submit their interpretations to an experienced artist's criticism but also to gain repose in playing before a number of critics, and in comparing notes with others as to the most effective methods of bringing out all that the composition contains. As no criticism of technic or method of playing the piano mechanically is intended, if it can be avoided, the class is made available to those who may be studying with any teacher, but in order to make the class really valuable to every listener this will involve a slight examination for admission, so that only those who are competent to attempt real interpretation study may be admitted. Yet others are provided for, since listeners as such may become members of the class. At each meeting the special selections from the repertory to be considered at the next meeting two weeks later will be announced, and the analytical examination to be given the works will be more minute and technical, but along the same lines that Dr. Hanchett's public work has made familiar to large numbers of music students.

Worcester County Festival.—The Worcester (Mass.) County Festival Association at its annual meeting voted to keep on in the course it is following, undismayed by the deficit of $2,159 at the last festival. The association has now $2,600 in the treasury. The deficit this year was due to causes which will not recur. The following officers were re-elected for the next year: President, Charles M. Bent; vice-president, Daniel Downey; clerk, G. Arthur Smith; treasurer, George R. Bliss; librarian, Leuther M. Lovell. Philip W. Moen was elected a director for three years to fill the unexpired term of Walter S. G. Kennedy, who resigned some time ago. Charles I. Rice and Col. Samuel E. Winslow were re-elected directors for four years. George R. Wallace, of Fitchburg, was elected a member of the association. The board of government will meet after the holidays for reorganization for the next festival, and rehearsals will begin some time during January.

On Musical Epidemics.

WASHINGTON is rapidly becoming the centre of many alarming musical epidemics. This fact became evident last year when germs were discovered by some of the bacteriological music critics, who found that many of the programs had become impregnated with infectious bacilli, and had communicated these germs to other programs, which later developed the dreaded musical disease. This year a number of new epidemics have made their appearance. Some have already reached an alarming stage, while others have only just begun. The Mendelssohn Violin Concerto has reached an acute stage, having been performed in whole or in part at no less than five concerts in about two weeks. Allitsen's "Song of Thanksgiving" proved extremely infectious during all of last season, and still continues its ravages.

A word of warning may keep the Godard Berceuse, from "Jocelyn," from assuming an aggravated form, and Allitsen's "Love Is a Bubble" may not reach the malignant stage if the musicians do not remain in too close proximity to its alluring pages.

What is the cause of these epidemics, and what musical sanitary measures should musicians take in order to avoid these attacks? The remedy is simple. First keep track of the new compositions at the Congressional Library, and make it a point to have some music presented at your concerts "for the first time." Let us have new pieces introduced here, and let Boston, Chicago and New York hear them afterward. The Congressional Library often affords our musicians the chance to see new music sooner than it can be seen elsewhere, and there is no reason why they should not present novelties to the musical public of Washington, instead of always harping on hackneyed compositions.

If you cannot examine new music at the Library, at least read what music is being played in the great music centres of the world, and let's hear some of it here this winter.

Did you notice in your papers that the Chicago tenor, Hamlin, gave a Richard Strauss song recital in New York a few days ago? Has it occurred to any director of concerts here to engage Hamlin to come to Washington and give that recital here? Or has any singer here thought of doing the same thing as Hamlin? Perhaps so.

A concert player said in reply to the question where he found a certain sonata: "Oh, I knew that in Germany many years ago." Perhaps he has never looked up any new sonatas since, or perhaps he is still playing the music his teacher taught him. A man who followed this practice would be similar, musically speaking, to a man who never washed his hands or combed his hair.

Another man said: "The people in Washington can't appreciate the highest music. They must have tunes." So he proceeded to give them what he thought they wanted. But all this time a few other musicians were playing programs of a high order, and the audiences were impressed. Some of the people went away from these concerts feeling that they did not quite comprehend the difficult music, but, like the man who "enjoyed the preacher's sermons because he couldn't understand them," they entertained a great respect for the concert giver who was trying to raise them to his level; and they grew contemptuous toward the musician who was playing down to their level.

In short, now that it is about time to make resolutions for the coming year, it is here respectfully suggested that Washington musicians resolve to avoid these musical epidemics in future by using plenty of Bach and Beethoven disinfectant, that they determine to seek originality in their programs, and that they be as careful at all times in the selection of their program numbers as if they expected the German Ambassador or the Presidential party to wander into their concerts at any moment.

Dr. Bischoff's New Compositions.

Dr. John W. Bischoff, who is probably the best known of any one of our Washington composers, wrote a number of new compositions while on his vacation last summer, which have recently been accepted and published by leading music houses.

His Nocturne Orientale is a piano piece which is not too difficult for the average player. It opens with a figure suggestive of the gondola. There is a ground base with languid arpeggios of a cloudless Oriental sky and a still night, answered by intervals in thirds and sixths of rippling water. Occasionally the dip of the oar is proclaimed by delicate grace notes in thirds. The accompaniment continues and a melody floats through the still evening. This is repeated until a graceful cadenza is reached, ending in a modulation which brings us back to the original gondola movement. It is a graceful, soothing poem, and needs velvety fingers for its proper interpretation.

Dr. Bischoff has dedicated his new song, "Come, Holy Spirit," to Elsie Bond Bischoff, his wife. It is remarkable for its simplicity of style and melody. There is nothing strained or unnatural about chords or melody, and this gives the most satisfactory sort of a setting to these well-known words. It is for high voice.

His song, "If God So Clothe the Grass," is a setting of the familiar words from Matthew. This song, which is dedicated to Dr. Bischoff's pupil, J. Walter Humphrey, opens in that declamatory style so fitted for the "basso profundo." The melody following is pleasing and well adapted to the words. Then, again, as if the singer were speaking to the congregation at the words, "Yet I say unto you," the declamatory style is again brought into play. It is one of those songs which bass singers are always trying to find, and which brings out the peculiar gruffness of this voice which so pleases an audience.

Among the concerts during the last two weeks were a song and piano recital by Mrs. Mamie Morrill Burdette and Charles Rabold, the baritone. Mr. Rabold's singing was thoroughly artistic, his tones being even throughout, and the quality of voice and his use of it satisfying in every respect. Mrs. Burdette played numbers by Grieg, Brahms, Chopin and Moszkowski, and the accompanist was Miss Ascherfield.

Oscar Franklin Comstock gave a third studio recital, in which he again demonstrated his versatility and remarkable musical memory.

Miss H. Theodora Wight was heard at an enjoyable McReynolds-Koehle lecture-recital, entitled "Evening with the Romantic German Composers." Miss Wight sang Schubert's "Serenade" with fine effect, and the rest of the entertainment was most enjoyable.

William Worth Bailey has been here with the Musical Art Society. Nevada and Kubelik have given their concerts, and there have been a number of other recitals and concerts which I will try to record next week.

Berenice Thompson.

THE RUBINSTEIN CLUB CONCERT.

THE fifth private concert of the Rubinstein Club might not be mentioned here were it not for the fact that an invitation was sent for criticism. It took place on Tuesday afternoon, December 17, at the Waldorf-Astoria. Miss Agnes Mathilde Dressler played the 'cello with much verve and tone; Miss Io Kien, pianist, performed Liszt's Tarantella from the "Venezia a Napoli," and Frank Eaton, baritone, who sings in a Morristown church, sang the "Dio Possente" with a good voice, but unfinished registration. Should he improve his scale he would save his voice and do very well, for he has the material and has good musical intelligence. Mrs. Anne Price Strahan sang Bemberg's harmless waltz song, "Nymphs and Fauns," and in a chorus song by Manney, called "Song at Sunrise," Miss Moore (we believe she is Miss Olivette Celeste Moore, who possesses a beautiful mezzo soprano voice) sang with true charm we may say, for her singing was not only pure and always directly on the key but it was imbued with a great deal of fine sentiment, without sentimentality.

It is strange that a well trained chorus, such as is composed by the ladies of the Rubinstein Club, should sing well one selection and then half an hour afterward or less do the very opposite. In the song of Henry Loge, "Across the Still Lagoon," cleverly arranged by Frank J. Smith, with seven changes of key, singing a capella, the chorus showed its tendency in adhering strictly to pitch and gave expression and dynamic color to the performance, and immediately thereafter, in a Reverie by the late Joseph Rheinberger, a monotonous and uneven performance took place. Naturally, we must look on a song of Rheinberger's as a more difficult piece of work, but for that very reason we expect more. After all, choruses that sing with piano or orchestral accompaniment never give a true test of their work. It is only in a capella singing that a chorus can illustrate its efficiency, and here we will say that Mr. Chapman has done a great deal with these people, and he must be a remarkable man as a disciplinarian and as a chorus conductor to produce such effective results as he has in some of the songs that were heard last Tuesday night. The trouble with Mr. Chapman is that he is an American. If his name was Chapmonkey or Chapwiskey, and instead of his first name being William it was Wilhelm, there might be something in his work; but Americans, while they have the right to be car conductors and Pullman conductors and electric conductors, have no right to be musical conductors except for nothing.

Miss Kien produced a very refined quality of tone from the piano, which was a concert grand of unusual artistic merit, and an instrument thoroughly well fitted to illustrate piano music of the highest type. Mr. Levy gave out a luscious tone quality in his accompaniments. It was an Everett concert grand and it was one of the best concert grands that we have heard in recent years.

CHICAGO, December 18, 1901.

MADAME BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER'S RECITAL.

MADAME BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER played as an angel might well be contented to play, and she looked like a saint—a sister of the fair Cecilia, in a gown of shimmering white.

This was at the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, last Friday evening, when, before an audience remarkable for its responsiveness and enthusiasm, Madame Zeisler presented a program which served to exhibit the marvelous genius of this great artist and the consummate technical equipment which is peculiarly hers.

Exquisite touch, octaves, caressing a melody or breaking out in wild defiance; scale passages, gentle and even as a June zephyr; heavy legato chords, delicate staccato phrases, tone colorings, dramatic episodes, surprising while they pleased; an accompaniment whispering in subtle asides, as, with reassuring emphasis, the principal theme is spoken—all these the program embodied, and much more.

When some pianists play they convey to you, in apologetic manner, the ideas of a composer. But Madame Zeisler grasps his opinion. Her art is definite.

And she is ever original. Having once heard her play a composition, be it concerto, rhapsodie or waltz, your memory retains the characteristics of the performance.

"Since what she does is so well worth remembering, what wonder that fame is hers?" Such must have been the general conclusion reached at this, her annual recital in Chicago.

The program was arranged:

Papillons, op. 2.....Schumann
Variations Serieuses, op. 54.....Mendelssohn
Wedding March and Dance of the Elves.....Mendelssohn
Rhapsodie, op. 79, No. 2 (by request).....Brahms
Ballade, op. 23.....Chopin
Nocturne, op. 37, No. 2.....Chopin
Scherzo, op. 20.....Chopin
Hexentanz, op. 17.....MacDowell
Valse (à la bien-aimée), op. 59, No. 2.....Schuett
From Papillons d'Amour (Souvenirs Viennois).
Norwegischer Brantzug im Vorueberziehen, No. 2, from Folk Scenes, op. 19.....Grieg
Valse (Man lebt nur einmal).....Strauss
Originally composed for orchestra and transcribed for piano by Tausig.

Originality, grace and sentiment found expression in Schumann's "Papillons." Full of dignity was the Mendelssohn "Wedding March," with its familiar trio melodies and heavy left-hand octave features, in which Madame Zeisler displayed great virtuosity. Rhythmic charm was in the Schuett and Strauss waltzes. Chopin, Brahms and Grieg offered interesting and startling contrasts.

Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses" aroused enthusiasm. In fact, during the recital Madame Zeisler was recalled about fifteen times and she graciously contributed several encores. To her the tributes of applause thus paid in this, her own city, must prove no less gratifying than the ovations tendered by the foremost concert audiences elsewhere in America.

For the benefit of thousands of music students in the State of Illinois, it would be well if Madame Zeisler's recitals took place here, not annually, but monthly.

FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

Local estimates of her playing on this occasion will be read with interest. Said the Inter-Ocean:

Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, who occupies a place entirely her own in the piano playing world, gave her annual recital last night at Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, before an audience of fair dimensions. Her program, which was as follows, was chosen with an intelligent grasp of all possibilities for the display of her marvelous fund of resources.

This critic likewise made these comments:

Her faultless technic, her exquisite delicacy of touch, and her masterful grasp of stunning climaxes were demonstrated in convincing fashion, and brought her roses and bravas as a reward. In the Chopin numbers there was the refreshing contrast that sent even critical minds into dreamland. Lengthy as was the program, the audience generally demanded more at its close. This divinely endowed woman has never given a more brilliant recital or commanded a more flattering reception.

And here are two other accounts:

It would be little more than a repetition of enthusiastic and familiar adjectives were I to characterize anew the playing of Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler. Those who braved the storm last night, defying the elements in the cause of art, were not at all surprised to discover that Madame Zeisler was quite up to the form which they had learned long ago to admire. More than this, she seems in the mellowing process of maturity to have gained a firmer grasp of her subjects, thus supplementing fire with the intellectual process incident to reflection.

To add anything to that which has often been said of this fine artist would be a difficult if not impossible task, and there is no virtue in ringing the changes upon a matter of common knowledge. Madame Zeisler undoubtedly stands in the front line, thanks not only to remarkable technic, but also through her mental fire and skill in interpretation. Her program of last evening, ranging as it did from the Schumann "Papillons" through Mendelssohn, Brahms, Chopin, Grieg and Strauss, illustrated the variety and fluency of her artistic moods, and created the usual enthusiasm. Few of the foreign pianists give us such scholarly work.—The Record-Herald, December 14, 1901.

MADAME ZEISLER'S RECITAL.

The single piano recital which Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler gives annually in Chicago fell upon the most stormy night of the season, but that did not keep her admirers from the musical feast that she had prepared for them in Music Hall. The program that she presented was designed rather to display her virtuosity rather than her skill as an interpreter of the piano classics and, therefore, better adapted to please an average audience. The tremendous nervous force of this little woman and her fine intelligence are probably the basis of her extraordinary fascination as a player.

Technically her performance is well nigh beyond praise, and it is in the higher sphere of interpretation that her musical genius best asserts itself. Her themes are developed in a masterly manner and by some subtle process of the mind, or by suggestion, she keeps before the mind of her hearers the poetic content of the work in hand.

The program is too long to give in detail. Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" and "Dance of the Elves" was best received by the audience, and for an encore Mrs. Zeisler played Schubert's "Moment Musical."—The Chicago Chronicle, December 14, 1901.

The Castle Square Opera Company will open its season of grand opera in English at the Studebaker Hall, Fine Arts Building, on Christmas afternoon. In reference to the various productions the management makes the ensuing announcement:

The first week up to and including Saturday night will be devoted to "Faust," and the second week will be given to "Carmen," beginning Monday night, January 30. The operas to follow include "Cavalleria Rusticana," "I Pagliacci," "La Gioconda," "Lohengrin," "Il Trovatore," "La Bohême," and other lyric masterpieces of similar worth. To the interpretation of these classics the Castle Square management brings an augmented and strengthened company, including all the old favorites, who have made successes in grand opera roles, and many newcomers selected by Mr. Savage with special reference to their value as artistic interpreters of the standard masterpieces embraced in the Chicago repertory. Misses Adelaide Norwood, Josephine Ludwig, Gertrude Rennyson, Maude Ramey and Joseph F. Sheehan, Reginald Roberts, Winfred Goff, Edwin A. Clark and Herman Devries need no introduction to Chicago audiences. Among the newcomers of whom much is expected are Miss Marion Ivell, Ethel Houston Dufre, Francis Carrier, Frank Pagano, J. Parker Coombs and George Tennery. The advance sale of seats began last Thursday, and it was so large that it foretold the story of great success for the ten weeks the company will be at the Studebaker.

Helen Buckley, the eminent soprano, is now under the direction of the Hamlin Company, Kimball Hall.

Edwin C. Rowdon, of the Fine Arts Building, will give a vocal recital at Jefferson, Ia., on January 24.

TOURS and CONCERTS ARRANGED.

Much sympathy is felt for George Hamlin, the tenor, in the death of his younger brother. The funeral took place on Saturday, December 14.

Commenting upon Esther Feé's appearance with the Pittsburg Orchestra and Mme. Sembrich at the Chicago Auditorium last week, the Daily Inter-Ocean of December 11 said:

"The other soloist was Miss Esther Feé, who contributed a lengthy violin concerto and various encores. She possesses an excellent technical equipment, and scored even under the conditions that made her a subsidiary attraction."

It is to be hoped that this gifted young violinist will be heard here frequently this season.

A recital will be given under the direction of Mrs. Hess-Burr in Assembly Hall, Fine Arts Building on Saturday afternoon, December 21, by students who have studied with her exclusively. The first division of the program will be contributed by the younger pupils and part second by those who are more advanced.

"The piano recital given by Miss Carolyn Willard last Friday evening at the Phi Alpha Pi Hall was a very enjoyable musical event," writes a critic in a recent issue of the Olivet (Mich.) Optic. "The audience was largely a musical one and was enthusiastic to a marked degree. Miss Willard showed admirable technic and much musical skill. Her rendition of "En Automne," by Moszkowski, and of Liszt's 'Waldesrauchen' was especially good." The program played by Carolyn Louise Willard on this occasion embraced "Pastorale," Domenico Scarlatti; Etude "Eroica," Henselt; Romanze, Schumann; Scherzo. Brahms; "From an Indian Lodge" and "To a Water Lily," MacDowell; Capriccio, Howard Brockway; Barcarolle, Rubinstein; "En Automne," Moszkowski; "Waldesrauschen," Liszt; Preludes, G minor and F major, and Ballade in G minor, Chopin.

"The Messiah" on Christmas Night.

On Christmas evening, in the Auditorium, the Apollo Club will sing Händel's "Messiah." As this is the thirtieth Christmas in the life of the organization a reunion of former members has augmented the chorus to more than 500 voices. Several of those who belonged to the first maennerchor of 1871 are singing this year. The Chicago Orchestra has been engaged and the soloists will be Eleanor Meredith, Mabelle Crawford, E. C. Towne and W. A. Howland. It is the worthy intention of the Apollo Club to make this occasion a brilliant Yuletide celebration.

The American Conservatory's department for the training of teachers in public school work has been eminently successful. It is now under the supervision of O. E. Robinson, who is one of the supervisors of music in the public schools of Chicago.

It is stated that the success of Victor Garwood is due "not so much to former comprehensive studies under European masters, but rather to a strong individuality, uncommon gifts in interesting pupils in their studies, to which is added a forceful personality." Mr. Garwood is a popular instructor at the American Conservatory.

Among well-known singers who have studied with Madame Linné, of the American Conservatory, are Sibyl Sammis, May Davis-Barber and Elaine De Sellem.

Next week Glenn Hall, the tenor, will visit New York for the purpose of singing with the Oratorio Society on December 26.

Germaine Ames, a pupil of Karleton Hackett, is now studying with Blume, in Berlin, Germany. Her European instructor speaks in high terms of Mr. Hackett's teaching.

Mme. Ragna Linné recently gave a recital before the Beethoven Club, of Memphis, Tenn.

Under the auspices of the American Conservatory a recital will shortly be given by Howard Wells, the pianist, whose fine touch, excellent technical equipment and musicianly interpretations have aroused unanimous praise here this season. Mr. Wells' appearances should not be limited to the West. Before long Boston and New York undoubtedly will hear him play.

Maconda Sings with the Mendelssohn Club.

"Chorus of Bishops and Priests," from Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine," was the opening number at the Mendelssohn Club's first concert of the season in the Studebaker Hall, Fine Arts Building, on December 17. Under the capable direction of Harrison Wild the club sang this and other numbers in very acceptable manner. Attack and phrasing were excellent, and, though the tone was not always well balanced, the Mendelssohn Club sustained its high reputation and aroused the enthusiasm of the large audience present.

Sullivan's "Lost Chord" was encored. A notable feature proved to be Bartlett's "Within a Mile of Edinboro' Town," in which Messrs. Root and Bassé added their assistance to that of Mme. Maconda. The chorus contributed also "To My Turtledove," Georg Henschel; Edgar Thorn's "Love and Time"; "Idylle Mongolienne," Frederick Stevenson; "The Testament," Heinrich Marschner; "My Love's in Germanie," A. von Othegraven; F. von Holstein's dainty "Bonnie Katrine" and J. V. von Woess' difficult "Under Flowering Branches."

Arthur Dunham played the piano accompaniments and Calvin Lambert presided at the organ.

The soloist was Mme. Charlotte Maconda, of New York, who came to Chicago from the far West, where a notable series of sixteen recitals claimed her. In consequence of extremes of climate to which extensive traveling subjected her, the eminent soprano suffered from a severe cold, though few persons in the audience were aware of this fact.

Her first song was "Perle du Brésil," by David. Later she contributed a charming group: "Mignon," Gounod; "Solveg's Lied," Grieg, and "Maids of Cadiz," Delibes. As a final number the soloist gave Delibes' "Bell Song," "Lakmé." But an encore was demanded and she responded with an exquisitely sung "Lullaby."

Madame Maconda's marvelous vocalization, the exceptionally musical quality of her voice and its great range, were revealed to her listeners. In the "Bell Song" she took a sustained high D with as much composure as if it had been middle C.

"The way she takes those high notes, and her singing in pianissimo passages is simply remarkable," said a well-known soprano who sat in the audience.

And the soprano went home to dream of Madame Maconda's songs and her appearance.

For, arrayed in sparkling silver, Madame Maconda herself was "a dream."

The second concert of the Mendelssohn Club will take place on Thursday evening, March 6.

in A flat, Chopin; Miss Margaret Root, Schumann's "Faschingschwank"; Miss Schieb, Grieg's A minor Concerto, and Miss Murphy, G minor Ballade, Chopin. Between the piano numbers, Miss Bertha Kaderly sang two groups of songs by Schumann, Schubert, Grieg and Jensen. An artistic atmosphere pervaded the entire program, as is always the case with musical events at Mrs. Watson's residence. Among her pupils are many brilliant performers and sympathetic interpreters.

On Wednesday evening, December 18, the Schumann Club met in the rooms of the Sherwood Music School, Fine Arts Building. An interesting program, devoted to Scotch music and its influence, was presented by Mr. and Mrs. James Gill, of Kimball Hall. The next meeting of the Schumann Club will take place on January 3.

Mrs. Annette R. Jones, Leon Marx and Robert Ambrosius will be heard this season in a series of Trio Evenings at Highland Park.

Activity prevails at the American Violin School, Kimball Hall, where Joseph Vilim, the director, and his associates are preparing talented students for the concert stage.

At Mrs. Stacy Williams' studio in the Auditorium Building, on the afternoon of December 20, Mrs. Charles Seeberg, of Milwaukee, one of Mrs. Williams' most talented pupils, delighted a number of critical listeners.

In view of the fact that Madame Maconda did not sing "Ah, Fors e Lui," from "Traviata," at the Mendelssohn Club's concert here on December 17, the following comparative estimate, which appeared in one of the Chicago dailies on December 18, is, to say the least, somewhat amusing: "Her singing of the aria, 'Ah, Fors e Lui,' from 'Traviata,' stood out in sharp contrast to the recent work of Suzanne Adams in the same number at the Auditorium. If the latter is a light, coloratura soprano, what, then, is Madame Maconda?"

And then, strangest of all, this critic wrote in the next paragraph: "We know when we hear, if we are Westerners."

In reply to questions regarding the name of a novel by a very estimable author, referred to in these columns last week: It is understood that the work has been dramatized. But the name remains a mystery.

Second Concert by the Spiering Quartet.

An essentially musical audience attended the Spiering Quartet's second concert in the Music Hall, Fine Arts Building, on Tuesday evening, December 17. Eugen d'Albert's quartet, No. 2, in E flat, was the first feature, and the Andante con Moto, Allegro Vivace, Adagio ma non troppo e con moto espressione, and Allegro were full of interesting themes cleverly developed. Theodore Spiering and his associates interpreted the four movements with characteristic finish and artistic insight. In the Adagio a beautiful melody was heard to the accompaniment of a dainty rhythmic figure. The effect was original and pleasing. The treatment admirable.

Beethoven's quartet in A, op. 18, No. 15, also was played for the first time at these concerts. Exquisite tone, accurate phrasing and musicianly interpretations were once again displayed in the work of the quartet.

About chamber music there is a refining and elevating influence. Programs devoted to such music, well performed, are deserving of Chicago's liberal support and encouragement. Advocates of orchestral concerts should not lose sight of the great artistic and educational value of this special series of chamber music events.

At this recital Schubert's Rondo Brillante, op. 70, in B minor, was acceptably played by Walter Spry and Otto Roehrborn.

Bertha M. Kaderly, soprano, contributed the following group of songs: Schumann, "Schoene Wiege meiner Leiden," "Mignon," "Der Knabe mit dem Wunderhorn"; Grieg, "Lichte Nacht"; Theodore Spiering, "Nicht sing ich Lieder laut und hell Der Schmied." Miss Kaderly sang with much expression, and displayed a thorough musical understanding. There are a great many praiseworthy points about her singing, though certain of her tones are occasionally somewhat forced.

Have you seen the Spiering Quartet bow?
Their bow is irresistible—like their playing.
In both cases the ensemble is perfection.

Interviewers on musical journals sometimes meet with difficulties.

It is learned that a humble writer ventured the other day to secure the opinion of a distinguished and learned pedagogue.

The pedagogue expressed his views very brilliantly.

The interviewer, in ectasies, said: "May I write down and ask the editor to publish what you have said to me?"

"No," said the distinguished pedagogue, "but if you will send me a list of questions I shall endeavor to express my views in answer to them."

In fear and trembling the interviewer wrote out the list of questions, and sent them to the distinguished pedagogue.

She heard nothing in response.

So in about three weeks she called on him.

He was very busy, of course, when she called.

"What about my questions?" she gasped.

"I found that some of them were not of the least importance," he replied.

So her spirits began to fall, and she likewise began to go down—in the elevator.

You think the above is "not sufficiently serious"?

Really, that is too bad.

Your opinion disagrees with that of the interviewer——

Electa Gifford's recent success at Duluth has thus been described:

Duluth has probably never heard a more attractive singer than Electa Gifford, who sang before the Matinee Musicale yesterday afternoon. It was one of the finest treats for the musical people of the city. Her voice is a soprano, pure, clear, penetrating and magnificently developed. Her technic is astonishing, and one gains a new realization of the possibilities of the human voice from hearing her. Especially noticeable was the beautiful quality of her sustained tones, and in this her fine control of the breath was strikingly manifest. Throughout her work there is the calm ease and repose of the thorough artist. The Mad Scene from "Hamlet" presented the marvelous technic of her voice, and was the heaviest of her selections. It was splendidly given. "Fruhlingsnacht," by Schumann, was delightful. Another very charming number was Godard's Berceuse. The program included a variety of numbers by Händel, Schubert, Cowen, Nevin and others.

The Matinee Musicale is certainly to be congratulated upon bringing such a delightful artist to Duluth.—Duluth Evening Herald, December 14, 1901.

Bruno Steindel's brilliant performance of the d'Albert 'Cello Concerto has not been confined to the recent orchestral concert in Chicago. On Monday night his musicianly playing of this exacting composition aroused great enthusiasm when Mr. Steindel appeared with the Chicago Orchestra in Indianapolis. M. H.

The Theodore Spiering Orchestra.

THE Theodore Spiering Orchestra, of Chicago, is now to be a permanent organization. It has been reorganized on a large scale, and the regular orchestra will hereafter consist of sixty musicians, with Theodore Spiering as conductor. The orchestra will play regular weekly concerts in Chicago next season, make tours and play for a limited number of May festivals. It has been placed under the personal management of Dunstan Collins.

Glenn Hall.

THE press continues to give enthusiastic accounts of Glenn Hall's singing, as the following notices illustrate:

Glenn Hall, the soloist of the evening, is an artist. He possesses a tenor voice rich and sweet, and sings with so much of the true heart ring that one almost overlooks his perfect enunciation, splendid execution and fine tone production in the pure pleasure of listeign to songs sung as songs, not as vocalises.

The first encore, "To Mary," by Maude V. White, was a gem, while his interpretation of "I'm Wearin' Awa', Jean," was as fine as one may ever hope to hear.

The time has passed when a performer might please by mumbled adaptation of a melody, for clear enunciation is to-day one of the first requirements.

The excellence of Mr. Hall's pronunciation of foreign languages, especially German, brought about many discussions as to his nationality. When quizzed by a reporter Mr. Hall said: "I get credit for every nationality except the right one; my claims on being an American date back to revolutionary times."—Wisconsin State Journal, Madison, December 6, 1901.

Glenn Hall, of Chicago, the soloist of the evening, pleased the audience from the very first by his genial manner and sympathetic voice. His songs were all beautiful old ballads, into which he put a great deal of soul. The sympathetic quality of his voice came out best in Schubert's "Serenade" and the "Irish Love Song." Frequent encores testified to the appreciation of the audience.—Madison Democrat, December 6, 1901.

PHILHARMONIC CLUB, OF MINNEAPOLIS—"MESSIAH."

Glenn Hall, the tenor, has made marked improvement since his last appearance in this city.

His voice has broadened, and he is an artist. He, too, was a favorite with the audience, and sang his solos with sympathetic and intelligent meaning.—Minneapolis Times, December 10, 1901.

ST. PAUL CHORAL UNION—"MESSIAH."

Glenn Hall, the tenor, sang most satisfactorily the small role entrusted to him. Mr. Hall possesses a tenor voice of exceptionally fine quality, and his interpretations possessed a dignity that promises much for Mr. Hall's future as an interpreter of oratorio work.—St. Paul Globe, December 11, 1901.

Glenn Hall, tenor, sang his various solos with true soirit, and proved his right to the place he holds among singers.—St. Paul Daily News, December 11, 19

Jeannette Durno in Michigan.

ONE of the many important engagements which Jeannette Durno, the pianist, has recently filled under the direction of Dunstan Collins is described as follows:

Monday evening Miss Jeannette Durno made her first appearance before Adrian music lovers in a piano recital. For nearly an hour and a half Miss Durno delighted her audience with a program of classical numbers, varied by their different movements, and by the beautiful interpretation given them by Miss Durno. She displayed in all a finished technic, great delicacy of touch and a wonderfully large and beautiful tone. Especial mention might be made of the Leschetizky Tarantelle and Schubert-Liszt "Erlking."—Adrian (Mich) Daily Telegram, December 10, 1901.

The Star Course audience assembled Monday evening to enjoy the second of the season's offerings, Jeannette Durno's piano recital. This artist's wonderful power of execution was aptly illustrated in the "Marche Militaire" of Schubert-Tausig and the Liszt Rhapsodie No. 12, the lighter numbers being given with much grace and delicacy of finish. The grand piano usually used by Miss Durno in her recitals did not arrive in time for the evening. One from a local music house was necessarily substituted.—Adrian (Mich) Daily Times, December 10, 1901.

Hofmann's Farewell Recital.

SUNDAY afternoon, December 29, Josef Hofmann will give a farewell recital in Carnegie Hall, beginning at 3 o'clock. This will be his last appearance in the East until the first week of April, and the last recital that he will give in this city during his present tour. The following is his program:

Thirty-two Variations.....Beethoven
Chor der Derwische.....Beethoven-Saint-Saëns
Frühlingslied.....Mendelssohn
Spinnerlied.....Mendelssohn
Marche Hongroise.....Schubert-Liszt
Nocturne, F sharp minor.....Chopin
Valse, C sharp minor.....Chopin
Valse, D flat major.....Chopin
Polonaise, A flat major.....Chopin
Melodie, F major.....Rubinstein
Jongleur.....Moszkowski
Zur Guitarre.....Moszkowski
Overture, Tannhäuser.....Wagner

On the occasion of his appearance in the Metropolitan Opera House on the 15th, Hofmann received an ovation such as is rarely witnessed in our concert rooms. After the playing of his solos he was recalled twelve times, and the vast audience clamoring for an encore did not cease applauding, even after Mr. Paur began with his orchestral numbers. For over five minutes the conductor was obliged to wait, and amid scenes of enthusiasm he began to conduct the next number three times, but had to stop.

SONGS DEDICATED TO ARTHUR CLAASSEN.—Ernst Heuser, the composer of "Hünengräber," the first-class prize song at the Brooklyn Saengerfest, has dedicated his two new songs to Arthur Claassen, of Brooklyn, who was, as will be remembered, the conductor of the "fest." The titles of the new songs are "Winterträume" and "Die Sterne uber im Thal." Mr. Heuser in a letter to Mr. Claassen says after the latter selected his composition for the Brooklyn festival it soon received recognition in Germany.

OBITUARY.

Kate Oesterle.

KATE OESTERLE, the wife of Grant Stewart, the dramatic author, died last Friday after a short illness. Mrs. Stewart was a distinguished actress and the sister of the late Otto Oesterle, once solo flutist of the Thomas Orchestra, and of Louis Oesterle, the well-known pianist and pedagogue.

Franz Thomas.

CHICAGO, December 21.—The large audience that filled the Auditorium to-night and listened to the last number on the program, "Parsifal," Wagner's funeral procession and glorification, little realized the significance this composition had for Theodore Thomas as he led his orchestra. Not more than twenty minutes before Mr. Thomas was informed that his son, Franz, had died in Pensacola, Fla. It was during the intermission that Mr. Thomas received a telegram announcing the death of his son.

Franz Thomas was born in New York city in 1873. He was educated in the public schools and afterward went to college, where he studied architecture. He never recovered from a fall that he received when he was a boy, and was in delicate health. When Mr. Thomas came to Chicago Franz accompanied him, but could not stand the climate here and soon returned to New York. About two years ago he went South for his health, and for the last year has been living at the Osceola Club, Pensacola.

Van Hoose Continues to Win Success.

THERE is no doubt about the artistic standing of Ellison Van Hoose in the concert field of this country. Since last September, when he appeared at the Worcester Festival, where he at once established himself as a favorite, until his recent appearances in "The Messiah" performance in Albany last week, in every appearance he has won success. His tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when with Madame Ternina he sang in six Wagnerian concerts within eight nights, speaks for itself of the quality and quantity of voice which he possesses. In all of these performances he shared equally in the success with the Wagnerian soprano. All the more praise is due him when it is taken into consideration that everything he sang, with the exception of the "Prize Song," he studied within two weeks. To-day he is to sing the tenor part in "The Messiah" with the Handel and Haydn Society in Boston, and from there he goes to St. Louis, where he will sing the Bach "Christmas" oratorio with the Choral Symphony Society. The following are extracts from his recent criticisms:

Mr. Van Hoose gained fresh laurels. The others were more or less satisfactory in trying parts.—Boston Journal.

Mr. Van Hoose alone was adequate to his task, and he sang intelligently, faithfully and wonderfully well. He had learned his music thoroughly, and there was not a slip in accent or phrase anywhere which we could detect. He had voice enough and to spare, and he used it generously.—Boston Herald.

The soloists were all new to Albany, and all satisfactory. The tenor, Mr. Van Hoose, in the opening recitative, "Comfort Ye My People," set the standard of the evening very high with his rich, vigorous voice, true and pure, and his dignity of delivery.—Albany Argus.

Mr. Van Hoose, tenor, has a voice of richness and purity, with perfect enunciation. From the recitative, "Comfort Ye My People," until the solo in the second part his tones rang out as clear as silver bells.—Albany Times, December 19, 1901.

Mr. Van Hoose repeated his artistic triumph of the first part in the two beautiful solos assigned to the tenor in the score, and he was a tower of strength in the trios and quartets.—Providence Journal.

SECOND KUBELIK RECITAL.

FOR his second matinee recital Jan Kubelik chose last Wednesday afternoon and Carnegie Hall. The program again was designed to display the violinist's agility in finger and bow wrist.

Concerto, F sharp minor.....Ernst
Andante from the Seventh Concerto.....Spohr
Souvenir de Moscou.....Wieniawski
Witches' Dance.....Paganini

There was a certain amount of interest to hear Kubelik play the Ernst Concerto—that difficult bit of writing which violinists respect for its technical hurdles; but the player launched in the work, the famous difficulties petered out until one verily believed the composition had become less difficult over night. With no effort at all did this boy fiddle through the number—the harder the passage the more fluent his work. And after the difficulties had been conquered so easily there remained little to admire in the composition itself. The cantabile part is of the most puerile sentimental sort, to which easily could be fitted the words of half a dozen concert hall songs. Nor did Kubelik's reading of the Spohr Andante vary much from the dignified manner in which he had interpreted the other work by the same composer several weeks ago. The Wieniawski number was brilliant and effective. But in the Paginini "Witches' Dance" he loosed all his tricks of technic, and if the music failed in its eerie effect it must be attributed to prosaicness of the time. A single instrument has lost some of its former magic for us; it takes a Strauss, with an enormous band, or a Tschaikowsky, his tonal palette heaped with sobbing purples and screaming scarlets, to send us home shuddering. So to our vitiated ears this Paganini work sounded very old fashioned.

Perhaps Kubelik realized that sentiment had not been prominently displayed on his program, for when the encore microbe began his ravages the violinist played the Schubert "Ave Maria," Sarasate's Spanish Dance, "Zapateado," op. 23, No. 6, and the Godard Berceuse from "Jocelyn." Here his tone was mellow and sufficiently languid to please even the youngest of the applauding fair ones who had sacrificed a pair of gloves for the extra pieces.

There is scarcely anything new to add to the previous cataloguing of his skill. His technic is and remains his talent.

The remainder of the program was made up of piano selections played by Miss Jessie Shay. This pianist achieved even a greater success than she had at the former concerts, and was more than equal to it, for her work was astoundingly fleet and coruscant. She played Grieg's "Wedding Day"; Moszkowski's Scherzo-Valse and Saint-Saëns' Allegro Appassionato—the latter a triple mixture of the styles of Schumann, Chopin and Liszt. In all her playing there is an enviable dash and assurance of which the public is cognizant and appreciative. The audience was not so numerous as it was on the former occasions, but the popular enthusiasm has not yet begun to wane, and the applause was vigorous. Herr Friml again was the accompanist.

Kubelik in Sunday Night Concert.

Jan Kubelik played the Beethoven Concerto at the Metropolitan Opera House last Sunday night; played it with technical finish and astounding bravura. He gave the Joachim Cadenza with an ease that took away the breath of local violinists.

Kubelik is not an intellectual interpreter of the classic, yet he held his audience throughout, a feat when one considers the usual unmusical quality of a Metropolitan Sunday night audience. He also gave Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen" with orchestra, and the Wieniawski Variations with many encores. His reception was overwhelming. The house was jammed, the receipts being $5,070.

Miss Estelle Liebling made her début under rather trying circumstances. She sang with flexibility and tonal purity the Mad Scene from "Lucia." She was well received by the Metropolitan audience. We wish now to hear Miss Liebling in a more artistic environment. She should give a song recital where her versatility and musicianship and the beauty of her voice will be tested. Rudolf Friml played Liszt's A major Piano Concerto with abundant virtuosity and vigorous style. Mr. Paur conducted the "Oberon" overture and the accompaniments with his usual sagacity.

Recital by Etta Edwards' Pupils in Boston.

STEADY, vibrating tone, good carrying quality, surety attack without audible stroke of the glottis; logical, reasonable shading, always retaining the sweetness of the voice in sustained and forte passages, breathing unnoticeable, yet everywhere sufficient; distinct enunciation, memorizing of music, color to suit the meaning of the music, accuracy of pitch, lack of artifice or effort—these are some of the leading qualities of the singing of Mrs. Edwards' pupils at their first morning musical of this season in Steinert Hall, Boston, on December 14. This was the first of a series of four morning musicales that are to be given during the season, different pupils appearing at each of the four mornings. Those who appeared on Saturday were not all of the advanced or finished classes.

These mornings are an innovation in the school; they are not intended as concerts or "show-off" exhibitions, but as a means of classroom résumé; the work is chosen and assigned when too late for special drill. The work is chosen from the regular repertory of the school, and as showing the actual results of daily work.

Parents and intimate friends only are admitted, and the pupils are taught to focus the mind upon the subject and not upon self and the audience. The following was the program:

Ungdom Skjönhed.....Sinding
Miss Sigrid Olsen.
Sweet Evenings.....Coleridge-Taylor
Mighty Lak' a Rose.....Nevin
Mrs. Rufus Corlew.
Chanson Fleurie (Louis XV.).....Jane Vieu
Puisque c'est l'été.....Jane Vieu
Ballato, C'era una Volto (Ruy Blas).....Marchetti
Miss Edith Ellsbree.
Sapphic Ode.....Brahms
Gae to Sleep.....Fisher
Miss Ethel Wilson.
A Talk on the Correct Way of Learning French.
Miss Fannie Edgar Thomas (Officier d'Académie, Paris).
Aria from La Favorita.....Donizetti
Miss Sigrid Olsen.
L'Esclave.....Lalo
Les Glas des Fleur.....Jane Vieu
Miss Mabelle Leslie.
The Robin.....MacDowell
Mother, Sleep.....Lehmann
Nymphs and Shepherds.....Purcell
Miss Edith Ellsbree.
Ave Maria.....Gounod
Miss Lillian Whiton.
Violin, Miss Ethel Crafts.
Miss Adeline Raymond, accompanist.

The evening concerts will again be a résumé of the whole work of the school, in the presence of a large public and amid more brilliant surroundings.

MARIE SEYMOUR BISSELL SINGS.—Miss Bissell, whose glorious voice has so long been the feature at the Broadway Tabernacle services, emerged from this semi-privacy last week, singing "Come Unto Him," from "The Messiah," at Carnegie Hall, at the Young People's Orchestral Concert. Many present heard her singing with enthusiasm, and especially were her high notes and the artistic finish of the entire number in evidence. Few metropolitan singers have the churchly repose and style of Miss Bissell, and this it is in great part which has kept her in the prominent position she occupies. While she has withdrawn from general public singing, her pupils are the gainers, for to them she devotes all her time, having every hour filled.

Mrs. Carl Alves has a larger class this season than ever before She has a number of fine voices, some of which give promise of great things to come. Madame Bouton, the contralto, who has been so successful this season, is a pupil of Mrs. Alves.

To Messrs. Breitkopf & Haertel, New York:

Four weeks ago I received Klingenfeld's "Elements of Violin Playing," and must bestow on it my fullest recognition. The editor has discovered a new method, which especially examines the position of the fingers on the finger board. Theory and practice also receive extended treatment. The beginning of the work is particularly recommended for self-study. PAUL APEL.

FANNIE BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER.

New York Critics to a Man Agree Concerning Her Art.

THERE are a few living artists of whom even the greatest critics cannot find anything new to say, and Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler happens to be one of them. For years this wonderfully gifted woman has swayed vast audiences by her playing as probably few women of her time have done. Having now reached the highest plane of her art it is not surprising that she inspires writers of varied temperaments to concur in their opinions about her. Herewith we republish extracts from the New York criticisms of Madame Zeisler's November recital in Mendelssohn Hall:

THE CELEBRATED PIANIST GIVES HER FIRST RECITAL IN THIS CITY.

The musical temperament has its drawbacks; one of them is capricious uncertainty. We saw this illustrated yesterday afternoon at Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler's first recital given in Mendelssohn Hall. The playing of this pianist is usually compounded of smoke and flame; she is volcanic rather than classic, and always avoids the pose academic. But during the first half of her program yesterday Madame Zeisler gave an exhibition of self-control that was surprising. Her reading of Beethoven was objective; her Chopin numbers were neither sentimental nor chilly, and until the "Eroica" Polonaise was reached the slight, intent figure before the keyboard revealed naught but poised intellectuality and a fine control of the mechanics of her art. When, however, the trio, the "drum" trio, as it has been called, was sounded the spell began to work, and from that time until the close of the concert the whirlwind let loose and the Bloomfield of old carried her audience with her.

It was a various program that she interpreted: Gluck, as dished up by the too busy Saint-Saëns; Beethoven's last C minor Sonata—he wrote three for piano solo. * * * For the inevitable recalls the pianist gave a posthumous valse of Chopin in G flat and the Schubert-Tausig "Marche Militaire," the one with surprising delicacy, the other with thunderous climaxes. The nervous intensity and power in building up the tonal edifice again demonstrated that brain, not brawn, is the dominating factor in piano playing, as it is in politics and pugilism. Beethoven's last Sonata is a favorite of Madame Zeisler's. She infused more atmosphere into the first than into the second movement. Brilliant was the G flat study of Chopin—the second of the pair in this tonality. It had to be repeated. So was a Florodorian sort of a valse by Schuett, a most sentimental sop to the many lovers of dance rhythms present. Altogether the afternoon was a rare one, for the qualities in this artist's work are unusual. She has style, individuality, temperament—a trio difficult to match. The audience was goodly in size; best of all, it was not an invited one. How few pianists can say the same of their recitals?—New York Sun, November 17, 1901.

A VIRTUOSO RECITAL.

Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler gave a recital yesterday afternoon in Mendelssohn Hall. There was a large audience, a fact which needs to be mentioned, because it is not the rule at piano recitals, and an abundance of applause, which is not at all usual where music is performed by a soloist. Let it be recorded that on this occasion the applause was almost always deserved. The program was one designed to exhibit Mrs. Zeisler's powers as a virtuoso pure and simple rather than as an exponent of the highest and deepest things in music; yet there was opportunity for her to show her musicianship and her stature as an artist in the performance of the great sonata of Beethoven, op. 111, which was the second numher on the program. * * *

Mrs. Zeisler's nervous organization is, after all is said, the substantial hasis of her extraordinary fascination as a player. The second movement, the wonderful theme and variations, was performed in a manner to call for nothing but admiration and gratitude. It seemed as if here the player had mastered herself, for she read the movement with profound feeling, with technical beauty and with a beautiful, artistic poise. It was piano playing of the highest order, and sustained the reputation of this artist.

Before the sonata, Mrs. Zeisler played the familiar Saint-Saëns Caprice on Gluck's "Alceste" ballet music with charming crispness and clarity. After the recital, in answer to enthusiastic recalls, she added to her list the Schuhert-Tausig "Marche Militaire" and a Chopin Valse.

Those who are familiar with the literature of the piano will see that this was a virtuoso program. Let it be recorded, then, that the pianist played most brilliantly. Mrs. Zeisler is a pianist of tremendous technic, of intense temperament, of dazzling style. She can amaze an audience with such startling rapidity of crisp staccato utterance as she showed yesterday in the "Butterfly" Etude of Chopin, and with such delightful singing tone as she produced from the instrument in the cantahile of the nocturne. She will never fail to delight the general public, which is hungry at all times for displays of virtuosity. But Mrs. Zeisler can play poetically, too, and when she does she rises to heights not passed by any other woman player now before the public.—New York Times.

The musical season thus far seems to be productive principally of piano recitals, and from that point of view Madame Zeisler's concert yesterday afternoon at Mendelssohn Hall was quite in the order of things. But the recital in itself differed so widely from all that has gone before it that it stands alone. What the abilities of Madame Zeisler are as a pianist was made known to the local audiences long before yesterday, but with an artist of her caliber every new presentation is of interest, even though her interpretations be known intimately to the auditors. Such was the case at this affair, where, with few lapses, due principally to mediocre compositions, she succeeded in holding the attention throughout the entire long afternoon.

Her program began with that airy caprice by Saint-Saëns on airs from Gluck's "Alceste," which she played with rare grace. Then followed that tremendous last Sonata by Beethoven, a Titanic work which taxes the resources of the most able and intelligent of pianists. Madame Zeisler handled it in a masterly manner; and what her reading lacked in poetry it atoned for by a noble breadth. There was little sentiment in this playing of the sonata; but if at times the outlines were uncompromising and severe they at least defined classically the heroic contents.

After this came a brace of numbers by Schütt. The former of the two, a theme and variations, with a fugato as a coda, showed little inventive ability, but some skill at handling. The succeeding Chopin group opened with the Nocturne, op. 37, No. 2; the "Butterfly Study" was taken at a whirlwind tempo. The familiar A flat Polonaise was delivered with a beautiful command of all the effects—a striking broadness, freedom from the hurry so usual to this piece and a careful grading of dynamics. So well was it done it actually sounded new.

The second half of the program was made up of a Leschetizky etude, two selections by Moszkowski and the Rubinstein "False Note" study, which was done dashingly. For the close there was the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man Lebt Nur Einmal," which Madame Zeisler played with an admirable amount of interest and charm. For encores she pleased the enthusiastic waiting ones with the little posthumous Chopin Waltz, op. 70, No. 1, and the inevitable "Marche Militaire," which she plays inimitably. Several of the numbers were repeated, and there was much applause.—New York Tribune.

Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, who is in the very front rank of woman pianists, gave a recital in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. The audience filled the hall.

The pianist's program was very varied—Gluck, Beethoven, Schuett, Chopin, Leschetizky, Moszkowski, Rubinstein and Strauss. These pieces were played with impeccable technic, and, as in the case of Chopin's Polonaise (op. 33, with the cavalry charge), with immense verve, or, as in Schuett's "A la Bien Aimée," with much chic, and again, as in the Chopin Nocturne (op. 37, No. 2), with great tenderness.

No less than five numbers were encored.—New York Herald.

Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, who has been dubbed a "temperamental" pianist, gave her first recital this season at Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon. She was greeted by a friendly and appreciative audience.

When in best mood this artist ranks with the great in her art, and yesterday she was in such a mood. She played superbly, with lots of her irresistible dash and energy and with her emotions pitched in a high key.

The program exhibited her wide range of expression. Saint-Saëns' caprice on ballet airs from Gluck's "Alceste" was daintily executed. Beethoven's Sonata, op. 111, was given a sturdy interpretation. Schuett's sentimental waltz, op. 59, No. 2, gained in dignity at her hands, and Strauss' "Man lebt nur Einmal," as translated by Tausig, was a marvelous display of technical agility.—New York World.

BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER RECITAL.

When one is fresh from a recital like that presented to us in Mendelssohn Hall yesterday afternoon, it is exceedingly difficult to write a criticism which will read sanely to those who were not there. Fulsome praise is enervating, but that is about the only way one can treat a pianist of the scope of Madame Zeisler. With this artist the growth into a great player has been of gradual development. Everything has broadened and ripened; heart, intelligence, powers of analysis and technic. She seems to possess every attribute necessary to a latterday pianist. Her rhythm, her accent, the clear outline she presents of each change and development of a work, her polyphonic seventh sense, her triumph over the mysteries of dynamics, her singing tone and ability to accumulate a colossal and ever growing climax, her gorgeous pedaling, the ability to subordinate the accompaniment to a melody, to a nicety, the balance, repose, color and warmth of it all—one pauses for hreath when not half through the list of her excellences. Beyond all, she does not serve up to us sentimentality. Madame Zeisler is not afraid to put cheerful music on her programs.

The Gluck number, opening the recital, showed at once with what variety she can treat a theme in variation. She gave it fresh life. The Beethoven Sonata was maestoso, indeed, in its opening. She thundered out the first hars with a fine perception of their dynamic requirements. The Arietta was played as we seldom have heard it before, its legato nature being respected perfectly.

The balance of the program was made up of compositions of "piano music" nature. The G minor Etude and Polonaise of Chopin revealed the fact that Madame Zeisler understands and can cope with the difficulties Chopin threw out upon the world. The last ten numbers were of the brilliant order, requiring pearly runs, clarity in staccato passages, &c.

As encores she played a posthumous Chopin waltz, Liszt's "Liebestraum," No. 3, and the Schubert-Tausig "Marche Militaire." This closing achievement was stupendous. It was started in a leisurely manner and gradually developed to climaxes which were almost overwhelming.

All in all, it may he said that Madame Zeisler is a great and fascinating expositor of piano literature.—New York Press.

ZEISLER'S PIANO RECITAL CHARMS.

Western Musical Genius Gives a Performance that Delights All Hearers at Carnegie Hall.

Music lovers spent an enjoyable afternoon at Mendelssohn Hall yesterday, when that Western queen of the piano, Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, was heard in recital.

Her program, which was of a goodly length, contained some novelties of interest.

Madame Zeisler undoubtedly stands to-day at the head of feminine pianists the world over. Rarely, indeed, does one find all the qualities combined that go toward making a great artist, as in her case. The Arietta of the Sonata is a lovely song, entirely in the great master's lofty vein, with some fascinating variations, at times bold and tricky, at others dainty and limpid.

The trills and delicate finger work of the variations were beautifully executed and the rhythmic division and contrasts in the whole composition were marked with the incisive clearness which is always a delight to Madame Zeisler's hearers.

If there is occasionally a harsh tone it is pardonable in a nature so highly strung, so full of musical fire. Indeed, her playing is so full of dash and snap and sparkle that it would not be surprising to see sparks fly from under her fingers.

Schuett's theme and variations proved to be a sound musical contribution, not as conventional as the usual sort. His valse is pleasing, but would not sound refined under the fingers of all pianists. Madame Zeisler infused it with so much grace and real Viennese chic, as well as brilliance, that her audience were bound to have it again.

The G flat Etude was like a gust of wind, and the great, noisy Polonaise, with its middle movement, that is often likened to the treading of horses' hoofs, was stupendous, almost carrying away the roof as well as the audience. This was always Carreño's battle horse, but Zeisler seems to put even more energy into it. She sang the melodious part most beautifully.

Leschetizky's Etude, with its intricate double notes, was perfect, and Moszkowski's number received the interpretation to accord with its character. The audience gave abundant evidence of its appreciation.—New York Journal.

IS MISTRESS OF THE PIANO.

Much Poetic Feeling and Great Command Expressed in Rendition of Famous Compositions.

Here is a woman who can provoke the piano to poetic utterance and turn into a delight a program which at the mercy of some might be a bore. This recital was her first in New York this season. She gives another next Tuesday afternoon, and it is commended to those who find pleasure in the piano as a solo instrument. They would find better returns for the pains by attending than by giving patronage to some of the noted foreign performers who visit these shores.

Mrs. Zeisler's program, on its face, did not look particularly interesting. Aside from the Beethoven Sonata, op. 111, and three Chopin numbers, the Nocturne, op. 37, No. 2; the Etude, op. 25, No. 9, and the Polonaise, op. 53, it contained nothing which the average virtuoso, especially if just over from Europe, would have selected. But under the fingers of Mrs. Zeisler each assumed, for the moment at least, delightful importance. Those which bore out this assertion most intimately were two pieces by Schuett, the waltz, "A la Bien Aimée," and the theme "Variet Fugato," the latter of which was dedicated to the pianist, and two Moszkowski numbers, "Gondoliera" and "Impatience."

The recital began with Saint-Saëns' caprice on airs from the ballet of Gluck's opera, "Alceste." Here Mrs. Zeisler revealed her facile finger work and her command of pure tone, in rapid writing rather than any deep feeling and strong imagination. That was to come later in the Beethoven and Chopin numbers and the Schuett waltz.

The pianist began the Beethoven Sonata in an aggressive manner, which somewhat dismayed those who know this composer.

But her mood melted with the coming of the slow, gentle movement, and she continued to the end with tenderness and sympathy, impetuosity and emotion, according to the demands of the musical ideas.

In the Schuett waltz, Mrs. Zeisler displayed a delicate and naïve fancy and a pretty skill at the fine tone contrasts. It was with Chopin she most pleased, however. The Nocturne was done with the warm sympathy which must above all things be apparent in the interpreter of Chopin, one who would play upon the senses of the auditors.

Mrs. Zeisler reached her climax by riding triumphantly over the manifold tonal, rhythmical and technical difficulties of the Polonaise. Here she exhibited muscularity and musical breadth quite masculine, and gave comparative pleasure with something which is not only generally irritating, but is also the stumbling block for pianists who are acceptable in other compositions of the same and of other masters.—Morning Telegraph.

A PIANIST OF THE FIRST RANK.

Music is an art which has always been open to women quite as much as to men, except in the mediæval ecclesiastic period. As performers, women have always been prominent, and in operatic song often pre-eminent. As pianists, fewer have risen to the higher ranks, and most of those who have ceased to be women and played like men. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler is one of the notable exceptions to this rule. There is nothing of the amazon about her. She plays like a woman, and therein lies the greatest charm of her art.

While strength and boldness are not essential feminine virtues, there are moments in a woman's life—and in a woman's program—when they may be called for. They were called for by the Chopin Polonaise, op. 53, which Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler played at her Mendelssohn Hall concert last Saturday afternoon, and she was quite equal to the emergency. She played it with splendid energy and fire and a magnificent octave climax. Most of the other pieces were of a more feminine character, and in them her best qualities were displayed—deep feeling in the Chopin Nocturne, No. 2, of op. 37; exquisite grace and Viennese rubato in a Schuett valse from the "Papillons d'Amour" and Strauss' "Man lebt nur Einmal"; lovely tone-coloring in Moszkowski's "Gondoliera," and so on. Rubinstein's Etude on "False Notes" again called for the more masculine qualities, while Saint-Saëns' caprice on airs from "Alceste" was a mixture of both. It is needless to go through the catalogue. There were numerous demands for encores, and two of these were granted in the form of a daintily feminine Chopin valse and a stirring military march by Schubert, with which this pianist has so often aroused the enthusiasm of her audiences.—Evening Post.

The piano recital of Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler at Mendelssohn Hall on Saturday afternoon was the last new event of the week, and it was important enough to merit attention, even thus two days afterward.

Mrs. Zeisler is a pianist of hot impetuosity, tempered by thorough knowledge, by appreciation of form as well as color, and by a ripe technic, sufficing even for those not infrequent moments wherein she amazes by her virtuosity. In Saturday's program there were compositions revealing several phases of her art. The Beethoven Sonata, op. 111, summoned her most serious powers. * * * Her clear conception of this great utterance in tones restrained her, and she infused ripe musical feeling into its proclamation.

Of less weighty compositions there was no lack. Gluck's "Alceste" ballet music, as Saint-Saëns modernized it in his piano transcription, came first, and was played with crisp individuality.—Mail and Express.

Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler, who appeared on Saturday afternoon at Mendelssohn Hall, will play there again at 3 o'clock to-morrow. Again she will have a virtuoso's program, and again her great technical zeal will be tempered with the moderation of an artist's temperament and a woman's spontaneity. Here is a Chicago person who can dazzle as can no other woman in America—and few anywhere—in performance of the pianist's repertory. It is not surprising that local students, literally by the hundred, should hear her gladly. The only "encore" pieces added to Saturday's program were Chopin's posthumous Valse in G flat and the inevitable Schubert-Tausig "Marche Militaire."—Evening Sun.

The first piano recital of the season by an artist of acknowledged standing was Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler's in the Mendelssohn Hall on Saturday afternoon. * * * Mrs. Zeisler is one of the two or three great women pianists of the world, and is probably the greatest this country has produced. Her playing also is of a kind which ought to appeal strongly to the general public. It is, as a rule, highly emotional, sometimes sensational, following no cut-and-dried so-called intellectual formula. It is likely to get on the nerves and jolt the auditor out of the calm, complacent attitude he assumes toward most pianists. It is not meant to infer that the intellectual quality is missing from her work. That would be manifestly absurd, and to disprove it one would have only to refer to her performance of Beethoven's last Sonata, op. 111, which she played on Saturday. To this she gave a strong, broad, virile and almost rugged reading, which at times bordered closely on being rigid. It was not sensational performance in any sense of the word, unless, indeed, from the point of view that such a one was hardly to be expected from a woman. Indeed, the first part of it left the impression that Mrs. Zeisler had rather gone to the opposite extreme in her desire to portray the rugged passion contained therein. Her performance of the variations, however, was altogether lovely.

But it is such things as Chopin's A flat Polonaise, the "Butterfly" Etude, Rubinstein's "Study on False Notes" and Tausig's transcription of the Strauss waltz, "Man lebt nur Einmal," that her playing becomes sensational in the true sense of the word, and one sees and feels best the highly strung, nervous and emotional temperament that lies behind it. Because of this, it is in such things she is quite at her best. Her performance of the Polonaise was most notable in its fiery passion.

* * * Other numbers on the program were Saint-Saëns' Caprice on ballet airs from Gluck's "Alceste," admirably played with a crisp, clean-cut technic; at the end of the recital Chopin's posthumous waltz and the Schubert-Tausig "Marche Militaire."—Commercial Advertiser.

Mme. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler gave her first piano recital of the season Saturday afternoon in Mendelssohn Hall. The opening number, the Saint-Saëns Caprice on airs from Gluck's "Alceste," was played clearly and brilliantly. In fact, the pianist, while losing none of her remarkable crispness and accuracy of technic, seems to gain each year in vigor and dash. The Beethoven Sonata, op. 111, displayed her technic to advantage, the finger work in the variations being noticeably fine. The theme "Varie et Fugato," by Schuett, dedicated to Madame Zeisler, is an interesting composition, with a fine theme and clever variations, the three-voiced fugato being well worked out. The waltz by the same composer is graceful and effective, and should prove a welcome addition to concert programs. It found instant favor with the audience and was re-demanded, as was the Chopin "Butterfly" Etude, which followed the Nocturne, op. 37.

The familiar Chopin Polonaise, op. 53, was played with much brilliancy. The concluding numbers, the Rubinstein Etude on "False Notes" (played by request), and the Tausig arrangement of the Strauss "Man left nur Einmal" waltz, were played in true virtuoso style, and after repeated recalls Madame Zeisler contributed a Chopin waltz.—Evening Telegram.

ANDERSON AND BAERNSTEIN.

THESE two artists are meeting with success on their present Western trip quite extraordinary for even these artists, singing in seven performances of "The Messiah," besides recitals

The audiences receive their work everywhere with enthusiasm, and the press exhaust the vocabulary of adjectives in praise of their work. "Too much cannot be said" and "words fail to express" are the phrases often used by critics in pronouncing judgment on their work. Baernstein is acknowledged to be one of the great interpreters of the title role of "The Messiah."

Händel when writing the soprano parts for "The Messiah" had in mind two distinct voices, a coloratura for "Rejoice Greatly" and a broad dramatic voice for "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth." The work is always done with one voice, and often is heard a light soprano do justice to the first mentioned aria and utterly fail in the second, and vice versa; but Sara Anderson has a voice broad and grand in the magnificent aria which closes the solo work, and at the same time possesses the flexibility which, combined with the masterly control of the organ by the singer, gives the splendid results in the "Rejoice Greatly." "Come Unto Me" and "There Were Shepherds" with the accompanying recitatives, are delivered with a soulfulness and deep conception which delights the innermost soul. A few of the press notices from the present trip are annexed:

Miss Sara Anderson, of New York, is not a stranger to Galesburg, having made many friends here on a previous visit, but her splendid vocal powers were new to all and she delighted everyone. Her voice has a fine range, the tones are full, beautiful and clear. The lines beginning "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth" were especially pleasing, and again and again Miss Anderson bowed in recognition of her appreciative audience.

Of the basso, Joseph Baernstein, of New York, too much cannot be said. He fairly took his audience by storm; never before has the part been so magnificently taken, and the audience was quick to recognize the fact. His first solo was splendid. His voice is powerful, yet very refined and delicate in parts, and Mr. Baernstein seemed to be its perfect master. He also sang without notes something much to be commended, and why not expected in work so well known? In his solo, "Why Do the Nations So Furiously Rage?" he surpassed anything Galesburg has heard, and he received in response a perfect ovation. Again and again he rose to acknowledge the applause of both audience and chorus. After the fourth or fifth call he consented to sing the solo a second time, to the delight of everyone. Such a demand was unprecendented, but under the circumstances certainly not unwarranted.—Galesburg Evening Mail, December 7, 1901.

One feels like asking, where did Jos. S. Baernstein get that marvelous voice, so masterful and magnetic, so full, round and far-reaching, so deep and smooth, so adapted to emotional interpretations, of such great volume? Such a voice is heard but seldom in a lifetime. Mr. Baernstein is not a man of giant physique, but is of average height and build, which deepens the wonder. He has a bright and winning face, and sings with dramatic fervor. From his opening solo, "Thus Saith the Lord," to his last note, the audience was with him. Without disparagement to the rest of the soloists, it can be said that he achieved the greatest musical triumph of the evening. His first solo he gave without the music. In his manner there was not a trace of affectation—it was simply masterful. Prolonged applause showed the depths that he had stirred. But his most signal victory was in the solo, "Why Do the Nations So Furiously Rage?" which demands the highest cultivation of the vocal powers for its successful interpretation. This he also sang without the score before him. When he had finished he was given an ovation. Time and time again the applause broke out. He finally responded by singing part of the solo over. The effect was most thrilling and impressive. The audience formed golden opinions of the singer.—Galesburg Daily Republican-Register, December 7, 1901.

Miss Sara Anderson was the singer for the recital. She left the stage at the conclusion of the program with laurels that should have been as satisfying as any that she has received during her three years' career, for such a spontaneous reception, such an ovation is seldom accorded an artist in Toledo. She sang divinely, and the concluding strains were the awakening to reality that the music had dispelled. Miss Anderson is a magnificent woman in appearance. So thoroughly charming is her personality, so exquisitely gowned, so fair to behold, so intensely dramatic in the quiet intensity of the true artist, so delightful in the technic which enabled her musical interpretations to be enjoyed without effort, in all so much besides the mere singer that any fault might have been pardoned her. She had no fault to condone, the Toledo people found none in her, and should she ever return to the city she will find the same packed auditorium on her return. She was fine and the evening was one with nothing to be desired. Not until her rendition of "Elsa's Dream" did the fullness of her power begin to dawn upon the audience, although appreciation had not been lacking. Her closing group of songs were as clever as any ever sung upon a Toledo stage. In all it was a remarkable program, with a great artist to interpret it.—Toledo Daily News, December 11, 1901.

Of the soloists, Joseph Baernstein was easily the greatest success of the evening. No basso that has visited St. Paul in recent years has made so excellent an impression. Aside from its remarkably wide range, his voice possesses a flexibility, and a certain melodious expressiveness, which makes it always a delight to hear. An admirable self-poise and an absolute surety of tone are qualities possessed by the singer to a marked degree. After his aria, "Why Do the Nations?" he received an ovation, and was forced to repeat part of the song.—St. Paul Globe, December 11, 1901.

Joseph Baernstein has a remarkable voice, which he uses in a style magnificent. He has, besides the priceless gift of a magnificent voice, the mental capacity that is so rarely associated with it. He is a thinking man; his art ideals are so high as to make his work flawless. Every tone is beautiful and his style is broad and commanding. His color scale is tremendous. Notwithstanding that the audience was enthusiastic over the great aria, "Why Do the Nations?" many must have liked best the basso's interpretation of the recitative and aria, "For, Behold, Darkness," and the "People that Walked in Darkness." It was a powerful exhibition of tone somberness and was highly descriptive. The unusual tribute of a not-to-be resisted encore followed the more florid solo.—St. Paul Dispatch, December 11, 1901.

NEW YORK

Greater New York.

NEW YORK, December 23, 1901.

ALFRED R. WILLARD, the organist and choirmaster of St. Mary's P. E. Church, Burlington, N. J., a pupil of J. Warren Andrews, gave the first in a series of students' organ recitals at the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York, last Thursday, assisted by Miss Cornelia W. Marvin, alto of the church, with this program:

Organ—
First Sonata in C minor.....Salome
Pastorale in E.....Lemare
Prelude and Fugue in D.....J. S. Bach
Mr. Willard.
Contralto solo, Abide With Me.....Edw. J. Biedermann
Miss Marvin.
Organ—
Scherzo, Second Symphony.....Widor
Second Suite.....Boëllmann
Chorale.....Boëllmann
Mr. Willard.
Contralto solo, Fac ut Portem (Stabat Mater).....Rossini
Miss Marvin.
Organ—
Caprice in B flat.....Guilmant
Romance in D flat.....Lemare
Toccata, Fifth Symphony.....Widor

The program gives an idea of Willard's ability, and indeed this young man has set for himself high ideals. Miss Marvin, a true contralto, lent variety to the serious program of organ music by her artistic singing.

The January 2 (Thursday) recital will be given by Arthur L. Collins, of Newburgh, at 4 p. m., assisted by Mrs. H. B. Wilson, violinist.

Blanche Duffield sang at the Knickerbocker Athletic Club ladies' day affair recently, her numbers being "Chanson Provençale," Dell' Acqua; "Mighty Lak a Rose," Nevin; "Ueber's Jahr," Böhm, and "An Open Secret," Woodman. These songs were so well received that the fair singer had to give an encore. Miss Duffield is probably best known by her tour of some months with Sousa and his band when she did not miss a single concert, singing some 250 times consecutively. She is the soprano of the Orange Presbyterian Church, S. P. Warren organist.

At Y. M. C. A. Hall, New Rochelle, for the benefit of the Church Building Fund of Salem Baptist Church, there was a concert last week of varied music, singers, violin, banjo club, &c., and the special feature of the affair was Miss Marguerite Carpenter, a pupil of Parson Price, who sang the aria from Meyerbeer's "Robert," and the recitative and aria, "Che Faro," from Gluck's "Orpheo." The first made such a hit that she had to sing an encore, the popular "Auld Robin Gray," and the second number went so well that again she was compelled to sing, this time Nevin's "Mighty Lak a Rose," a song coming into popular favor of late.

Genevieve Bisbee is well known as an able pianist, and of late she is attracting attention as a teacher. She has a beautiful Carnegie Hall studio, and here one day last week her talented pupil, Letitia Howard, gave this recital program:

Carneval, Mignon.....Eduard Schütt
Miss Howard.
Spring Song.....Arthur S. Hyde
Mrs. Lillian Pray.
Ballade, G minor.....Chopin
Waltz, A flat.....Chopin
Miss Howard.
Petites Roses.....H. A. Cesek
Si mes vers avaient des ailes.....Hahn
Wanderer's Nachtlied.....Clayton Johns
Mrs. Pray.
Barcarolle, G minor.....Rubinstein
Waltz in E.....Moszkowski
Waldesgespräch.....Schumann

Miss Howard, a slight young girl still in her teens, plays with taste, has a good memory, and in time will attain her ideal, no doubt, for her teacher says she is a good worker. She has a variety of touch at command, discreet use of the pedal, but like all young girls, plays with a considerable amount of affectation. This will wear off as she becomes accustomed to expressing her real emotions.

Miss Bisbee has also a couple of young children of marked talent who will some day become known. More of these later. Madame von Klenner has engaged Miss Bisbee to play solos for the Press Club December 28.

JESSICA DE WOLF.

SOLO SOPRANO OF ST. THOMAS' CHURCH.

Mrs. Jessica De Wolf, who returned to New York recently, has succeeded the late Mrs. Emil Gramm as solo soprano of St. Thomas' Church. Mrs. De Wolf will be heard in concert and oratorio during the season.

Wade R. Brown, who came here from the South recently, and of whom this paper has made mention, is developing the music at his church, Waverley Congregational, at Jersey City, the latest being the children's choir of seventy-five voices, which in conjunction with the adult choir of twenty-five voices, will participate in their Christmast music next Sunday. Their principal numbers will be Adam's "Holy Night," Tours' "Sing, O Heavens," Shelley's "The Nativity," and a number of carols.

KUBELIK DAZZLES BROOKLYN.

JAN KUBELIK gave his first recital in Brooklyn Monday night, at which he was assisted by Miss Jessie Shay as the solo pianist and Herr Friml as accompanist. For Brooklyn on a wet night two days before Christmas the young virtuoso was greeted by a remarkable audience, remarkable in numbers and in unconstrained enthusiasm. The family circle in the old Academy of Music was crowded with musicians, among them many violinists. The old families of Brooklyn who always turn out when something worth while is taken over to the borough were there with their sons and daughters, occupying the best seats in the orchestra and balcony. The compositions played both by Kubelik and Miss Shay are familiar. The artists played them at previous concerts reviewed in the columns of THE MUSICAL COURIER.

Here is the list:

Concerto in E major.....Vieuxtemps
Allegro moderato. Introduction and Rondo.
Herr Kubelik.
Piano soli—
Etincelles.....Moszkowski
Etude de Concert.....Schloezer
Miss Shay.
Violin soli—
Aria.....Bach
Romance in G major.....Beethoven
Herr Kubelik.
Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 12.....Liszt
Miss Shay.
Violin solo, Nel cor piu non mi sento.....Paganini
Herr Kubelik.

After the Vieuxtemps Concerto, Kubelik was recalled nine times. His playing, of course, of this showy work was marvelous. The emotional listeners were spellbound, for those who know something about the violin realize that such technical dexterity is beyond even a talented pupil if he should practice faithfully for fifty years. Believers in the reincarnation theory are the people who understand from whom comes this young man's phenomenal skill.

With all due respect to the opinions of able critics this writer was entranced with every bar of the Bach air as Kubelik played it. His beautiful full, big tone, perfect intonation and simplicity all went to stamp a rare musical performance. After the Beethoven Romance, Kubelik was again recalled and recalled, and then as if determined to show that he could play music, he returned and played unaccompanied the difficult Bach Prelude in A major. When he played the Paganini composition the house went wild, and instead of rushing home to bed, which is the custom in Brooklyn, everybody remained to join in the ovation to the young Bohemian. He played later another encore, the "Souvenir de Moscou," by Wieniawski.

Miss Shay won her share of the honors, too. Her wonderful technical skill and musical insight, allied to a winsome feminity, form a rare combination. Miss Shay also set the audience wild with her performance of the Liszt Rhapsody, and not content with this, the audience insisted on an extra number, and the charming young pianist played for them Gottschalk's "Tremolo," another show piece, but so difficult that nobody in years has played it before this public.

When the recital was over Kubelik held a reception behind the scenes. He seemed not the least bit fatigued, and in greeting people he was the soul of good-nature and courtesy. The manners of this young Bohemian are princely. On the stage he looks frail, but he seems virile enough when he grips you with those gold mine fingers of his. In a few years his playing will be infused with virility and then he will remove mountains with his art.

The recital was given under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. Kubelik will pay his second visit to Brooklyn Monday evening, January 6.

"Trend of Time" Song Cycle.

TWENTY-FIVE or thirty years ago, when our mothers charmed the neighbors by singing songs like "Some Day," such a concert as that given at Mendelssohn Hall last Thursday afternoon would have been voted an event of importance. But despite the wail of a poet, "Time" does not turn backward in its flight. It must advance or it must stop. These are the days when men and women respond quickly to anything new in their line, and so it was not surprising to find many vocalists in the audience assembled in the pretty hall on West Fortieth street for the concert, which the credulous expected would prove a novelty. It must be confessed that "The Trend of Time," song cycle, by "The Trend of Time Quartet," sounds ominous when read out loud. Since it happens that most women and few men are curious by nature, ears were unusually strained when Victor Harris, the pianist of the afternoon, and the four singers walked out upon the stage.

"The Trend of Time" cycle is written in twelve parts, to represent the twelve calendar months of the year. The text, by William H. Gardner, is without rhyme or reason, and in the twelve long verses wanders from inanity to exaggerated sentimentality. The music, by Victor Kemp (Harry Girard), is a hundred times better than the text. Several of the numbers are excellent; that is, excellent for musicales in the drawing room, with the pink tea as an adjunct, or for the village concert hall. None but a man of sterling courage would have attempted to present it in broad daylight in a metropolitan auditorium. Of the four singers who appeared in the cycle, the composer, Mr. Girard, and Miss Marguerite Hall are entitled to the honors, if any were distributed. Mr. Girard has a wholesome baritone voice and he struggled heroically to save the cycle from disaster. Miss Hall sang with her accustomed sincerity and intelligence. Mrs. Seabury Ford, soprano, and Mackenzie Gordon, tenor, completed the quartet of singers. Victor Harris, at the piano, helped materially to show that there were some good things in the score.

As a prelude to the new cycle, Miss Hall and Mrs. Ford sang four duets by Brahms, Mr. Gordon sang songs by Sinding, Dvorák and Schultze, and Miss Hall songs by Liza Lehmann's mother and C. A. Lidgey. The Brahms duets, "Die Meere," "Kloster Fräulein," "Die Schwestern," "Die Boten der Liebe," were delightfully sung.

METCALFE SONG RECITAL.—The song recital given by Miss Susan Metcalfe last Wednesday afternoon proved to be most interesting. Her voice is a well placed, resonant soprano of good quality and considerable range. She interprets her songs with understanding, and there is no straining after effects. One of the best numbers of the afternoon was "Die Junge Nonne," by Schubert. In the aria Miss Metcalfe exhibited dramatic sense, and demonstrated her ability to use her voice properly. Miss Metcalfe has every reason to hope for a bright future as a singer.

FLORENCE AUSTIN.—Miss Florence Austin, formerly a pupil of Henry Schradieck, and for the last three years a pupil of Ovide Musin, gave a recital at Mendelssohn Hall Thursday evening, December 19. She had the assistance of Signor Abramoff, basso, formerly with the Metropolitan Opera Company. Miss Austin played the Suite in G minor by Franz Ries, the Paganini Concerto in D major (allegro) (cadenza by Besekirsky), and "Airs Hongrois," by Ernst. She has a pure, sweet tone which would be improved if she played on a somewhat better instrument. Her bowing is good and her technic shows that she has studied under masters of the violin. The concerto was played so well that the audience insisted on an encore. Miss Austin thereupon played a Berceuse by Renard.

MME. CLARA POOLE-KING.—Mme. Clara Poole-King, the contralto, has numerous engagements in oratorio. The Albany critics wrote as follows about her singing in "The Messiah" in their city:

Madame Poole-King sang "He Was Despised" with fine taste and expression, and exhibited flexibility of voice and facility of execution in "O, Thou That Tellest." The entire work was given a spirited rendering throughout.—Albany Evening Journal.

Madame Poole-King possesses a contralto voice of wide range, whose limpid tones are resonant and full of music as a cathedral chime. Those who heard her render the passage beginning "He Shall Feed His Flock" will never forget the delicacy of tone and depth of feeling which made the theme almost a prayer.—Albany Times-Union.

The contralto, Madame Poole-King, in the recitative and in "Then Shall the Eyes of the Blind Be Opened," made her most favorable impression with a voice of good quality and much artistic finish.—Albany Argus.

LINCOLN.

LINCOLN, Neb., December 15, 1901.

THE interest in music exhibited by the people of this progressive Western city increases noticeably each year. All the concerts this winter have had a large attendance. Nordica sang on December 6 at the Auditorium to 2,500 people, and earlier in the season a smaller building was completely filled for a recital by Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler. The growth in interest is partly due to the excellent artists who visit this city and equally to the influence of the University School of Music and the Nebraska Conservatory of Music. Each of these institutions, through concerts by pupils and faculty, has done much to familiarize Lincoln people with the best compositions for piano and voice.

An excellent reading of "The Messiah" was given Friday night by the university chorus, assisted by the following soloists: Mrs. Mark Woods, soprano; Miss Grace Reynolds, contralto; H. J. W. Seamark, tenor, and C. W. Kettering, bass. Mrs. P. V. M. Raymond, who has charge of the university chorus, was conductor. Director Kimbal, of the School of Music, expects to make a production of this oratorio a regular feature of the Christmas season.

Madame Zeisler came for the Matinee Musicale. This club continues to be an important factor in the musical life of the city. The officers now are: President, Mrs. D. M. Butler; vice-president, Miss Lucy Haywood; recording secretary, Mrs. Henry B. Ward; corresponding secretary, Mrs. A. S. Raymond; treasurer, Mrs. A. W. Jansen; librarian, Mrs. E. P. Brown; auditor, Mrs. E. Lewis Baker. A program of music by American composers was arranged for the meeting this week by Mrs. R. A. Holyoke and Miss Haywood. The most [illegible] number given was the fine trio by Arthur [illegible] in C minor, for violin, 'cello and piano.

Parlor musicales are becoming a popular form of entertainment here. Several large functions of this nature have already been given and others are in prospect. On December 12 several hundred ladies were entertained by Mrs. George E. Haskell and Mrs. E. Lewis Baker. The musicians were Jules Lumbard, of Omaha, baritone; Edward Gareissen, of Omaha, violinist, and Mrs. Baker, contralto. Miss May Belle Hagenow was the accompanist.

Earlier in the season Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Sheetz, vocalists, and Mrs. L. J. Herzog, pianist, gave a recital before a large number of invited guests. They were assisted by Miss Lillian C. Anderson, reader. Mrs. A. O. Faulkner and Mrs. A. R. Talbot also gave an elaborate musicale at Mrs. Faulkner's suburban home, Park Hill. The solo-

RICHMOND.

RICHMOND, December 6, 1901.

MONDAY evening Herr Felix Heink gave a concert at the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association. His piano solos delighted the audience, and his songs were received with enthusiasm. Herr Heink is under the direction of the Metropolitan Concert Bureau of New York.

Eduard Zeldenrust gave a recital at the Academy Tuesday evening, this being his first appearance in Richmond. There was but little interest shown in the artist during the earlier part of his performance, but at the close of the evening the enthusiasm had greatly increased and he was recalled again and again. The program began with Schubert's "Theme and Variations," op. 142, No. 3. This he played with exquisite skill and rare thematic treatment. His use of the pedals, too, was most effective. Schumann's "Papillons" followed, and called forth interpretation of a different type.

The reading of the group of Chopin numbers evoked many and varied criticisms. One of the distinguished musicians of Richmond, a man of broad culture and a student of Chopin, declared Zeldenrust to be the best interpreter of Chopin who has been heard here. Indeed, he considered him the finest pianist who has visited our city. Others thought there was too much pounding.

His own dainty little composition proved Zeldenrust to have beautiful ideas of his own.

The interpretation of Weber's "Polacca Brillante" was unique. In playing this composition, the Wagner selections and the Hungarian Rhapsodie, he showed great technic, power and brilliancy.

At the conclusion the audience had become most enthusiastic, and after the Rhapsodie he returned to the stage, giving a Chopin waltz.

The absence of a Beethoven Sonata was regretted. It was believed that the artist would probably have revealed new beauties of interpretation.

Zeldenrust appeared here as the third attraction of the MacLachlan series.

DECEMBER 13, 1901.

The musical event of the week has been the recital by Josef Hofmann at the Academy on Thursday.

Mr. Hofmann presented the following program:

Variations, F minor.....Haydn
Sonata, E flat major, op. 31.....Beethoven
Impromptu, G minor.....Schubert
Soirée de Vienne, D major.....Schubert
Ballade, A flat major.....Chopin
Prelude, No. 25.....Chopin
Valse, A flat.....Chopin
Gnomenreigen.....Liszt
Jongleur.....Moszkowski
Rhapsodie, No. 2.....Liszt

Mr. Hofmann is entirely without mannerisms, and impresses the audience by his charming modesty, for he is a genuine artist and possesses remarkable technic.

His broad interpretation of Beethoven was most interesting, and the rendition of the scherzo in the op. 31 was exquisitely beautiful.

During the past eight years he has grown and developed wonderfully in technical proficiency, bravura playing, elegance and the singing tone. It is delightful to remember the exquisite clearness and delicacy of this singing tone.

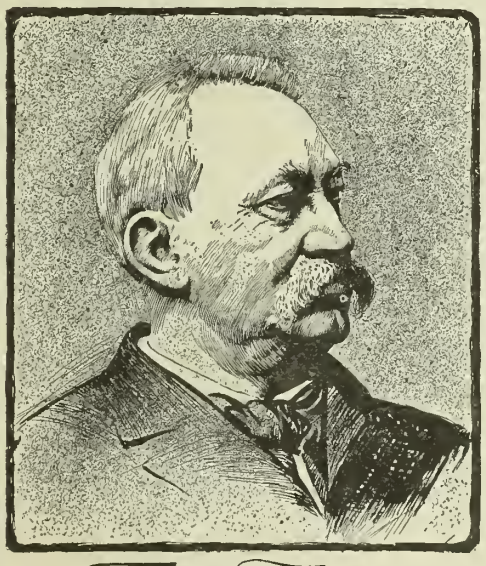
A $68 Library of Musical Knowledge and Sheet Music—16 Volumes—sent complete on receipt of $1 and your acceptance as a Club Member

This one Edition only at HALF PRICE



Theodore Thomas.

This Musical Library is the 1901 edition of Famous Composers and Their Music, edited by Theodore Thomas, John Knowles Paine and Karl Klauser. Musical instructors and the foremost musicians universally recognize it as the best of all musical libraries. It is the standard of the world and over 50,000 sets of the earlier (six volume) edition have been sold at more than double our price per volume. There are sixteen Imperial Octavo volumes measuring about 9 x 12 inches—six of reading matter and illustration, and ten of music. The text volumes contain all you want to know about the history of music itself—the different schools of music, Italian, French, German, and so forth; the complete stories of all the great composers, their private lives and their public careers; clear and full accounts of the special peculiarities of every composer's work, and how each of them differed in essential points from all his fellow-craftsmen, yet made important contributions to the total. In short, they really form a complete encyclopedia of all musical knowledge, not written like an encyclopedia but like simple history or biography.

FAMOUS COMPOSERS AND THEIR MUSIC
6 Encyclopedia Volumes—10 Music Volumes

The entire content of these text volumes consists of articles specially written for this work by such men as Oscar Comettant, Director of the Paris Conservatoire; Edward Dannreuther, the distinguished musical critic of London; the late John Fiske, Philip Hale, Adolphe Jullien, who stands at the very head of the Parisian critics; Dr. Louis Kelterborn, Dr. Philipp Spitta, of Berlin; Henry E. Krehbiel, of New York, and many others equally famous. Each subject has been written about by the one particular person in the whole musical world who is best qualified to deal with it, and the cost to the publisher of all these special articles was enormous.

The 10 Music Volumes contain nearly 1700 pages of sheet music chosen by Theodore Thomas and Karl Klauser. The pieces are neither too easy nor too difficult. Plenty of them can easily be mastered by pupils of a year or two's experience. Yet Paderewski bought five sets of the first edition—one for his own use and four for gifts to his friends.

For Young Musicians this work is invaluable. It does not preach; it is not full of "Dont's"; it does not attempt to teach how to play or sing; it does not try to take the place of a musical instructor. But after one has owned the Library a while, dipped into its reading volumes and wandered through its hundreds of music pages, there grows up insensibly a love for what is really good and an aversion to what is bad in the great world of melody and harmony.

Beautiful Illustrations to the number of over 500 are scattered through the volumes. Many are magnificent color plates of rare and interesting musical instruments, 234 of them are portraits of the great composers, while others are facsimiles of their music manuscripts, views of the towns they lived in, their birthplaces, and notable scenes in their careers.

Half Price {LITTLE PAYMENTS (IF YOU PREFER)

The set consists of sixteen Imperial Octavo volumes, measuring about 9 x 12 inches—almost sheet music size—bound in classic vellum, with rolled gold tops and gold-lettered and decorated backs, and the music volumes will lie open perfectly flat on a music rack, with no bothersome tendency on the part of the leaves to turn over of themselves.

The publisher's price of the set is $68.00. Our club price is just one-half of that, with the Club fee ($1) added. The payments are $1 (Club fee) down and $2 per month for 17 months.

The full Set is sent you when you join the club and pay the first Dollar.
